

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM JULY 27, 1896, TO JULY 27, 1897.

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, H. J. E. FRASER, G. L. MACFARLANE, JOHN BOYD, AND A. O. M. MACKENZIE, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

FOURTH SERIES.—VOL. XXIV.

EDINBURGH:

T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.

M.DCCC.XCVII.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBE & CO., THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279733

Y8A3911 1478

JUDGES
OF THE
COURT OF SESSION
DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON.

Lord ADAM.

Lord M'LAREN.

The Lord KINNEAR.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. J. H. A.
MACDONALD.

Lord YOUNG.

Lord TRAYNER.

The Lord MONCREIFF.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord KYLLACHY.

Lord KINCAIRNEY.

Lord STORMONTH-DARLING.

Lord LOW.

Lord PEARSON.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON.

Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

The other Judges of the Court of Session.

Lord Advocate, {The Right Hon. A. GRAHAM
MURRAY, Q.C.

Dean of Faculty, ALEXANDER ASHER, Esq., Q.C.

Solicitor-General, CHAS. SCOTT DICKSON, Esq., Q.C.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

P E E R S

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, LORD HALSBURY.

Lords WATSON, HERSCHELL, MACNAGHTEN,
MORRIS, SHAND, and DAVEY.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN

VOLUME XXIV.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,— Lands Valuation Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,—
 Court of Justiciary, see p. xii.,—House of Lords, see p. xiv.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
A B v. Northern Accident Insurance Company, - - -	258
Aberdeen, Society of Solicitors in, Petitioners, - - -	511
Advocate, Lord, v. Hutchings, - - -	177
Advocate, Lord, v. Thomson, - - -	543
Advocate, Lord, Wemyss' Trustees v. - - -	216
Airth, Police Commissioners of Govan v. - - -	41
Aitken v. Farquhar, - - -	268
Allan's Trustees, Petitioners, - - -	238, 718
Alsop, Gregson v. - - -	1081
Anderson & Co., Gibson & Co. v. - - -	556
Annan v. Annan's Curator Bonis, - - -	851
Arizona Copper Co., Limited, v. London Scottish American Trust, Limited, - - -	658
Arrol & Sons, Thin & Sinclair v. - - -	198
Assets Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue, - - -	578
Assets Co., Limited, v. Ogilvie, - - -	400
Assets Co., Limited, v. Shirres' Trustees, - - -	418
Atherstone's Trustees, - - -	39
Ayr Harbour Trustees, Niven v. - - -	883
Baikie v. Wordie's Trustees, - - -	1098
Banknock Coal Co., Limited, Petitioners, - - -	476
Banknock Coal Co., Russell v. - - -	1009
"Barcraig" Ship Co., Limited, Sibson & Kerr v. - - -	91
Barkley & Sons v. Simpson, - - -	346
Barnetson, King v. - - -	81
Barony Parish Council, Brechin Parish Council v. - - -	587
Baxter's Heir, Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers in Edin- burgh v. - - -	744
Bell v. Bell, - - -	847
Bell's Executor v. Borthwick, - - -	1120
Bell's Trustees, Russell v. - - -	666
Bent Colliery Co., Limited, Connolly v. - - -	1172
Benton, Liquidators of Employers' Insurance Co. v. - - -	908
Bird & Co., Robertson & Co. v. - - -	1076
Blairgowrie District Committee, Whitson v. - - -	519
"Blairmore" Ship Co., Limited, v. Macredie, - - -	893
Blantyre Parish Council v. Rutherglen Parish Council, - - -	695
Bo'ness Commissioners, Burr v. - - -	148
Borthwick, Bell's Executor v. - - -	1120
Borthwick, Green or Borthwick v. - - -	211
Bothwell Parish Council, Shotts Parish Council v. - - -	169
Brechin, Parish Council of, v. Parish Council of Barony Parish, Glasgow, - - -	587

	Page
Bremner, Campbell v. - - - -	1142
Brescia Mining, &c., Co., Wotherspoons v. - - -	207
British Workman's, &c., Assurance Co. v. Stewart, - - -	624
Brown's Trustee v. Brown, - - - -	962
Brown's Trustees v. Hay, - - - -	1108
Brown's Trustees v. Milne, - - - -	1139
Bruce & Co., Gordon v. - - - -	844
Burnet v. Gow, - - - -	156
Burns, G. & J., Countess of Leitrim v. - - -	993
Burns v. Waddell & Son, - - - -	325
Burr v. Bo'ness Commissioners, - - - -	148
Buttercase & Geddie's Trustee v. Geddie, - - -	1128
Cadman, Davis v. - - - -	297
Caledonian Railway Company v. Cochran's Trustees, - - -	855
Caledonian Railway Company, Smyth v. - - -	488
Caledonian Railway Company, Warwick v. - - -	429
Callander and Oban Railway Co., Macfie v. - - -	1156
Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited, Marshall v. - - -	33, 712
Campbell v. Bremner, - - - -	1142
Carruthers' Trustee v. Finlay & Wilson, - - -	363
Carruthers' Trustees, Petitioners, - - - -	238
Chalmers v. Paterson, - - - -	1020
Chalmers' Trustees v. Sinclair, - - - -	1047
Clark v. Sutherland, - - - -	183, 821
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Hope, - - - -	944
Cochran's Trustees, Caledonian Railway Company v. - - -	855
Cockburn v. Hogg, - - - -	529
Connolly v. Bent Colliery Co., Limited, - - -	1172
Cowan's Trustees v. Ferrie's Curator Bonis, - - -	590
Cowdenbeath Coal Co., Limited, Ferris v. - - -	615
Cowie Brothers & Co. v. Herbert, - - - -	353
Cowie Brothers & Co. Herbert v. - - - -	361
Craig v. Hogg, - - - -	6
Craig's Representatives, Scott v. - - - -	462
Cramb, MacGown v. - - - -	481
Crieff, School Board of, Petitioners, - - - -	1096
Cuming's Trustee v. Cuming, - - - -	153
Daily, Thomson & Co. v. - - - -	1173
Daish, Dessau v. - - - -	976
Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited, M'Fadyen v. - - -	327
Dalziel, Shields v. - - - -	849
Davis v. Cadman, - - - -	297
Dessau v. Daish, - - - -	976
Deveron Fishery Board, Duke of Fife v. - - -	549
Dixon, William, Limited, Mooney v. - - - -	1187
Dixson's Trustees v. Whyte, - - - -	639
Donnison v. Employers' Accident, &c., Insurance Co., - - -	681
Dryburgh v. Gordon, - - - -	1
Duncan, Malcolm v. - - - -	747
Duncan, Rottenburg v. - - - -	35
Duncan's Trustees v. Steven, - - - -	880
Dundee, Magistrates of, Inland Revenue v. - - -	930
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, Lord Saltoun v. - - -	832
Edinburgh Savings Bank, Trustees for, Melrose v. - - -	483
Electric Construction Co. v. Hurry & Young, - - -	312, 525
Elgin, County Council of, v. Magistrates of Elgin, - - -	537
Elgin, County Council of, Local Government Board for Scotland v. - - -	512

INDEX OF NAMES.

vii

Page

Emery, M'Carthy v. - - - - -	610
Employers' Accident, &c., Insurance Co., Donnison v. - - -	681
Employers' Insurance Co., Liquidators of, v. Benton, - - -	908
Farquhar, Aitken v. - - - - -	268
Ferguson, Moncreiffe v. - - - - -	47
Ferguson, Tosh v. - - - - -	54
Ferrie's Curator Bonia, Cowan's Trustees v. - - - - -	590
Ferris v. Cowdenbeath Coal Co., Limited, - - - - -	615
Fife, Duke of, v. George, - - - - -	549
Findlay, Miller's Trustees v. - - - - -	114
Finlay & Wilson, Carruthers' Trustee v. - - - - -	363
Fleming v. Liddesdale District Committee of Roxburgh County Council, - - - - -	281
Forbes & Co., Smith v. - - - - -	699
Forbes, Stewart v. - - - - -	1112
Forrest, Jerdon v. - - - - -	395
Forrest & Turnbull, Scott, Simpson, & Wallis v. - - - - -	877
Fowler, Mackenzie v. - - - - -	1080
Fox and Another (Carruthers' Trustees), - - - - -	238
Fraser, M'Morland's Trustees v. - - - - -	65
Fraser's Trustees, Turner v. - - - - -	673
Free Church of Scotland, General Trustees of the, v. Inland Revenue,	492
Free Church of Scotland, Trustees of, Inland Revenue v. - - -	496
Freer's Trustees v. Freer, - - - - -	437
Galbraith, Riddell v. - - - - -	51
Gardner v. Hay (Heritors of Peebles), - - - - -	293
Geddie, Buttercase & Geddie's Trustee v. - - - - -	1128
Gemmell (Cuming's Trustee) v. Cuming, - - - - -	153
General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, Phillips and Others (Sangster's Trustees) v. - - - - -	56
George, Duke of Fife v. - - - - -	549
Gibson & Co. v. Anderson & Co., - - - - -	556
Gilhooly v. M'Hardy, - - - - -	1185
Glasgow City Corporation, Glasgow Tramway Co. v. - - - - -	628
Glasgow Tramway Co. v. Glasgow City Corporation, - - - - -	628
Glasgow Tramway Co., Limited, M'Laughlin v. - - - - -	992
Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Macindoe, - - -	160
Gordon v. Bruce & Co., - - - - -	844
Gordon, Dryburgh v. - - - - -	1
Govan, Police Commissioners of, v. Airth (Logan's Trustee), - - -	41
Govan Rope and Sail Co., Limited, v. Weir & Co., - - - - -	368
Gow, Burnet v. - - - - -	156
Green or Borthwick v. Borthwick, - - - - -	211
Gregson v. Alsop, - - - - -	1081
Grigor v. Maclean, - - - - -	86
Grime, Stewart, Brown, & Co. v. - - - - -	414
Gunn's Trustee v. Traill's Trustees, - - - - -	837
Haldane v. School Board of Crieff, - - - - -	1096
Hall v. Hubner, - - - - -	875
Hall's Trustee, Robertson v. - - - - -	120
Hamilton's, Duke of, Trustees, v. Woodside Coal Co. - - - - -	294
Hardie, Somerville v. - - - - -	58
Hardie and Others (Waddell's Trustees) v. Waddell, - - - - -	189
Hart, Noble v. - - - - -	174
Hay, Brown's Trustees v. - - - - -	1108
Hay, Gardner v. - - - - -	293
Heddie v. Magistrates of Leith, - - - - -	662

	Page
Henderson, Neilson's Trustees v. - - -	1135
Henderson, Smith v. - - -	1102
Henderson & Sons, Ormond v. - - -	399
Henry v. Strachan & Spence, - - -	1045
Herbert, Cowie Brothers & Co. v. - - -	353
Herbert v. Cowie Brothers & Co., - - -	361
Hogg, Cockburn v. - - -	529
Hogg, Craig v. - - -	6
Hogg, Earl of Lauderdale v. - - -	914
Hood v. Hood, - - -	973
Hope, Clavering, Son, & Co. v. - - -	944
Hubner, Hall v. - - -	875
Hurry & Young, Electric Construction Co. v. - - -	312, 525
Hutchings, Lord Advocate v. - - -	177
Inglis, Robertson & Baxter v. - - -	758
Inland Revenue, Assets Co. Limited, v. - - -	578
Inland Revenue v. Magistrates of Dundee, - - -	930
Inland Revenue, General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. - - -	492
Inland Revenue v. Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland, - - -	496
Inland Revenue, Tod v. - - -	934
Inland Revenue, Wingate & Co. v. - - -	939
Irving, Nelson v. - - -	1054
Jaffray's Trustees v. Milne, - - -	602
Jerdon v. Forrest, - - -	395
Johnston v. The Walker Trustees, - - -	1061
Johnston's Executors v. Johnston, - - -	611
Kidd's Trustees, Paterson v. - - -	99
Kilmarnock, Magistrates of, v. Reid, - - -	388
King v. Barnetson, - - -	81
Kinghorn, Heritors of, v. Magistrates of Kinghorn, - - -	704
Kinneil Cannel and Coking Co., Wilkinson v. - - -	1001
Kirkwood, Smith v. - - -	872
Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., North British Rail- way Co. v. - - -	564
Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., Thomson v. - - -	1025
Lanarkshire (Middle Ward) District Committee v. Marshall, - - -	139
Lauderdale, Earl of, v. Hogg, - - -	914
Laurenson v. Lerwick Police Commissioners, - - -	135
Law-Agents, Incorporated Society of, v. Purves, - - -	394
Lawson v. Wilkie, - - -	649
Leith Local Marine Board, Board of Trade v. - - -	177
Leith, Magistrates of, Heddle v. - - -	662
Leith, Magistrates of, Lindsay v. - - -	867
Leith, Magistrates of, Macgregor v. - - -	971
Leitrim, Countess of, v. G. & J. Burns, - - -	993
Lerwick Police Commissioners, Laurenson v. - - -	135
Liddesdale District Committee of Roxburgh County Council, Fleming v. - - -	281
Lindsay v. Magistrates of Leith, - - -	867
Lindsay & Son v. Scholefield, - - -	530
Local Government Board for Scotland v. County Council of Elgin, - - -	512
Lochhead, M'Callum v. - - -	26
Logan's Trustee, Police Commissioners of Govan v. - - -	41
London Assurance Corporation, M'Elroy v. - - -	287
London Scottish American Trust, Limited, Arizona Copper Co., Limited v. - - -	658
Macaskill v. M'Leod, - - -	999

INDEX OF NAMES.

ix

	Page
M'Callum v. Lochhead, - - - -	26
M'Carthy v. Emery, - - - -	610
M'Elroy v. London Assurance Corporation, - -	287
M'Fadyen v. Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited, -	327
M'Farlane v. M'Farlane's Trustees, - - - -	574
Macfie v. Callander and Oban Railway Co., - -	1156
MacGown v. Cramb, - - - -	481
Macgregor v. Magistrates of Leith, - - - -	971
M'Hardy, Gilhooly v. - - - -	1185
Macindoe, Glasgow Yoker and Clydebank Railway Co. v.	160
M'Intosh v. Waddell, - - - -	80
M'Inulty v. Primrose, - - - -	442
Mackay, - - - -	210
Mackay v. John Watson, Limited, - - - -	383
Mackay's Trustees v. Mackay's Trustees, - -	904
M'Kellar, Wilson v. - - - -	254
Mackenzie v. Fowler, - - - -	1080
M'Kie's Tutor v. M'Kie, - - - -	526
Mackinnon, Smyth v. - - - -	1086
Mackinnon's Trustees v. Macneil, - - - -	981
M'Knight, Paton v. - - - -	554
Macknight, Russell v. - - - -	118
M'Laren's Trustee v. The National Bank of Scotland, Limited,	920
M'Laughlin v. Glasgow Tramway Co., Limited, -	992
Maclean, Grigor v. - - - -	86
Maclean and Others (Macleish's Trustees), - -	151
Maclean's Trustees v. Maclean, - - - -	988
Macleish's Trustees, - - - -	151
M'Leod, Macaskill v. - - - -	999
M'Morland's Trustees v. Fraser, - - - -	65
M'Murdo's Trustees v. M'Murdo, - - - -	458
Macneill, Mackinnon's Trustees v. - - - -	981
Macredie, Ship "Blairmore" Co., Limited, v. -	893
Malcolm v. Duncan, - - - -	747
Marshall v. Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited,	33, 712
Marshall, District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanark v.	139
Marshall's Trustees, Petitioners, - - - -	478
Melrose v. Trustees for Edinburgh Savings Bank, -	483
Melrose District Committee, County Council of Roxburgh v.	657
Melville v. Park and Others (Noble's Trustees), -	243
Millar's Trustees v. Polson, - - - -	1038
Miller's Trustees v. Findlay, - - - -	114
Milne, Brown's Trustees v. - - - -	1139
Milne, Jaffray's Trustee v. - - - -	602
Milne & Sons, Rae v. - - - -	165
Mitchell and Others (M'Morland's Trustees) v. Fraser, -	65
Moncreiffe v. Ferguson, - - - -	47
Morrison v. Smith & Co., - - - -	471
Mooney v. William Dixon, Limited, - - - -	1187
Muirden and Another (Atherstone's Trustees), -	39
Murray v. Rennie & Angus, - - - -	965, 1026
National Bank of Scotland, Limited, M'Laren's Trustee v.	920
Neill's Trustees, Wood (Smith's Factor) v. - -	105
Neilson's Trustees v. Henderson, - - - -	1135
Neish's Trustees v. Neish, - - - -	306
Nelson v. Irving, - - - -	1054
Newton-on-Ayr, Magistrates of, Rainie v. - -	606
Nisbet, Petitioner, - - - -	411

	Page
Niven v. Ayr Harbour Trustees, - - -	883
Noble v. Hart, - - -	174
Noble's Trustees, Melville v. - - -	243
North British Grain Storage, &c., Co., North British Railway Co. v. -	687
North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., - - -	564
North British Railway Co. v. North British Grain Storage and Transit Co., -	687
North British Railway Co., The Park Yard Co., Limited, v. -	1148
Northern Accident Insurance Co., A B v. - - -	258
Obers v. Paton's Trustees, - - -	719
Ogilvie, Assets Co., Limited, v. - - -	400
Ormond v. Henderson & Sons, - - -	399
Orphoot, Petitioner, - - -	871
Paolo v. Parias, - - -	1030
Parias, Paolo v. - - -	1030
Park, Dobson, & Co., Robertson v. - - -	30
Park Yard Co., Limited, v. North British Railway Co., -	1148
Paterson, Chalmers v. - - -	1020
Paterson v. Kidd's Trustees, - - -	99
Paterson's Judicial Factor v. Paterson's Trustees, -	499
Paton v. M'Knight, - - -	554
Paton's Trustees, Obers v. - - -	719
Peebles, Minister of, v. Heritors of Peebles, - - -	293
Perth, Parish Council of, Brechin Parish Council v. -	587
Phillips and Others (Sangster's Trustees) v. General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, - - -	56
Polson, Millar's Trustees v. - - -	1038
Primrose, M'Inulty v. - - -	442
Purves, Incorporated Society of Law-Agents v. - - -	394
Rae v. Milne & Sons, - - -	165
Rainie v. Magistrates of Newton-on-Ayr, - - -	606
Reid, Magistrates of Kilmarnock v. - - -	388
Rennie & Angus, Murray v. - - -	965, 1026
Riddell v. Galbraith, - - -	51
Robertson, Turner v. - - -	673
Robertson v. Park, Dobson, & Co., - - -	30
Robertson v. Walker (Hall's Trustee), - - -	120
Robertson & Baxter v. Inglis, - - -	758
Robertson & Co. v. Bird & Co. - - -	1076
Robertson v. Hall's Trustee, - - -	120
Roissard v. Scott's Trustees, - - -	861
Ross v. Ross, - - -	1029
"Rossgull," The, v. The "Spaniel," - - -	993
Rottenburg v. Duncan, - - -	35
Roxburgh, County Council of, v. Melrose District Committee, -	657
Russell v. Banknock Coal Co., - - -	1009
Russell v. Bell's Trustees, - - -	666
Russell v. Macknight, - - -	118
Rutherglen, Magistrates of, White v. - - -	446
Rutherglen Parish Council, Blantyre Parish Council v. -	695
Rutherglen Parish Council, Shotts Parish Council v. -	169
Saltoun, Lord, v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, - - -	832
Sangster's Trustees v. General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, - - -	56
Scholefield, Lindsay & Son v. - - -	530
Scott v. Craig's Representatives, - - -	462
Scott, Simpson, & Wallis v. Forrest & Turnbull, - - -	877

INDEX OF NAMES.

xi

Page

Scott's Trustees, Roissard v.	-	-	-	861
Shields v. Dalziel,	-	-	-	849
Ship "Blairmore" Co., Limited, v. Macredie,	-	-	-	893
Shirres' Trustees, Assets Co., Limited, v.	-	-	-	418
Shotts Parish Council v. Bothwell and Rutherglen Parish Councils,	-	-	-	169
Sibson & Kerr v. "Barcraig" Ship Co., Limited,	-	-	-	91
Simpson, Barkley & Sons v.	-	-	-	346
Sinclair, Chalmers' Trustees v.	-	-	-	1047
Skinner and Furriers, Incorporation of, in Edinburgh v. Baxter's Heir,	-	-	-	744
Smith v. Forbes & Co.,	-	-	-	699
Smith v. Henderson,	-	-	-	1102
Smith v. Kirkwood,	-	-	-	872
Smith's Factor v. Neill's Trustees,	-	-	-	105
Smith & Co., Morrison v.	-	-	-	471
Smyth v. Caledonian Railway Co.,	-	-	-	488
Smyth v. Mackinnon,	-	-	-	1086
Soeder v. Soeder,	-	-	-	278
Somerville v. Hardie,	-	-	-	58
"Spaniel," The, The "Roessgull" v.	-	-	-	993
Steven, Duncan's Trustees v.	-	-	-	880
Stewart, British Workman's Assurance Co. v.	-	-	-	624
Stewart v. Forbes,	-	-	-	1112
Stewart, Brown, & Co. v. Grime,	-	-	-	414
Strachan & Spence, Henry v.	-	-	-	1045
Sutherland, Clark v.	-	-	-	183, 821
Sydney and Another (Allan's Trustees),	-	-	-	238, 718
Tait (Buttercase & Geddies' Trustee) v. Geddies,	-	-	-	1128
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons,	-	-	-	198
Thomson, Lord Advocate v.	-	-	-	543
Thomson v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company,	-	-	-	1025
Thomson v. Thomson,	-	-	-	269
Thomson & Co. v. Daily,	-	-	-	1173
Tod v. Inland Revenue,	-	-	-	934
Todd v. Wood,	-	-	-	1104
Tosh v. Ferguson,	-	-	-	54
Torrance v. Traill's Trustees,	-	-	-	837
Trade, Board of, v. Leith Local Marine Board,	-	-	-	177
Traill's Trustees, Torrance v.	-	-	-	837
Turner v. Fraser's Trustees,	-	-	-	673
Turner's Trustees v. Turner,	-	-	-	619
Waddell & Son, Burns v.	-	-	-	325
Waddell, M'Intosh v.	-	-	-	80
Waddell v. Whyte,	-	-	-	677
Waddell's Trustees v. Waddell,	-	-	-	189
Walker Trustees, The, Johnston v.	-	-	-	1061
Walker (Hall's Trustee), Robertson v.	-	-	-	120
Warwick v. Caledonian Railway Co.,	-	-	-	429
Watson, Watt v.	-	-	-	330
Watson, John, Limited, Mackay v.	-	-	-	383
Watt v. Watson,	-	-	-	330
Weir & Co., Govan Rope and Sail Co., Limited, v.	-	-	-	368
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate,	-	-	-	216
White v. Magistrates of Rutherglen,	-	-	-	446
Whitehead's Trustees v. Whitehead,	-	-	-	1032
Whitson v. Blairgowrie District Committee,	-	-	-	519
Whyte, Dixon's Trustees v.	-	-	-	639
Whyte, Waddell v.	-	-	-	677

	Page
Wilkie, Lawson v. - - - - -	649
Wilkinson v. Kinneil Cannel and Coking Co., - - - - -	1001
Wilson v. M'Kellar, - - - - -	254
Wingate & Co. v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	939
Wood v. Neill's Trustees, - - - - -	105
Wood, Todd v. - - - - -	1104
Woodside Coal Co., Duke of Hamilton's Trustees v. - - - - -	294
Wordie's Trustees, Baikie v. - - - - -	1098
Wotherspoons v. Brescia Mining, &c., Co., Limited, - - - - -	207

REGISTRATION APPEAL CASES.

Bell v. Galt, - - - - -	374
Borrie, Wallace v. - - - - -	376
Galt, Bell v. - - - - -	374
Kellie v. Little, - - - - -	379
Laing, Wood v. - - - - -	382
Little, Kellie v. - - - - -	379
Wallace v. Borrie, - - - - -	376
Wood v. Laing, - - - - -	382

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL CASES.

Aberdeenshire, Assessor for, Irvine v. - - - - -	741
Ayr, Assessor for, M'Lachlan v. - - - - -	734
Gartverrie Fireclay Co. v. Assessor for Lanark, - - - - -	738
Irvine v. Assessor for Aberdeenshire, - - - - -	741
Lanark, Assessor for, Gartverrie Fireclay Co. v. - - - - -	738
Mackay v. Assessor for Sutherland, - - - - -	737
M'Lachlan v. Assessor for Ayr, - - - - -	734
Sutherland, Assessor for, Mackay v. - - - - -	737

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Advocate, H. M., Dickie v. - - - - -	82
Advocate, H. M., Sangster v. - - - - -	3
Advocate, H. M., Taylor v. - - - - -	65
Aitchison v. Neilson, - - - - -	44

INDEX OF NAMES.

xiii

	Page
Barrowman, M'Callum v. - - - -	15
Beattie, Cockett v. - - - -	62
Beattie, Martin v. - - - -	21
Bryce, Weir v. - - - -	42
Burns v. Williamson, - - - -	58
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ramsay, - - - -	48
Campbell v. Neilson, - - - -	28
Cockett v. Beattie, - - - -	62
Collison v. Mitchell, - - - -	52
Cormack v. Mackenzie, - - - -	36
Craig v. Tarras, - - - -	88
Dickie v. H. M. Advocate, - - - -	82
Drummond v. Macmillan, - - - -	1
Dunsmore v. Threshie, - - - -	73
Emslie v. Paterson, - - - -	77
Fowler v. Hodge, - - - -	17
Frew v. Morris, - - - -	50
Fyfe, Morton v. - - - -	9
Gemmell v. Weir, - - - -	23
Hodge, Fowler v. - - - -	17
Jackson v. Stevenson, - - - -	38
Linton, Sime v. - - - -	70
M'Callum v. Barrowman, - - - -	15
Mackenzie, Cormack v. - - - -	36
Macmillan, Drummond v. - - - -	1
Main, White v. - - - -	90
Maitland, Richardson v. - - - -	32
Martin v. Beattie, - - - -	21
Mitchell, Collison v. - - - -	52
Morison v. Stubbs, - - - -	61
Morris, Frew v. - - - -	50
Morton v. Fyfe, - - - -	9
Neilson, Aitchison v. - - - -	44
Neilson, Campbell v. - - - -	28
Paterson, Emslie v. - - - -	77
Ramsay, Caledonian Railway Co. v. - - - -	48
Richardson v. Maitland, - - - -	32
Sangster v. H. M. Advocate, - - - -	3
Sime v. Linton, - - - -	70
Stevenson, Jackson v. - - - -	38
Stubbs, Morison v. - - - -	61
Tarras, Craig v. - - - -	88
Taylor v. H. M. Advocate, - - - -	65
Thomson, Whyte v. - - - -	55
Threshie, Dunsmore v. - - - -	73
Weir v. Bryce, - - - -	42
Weir, Gemmell v. - - - -	23
White v. Main, - - - -	90
Whyte v. Thomson, - - - -	55
Williamson, Burns v. - - - -	58

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

	Page
Aberdeen Tramways Co., Ogston v. -	8
Advocate, Lord, v. Fleming or Robertson, -	42
Currie v. M'Knight, - - - -
Fleming, Lord Advocate v. - - - -	42
M'Knight, Currie v. - - - -
M'Nab v. Robertson, - - - -	34
North British Railway Co. v. North-Eastern Railway Co., -	19
North-Eastern Railway Co., North British Railway Co. v. -	19
Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., - - - -	8
Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, - - - -	44
Robertson, Lord Advocate v. - - - -	42
Robertson, M'Nab v. - - - -	34
Ross, Perth General Station Committee v. - - - -	44

ERRATA.

P. 105, line 4, for "attached" read "attaches."

P. 865, note 2, for "Hayley v. Baxendale, 1854, W. II. & G. Exch. Rep. 341," read "Hadley v. Baxendale, 1854, 9 W. H. & G. (Exch. Rep.) 341."

P. 866, note, lines 8 and 9, for "Hayley v. Baxendale, 6 Exch. 341," read "Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341."

P. 875, line 10, for "pursuer's" read "defender's."

VOL. XXIII.—JUSTICIARY CASES.

P. 87, line 8 from foot, for "Procurator in Justice of Peace Court, Paisley," read "Procurator-Fiscal in Justice of Peace Court, Greenock."

P. 88, line 7 from top, for "Police Court," read "Justice of Peace Court."

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1896-97.

JOHN CURRIE (Owner of s.s. "Easdale") (Claimant), Appellant.— No. 1.
Walton, Q.C.—A. S. D. Thomson.

M'KNIGHT'S EXECUTORS (Mortgagees of s.s. "Dunlossit") (Claimants), Nov. 16, 1896.
Currie v. M'Knight.
 Respondents.—Lord Adv. Murray—Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C.

Ship—Maritime lien for damage—Foreign.—The maritime law of Scotland is the same as that of England.

Although the maritime law of Great Britain creates a lien over a vessel for damage caused by the vessel, there is no lien for damage caused by the crew if the vessel itself is not the instrument doing the damage.

"The Bold Buccleugh" (1851), 7 Moore, P. C. 267, approved.

(In the Court of Session, May 24, 1895, 22 R. 607.)

On 17th November 1893, while the s.s. "Dunlossit" lay moored to the quay at Port Askaig, in the island of Islay, the s.s. "Easdale" was moored to the quay outside the "Dunlossit" by ropes crossing the stem and stern of the "Dunlossit." During the night a gale arose, and the master of the "Dunlossit," to enable him to put to sea for safety, cut the moorings of the "Easdale," which in consequence drifted, and was injured. Currie, the owner of the "Easdale," subsequently obtained a decree for damages against the owners of the "Dunlossit," on the ground that the cutting of the ropes was illegal.

Ld. Chancellor
 (Halsbury).
 Lord Watson.
 Ld. Herschell.
 Lord Morria.
 Lord Shand.

The "Dunlossit" having been judicially sold, in a competition between M'Knight, the holder of a mortgage over the "Dunlossit," and Currie, as owner of the "Easdale," the Sheriff found that the latter had a maritime lien over the "Dunlossit" for the damage sustained by his vessel, and ranked him preferably to the mortgagee.

In an appeal the Second Division held, assuming that by the law of Scotland there was a lien, that in the circumstances the lien did not apply, a majority of the Judges (Lord Rutherford Clark reserving his opinion) further holding that by the law of Scotland no lien attaches to a ship for damage wrongfully done by it to another vessel, and that the mortgagee had a preferable claim.

Currie, the owner of the "Easdale," appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is a claim to establish a maritime lien against the ship "Dunlossit" by reason of damage sustained by another vessel under circumstances which it is necessary to state briefly to see whether the claim is sustainable.

The crew of the "Dunlossit," in order to enable that ship to get to sea, cut the cables of another vessel, the "Easdale." This proceeding on the

No. 1. part of the crew I will assume for this purpose to have been an unlawful act, and subjecting those responsible for the acts of the crew of the "Dunlossit" to a liability for the damage suffered by the "Easdale." But there seems to me to be no connection between the damage to the "Easdale" and any act or thing done by the "Dunlossit." That the act done was done in order to enable the "Dunlossit" to start does not make it an act of the "Dunlossit." That it was done by the crew of the "Dunlossit" does not make it an act of the "Dunlossit"; and the phrase that it must be the fault of the ship itself is not a mere figurative expression, but it imports, in my opinion, that the ship against which a maritime lien for damages is claimed is the instrument of mischief, and that in order to establish the liability of the ship itself to the maritime lien claimed some act of navigation of the ship itself should either mediately or immediately be the cause of the damage.

Nov. 16, 1896.
Currie v.
M'Knight.

I am, therefore, of opinion that it would be impossible, in an English Court of Admiralty, to maintain that the injury suffered by the "Easdale" gave rise to a maritime lien any more than if the master of the "Dunlossit" had unlawfully taken away some of the "Easdale's" property.

Having arrived at this conclusion, I am not certain that to discuss the other matters involved in this appeal is not outside any question properly arising here. If the judgment had been the other way, it would have been necessary to discuss whether the law which prevails in England prevails also in Scotland.

I cannot doubt that on such questions it is the law of Great Britain that prevails, and that Scottish Admiralty Courts and English Admiralty Courts administer the same law. The Admiralty law, as we know it, differs from the common law of England, and the common law of Scotland differs from the common law of England. But the reason is obvious—the laws of England and Scotland were derived from different sources in respect of these two branches of the law. The Admiralty laws were derived both by Scotland and England from the same source; and as it is said by no mean authority that the Admiralty law was derived from the laws of Oleron, supplemented by the civil law, it would be strange, as well as in the highest degree inconvenient, if a different maritime law prevailed in two different parts of the same island.

I only wish to add, that I think the case of "The Bold Buccleugh,"¹ in the Privy Council, was well decided. Its authority, I think, has never been shaken, and I should be sorry to see at this distance of time anything done which would weaken its authority.

I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The steamship "Dunlossit" was sold under a warrant issuing from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at the instance of Samuel M'Knight, a mortgagee, now deceased, whose executors have been made respondents in this appeal. The price of the vessel having been paid into Court, a competition arose between the mortgagee and the present appellant, who holds a decree for damages against the registered owners of the "Dunlossit" in respect of which he claims a preferable lien attaching to the proceeds of her judicial sale as a surrogatum for the ship. No. 1.

The findings of the decree upon which the appellant's claim is founded shew that during a night in November 1893 three vessels were moored alongside of an open quay at Port Askaig, in the Sound of Islay, where there is no harbour. The "Dunlossit" was in the centre of the tier, the steamship "Easdale," belonging to the appellant, being outside of her, and moored to the quay by cables passing over the deck of the "Dunlossit." Nov. 16, 1896.
Currie v.
M'Knight.

There was a gale of exceptional violence during the night, which made the position of the vessels very insecure. In the morning the crew of the "Dunlossit," which was in serious peril of damage from contact with the vessels between which she lay, and the possibility of another vessel moored in front of her coming into collision with her, got up steam, and, after notice of their intention, cut the mooring ropes of the "Easdale," and stood out to sea. The "Easdale" was short-handed owing to the defection of two of her crew, and, being unable to get up steam, was driven ashore and damaged. The master of the "Dunlossit" acted solely for the protection of his ship against present and possible damage. The First Division of the Court, reversing the decision of the Sheriff-substitute, held that the cutting of the "Easdale's" ropes by the crew of the "Dunlossit" was a wrongful act, for which her owners were responsible. That decree is final, and I have no right to express, and am not to be understood as expressing, any opinion with regard to its merits.

The Sheriff-substitute in the present suit sustained the appellant's claim, being of opinion that, in the sense of law, the proceedings of the "Dunlossit" crew constituted an act of the ship which was sufficient to create a maritime lien for the damage thereby occasioned to the "Easdale." His decision was reversed, on appeal, by the Second Division of the Court of Session, who dismissed the claim. Three of the learned Judges held that, according to the law of Scotland, no lien attaches to a ship for damage wrongfully done by her to another vessel, whether by collision or otherwise. Lord Rutherford Clark abstained from expressing any opinion upon that point, which did not appear to him to arise for decision. All of the learned Judges held that, assuming the same right of lien to exist in Scotland as in England, the injuries suffered by the "Easdale" were not due to the fault of the "Dunlossit" as a ship.

Both these grounds of judgment involve considerations, not of municipal but of maritime law. Had they been confined to the second point, I should have seen no reason to differ. But the first point is one of considerable importance to the shipping community, and I am unable to concur in the views which were expressed with regard to it by the majority of the Court.

From the earliest times the Courts of Scotland exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty causes have disregarded the municipal rules of Scottish law, and have invariably professed to administer the law and customs of the sea generally prevailing among maritime states. In later times, with the growth of British shipping, the Admiralty law of England has gradually acquired predominance, and resort has seldom been had to the laws of other states for the guidance of the Courts. Mr Bell, who wrote more than sixty years ago, states (2 Comm. 6th edit. p. 500) that the decisions which

No. 1.

Nov. 16, 1896.
Currie v.
M'Knight.

were at that time of the greatest authority in Scottish Maritime Courts were those of the High Court of Admiralty of England. His statement is fully borne out by the authorities, to three of which I think it sufficient to refer. In 1788 the Court of Session, in a case relating to lien for furnishings made to a ship (Wood v. Hamilton),¹ ordered the opinion of English counsel to be taken to ascertain the practice of England in such cases, and thereafter gave judgment in accordance with that opinion, although it was contrary to previous decisions of their own Court, and their judgment was affirmed by this House.² In the well-known case of *Hay v. Le Neve*³ the Court of Session followed what they understood to be the rule of the English Admiralty Court; and in moving the reversal of their judgment Lord Gifford, who delivered the opinion of the House, said,—“We are here on the law of the Admiralty of England.”⁴ In *Boettcher v. Carron Company*⁴ the identity of the maritime law of Scotland with that of England was distinctly proclaimed by the late Lord President Inglis, then Lord Justice-Clerk, who was certainly not disposed to accept English law in any case where it differed from the law of Scotland. After referring to various causes which had contributed to produce that identity, his Lordship observed,—“It would be very surprising if, at the present day, ships enjoying the privileges and subject to the conditions of British registry should sail from the ports of the United Kingdom under the same flag, and subject to the same statutory regulations in all respects, and yet that, in cases of collision, the legal rights of the parties might vary according as the case might be tried in one British Admiralty Court or another.”

It does not appear to me to be doubtful that if the “Dunlossit” had been so negligently navigated as to run into and sink the “Easdale” she would, in the absence of contributory fault by the “Easdale,” have been subject to a lien for the damage occasioned to the latter vessel in any English port; whereas, according to the law laid down in this case, no such lien would have attached to her in a Scottish harbour. That such a conflict should be possible is inconsistent with the views expressed by the late Lord President in Boettcher v. Carron Company,⁴ and also with the maritime code which ought to prevail in both countries, which, in my opinion, is neither English nor Scottish, but British law. That there may be conflicting decisions by the Courts of the two countries is possibly unavoidable, seeing that different conclusions may be arrived at even by Courts of the same country administering the same law; and I do not mean to suggest that a Scottish Admiralty Court is less free to examine the merits of an English authority than an English Court is to estimate the value of a Scottish decision, and to accept or reject it according to its own view of the law maritime. But it does not follow that the law either is or ought to be different in the two countries. This House has now become the ultimate forum in all maritime causes arising in the United Kingdom, and as your Lordships are, in my opinion, bound to apply one and the same law to the decision of all such cases, your judgments upon a proper maritime question, whether given in an English or in a Scottish appeal, must be of equal authority in all the Admiralty Courts of the Kingdom.

¹ Mor. Dict. 6269.

² 2 Sh. App. p. 403.

³ 3 Pat. App. p. 148.

⁴ 23 D. p. 331.

"The Bold Buccleugh,"¹ which was decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, affirming the judgment of Dr Lushington, is the earliest English authority which distinctly establishes the doctrine that in a case of actual collision between two ships, if one of them only is to blame, she must bear a maritime lien for the amount of the damage sustained by the other, which has priority, not only to the interest of her owner, but of her mortgagees. The principle of that decision has been adopted in the American Courts, and in the Admiralty Court of England it has for nearly forty years been followed in a variety of cases in which lien for damage done by the ship has been preferred to claims for salvage and seamen's wages, and upon bottomry bonds. In my opinion, the substantial question which your Lordships have to determine in this case is whether "The Bold Buccleugh"¹ was decided according to the maritime law of Britain. If it was, the rule which it lays down must apply to all maritime causes of a similar kind arising in the Courts of Scotland.

No. 1.

Nov. 16, 1896.

Currie v.
M'Knight.

It is unquestionably within the authority of this House to reconsider, and, if necessary, to overrule, the judgment of the Judicial Committee in "The Bold Buccleugh";¹ but it is no less clear that the opinions of the eminent Judges who took part in the decision of that case ought not to be disregarded without good cause shewn. To my mind their reasoning is satisfactory, and the result at which they arrived appears to me to be not only consistent with the principles of general maritime law, but to rest upon plain considerations of commercial expediency. The great increase which has taken place in the number of sea-going ships propelled by steam-power at high rates of speed has multiplied to such an extent the risk and occurrence of collisions, that it has become highly expedient, if not necessary, to interpret the rules of maritime liability in the manner best fitted to secure careful and prudent navigation. And, in my opinion, it is a reasonable and salutary rule that when a ship is so carelessly navigated as to occasion injury to other vessels which are free from blame, the owners of the injured craft should have a remedy against the corpus of the offending ship, and should not be restricted to a personal claim against her owners, who may have no substantial interest in her and may be without the means of making due compensation.

The other point as to which the learned Judges of the Second Division were unanimous relates to the limits of the shipping rule which was followed in the case of "The Bold Buccleugh."¹ I think it is of the essence of the rule that the damage in respect of which a maritime lien is admitted must be either the direct result or the natural consequence of a wrongful act or manœuvre of the ship to which it attaches. Such an act or manœuvre is necessarily due to the want of skill or negligence of the persons by whom the vessel is navigated, but it is, in the language of maritime law, attributed to the ship because the ship in their negligent or unskilful hands is the instrument which causes the damage. In the present case, according to the findings of fact contained in the decree of the First Division, the injuries sustained by the "Easdale" were not owing to any movement of the "Dunlossit," they were wholly occasioned by an act of the "Dun-

¹ 7 Moore, P. C. 267.

- No. 1. Dunlossit's crew, not done in the course of her navigation, but for the purpose of removing an obstacle which prevented her from starting on her voyage.
- Nov. 16, 1896. I am therefore of opinion that upon the second of these grounds the inter-
Currie v. locutor appealed from ought to be affirmed.
M'Knight.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The question raised by the appeal is whether the appellant is entitled to a maritime lien upon the vessel "Dunlossit" (or her proceeds), of which the original respondent, M'Knight, was the mortgagee.

In November 1893 the vessels "Dunlossit" and "Easdale" were lying alongside one another at Port Askaig Pier, Islay. A heavy gale was raging, which the "Easdale" was unable or unwilling to face; the master of the "Dunlossit," being anxious to put to sea and being unable to induce the master of the "Easdale" to let go his moorings, cut them and sent her adrift. The result was that the "Easdale" drifted ashore and was damaged. The owner of the "Easdale," having obtained judgment against the owners of the "Dunlossit" for the amount of the damage thus sustained, sought by the present proceedings to maintain a maritime lien on the "Dunlossit" in respect of the damage done to the "Easdale" owing to the act of the master of the "Dunlossit." I entirely agree with the Court below in thinking that no such lien can be sustained.

In the Admiralty Court in England a maritime lien has frequently been enforced, in cases of collision, against the vessel which was in fault, but no case could be cited which was at all similar to the present one. In all the cases referred to the damage had been caused either by a collision with the vessel which was to blame, or by that vessel having driven the other into collision with some third vessel or other object. The doctrine was originally asserted in cases of damage by collision with the vessel which was declared subject to the lien. It has since been applied in cases in which the damage did not result from a collision with the vessel in fault, but in which, owing to the negligent navigation of that vessel, the injured ship was driven into collision with some other vessel or object. Whether the circumstances have always warranted the conclusions arrived at, it is not necessary to inquire. I express no opinion upon the point, but the ground of the decision was in all cases this, that the vessel on which the lien was enforced had, in maritime language, done the damage. Here the "Dunlossit" did no damage. It was not by reason of the negligent navigation of that vessel that the disaster occurred. It arose simply from the wrongful act of the master in cutting the "Easdale" adrift. I am not prepared to extend the doctrine of maritime lien to such a case.

In the Court below three of the learned Judges held that the doctrine of maritime lien which exists in England in cases of collision is unknown in the law of Scotland. I entirely agree with the late Lord President Inglis, that much as the law of Scotland differs from that of England in many respects, the Admiralty law is the same in the two countries. The Courts of Scotland are, of course, not bound by the decision of an English Admiralty Court in any new case that arises. But, taking it to be established that the Admiralty law of the two countries is the same, they would no doubt hesitate to differ from a long course of decisions by English Admiralty Courts of high authority. I think it right to add, as the matter is of much practical importance, that, in my opinion, the doctrine of maritime lien in cases of collision is, within the limits to which I have adverted, too well established to be now questioned.

No. 1.

Nov. 16, 1896.
Currie v.
M'Knight.

LORD MORRIS.—I am also of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from should be affirmed, for the reasons that have been assigned by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson in his judgment, which I have had the advantage of reading.

LORD SHAND.—After what has been said by your Lordships, it is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts which gave rise to the claim of damages on the part of the owner of the steamer "Easdale" against the owners of the "Dunlossit," which is the basis of the claim of lien maintained in this action. In a former action between these respective owners it seems to have been held by the Sheriff-substitute that in the position in which the "Dunlossit" was, lying moored to the quay of Port Askaig, on 17th November 1893, when a gale of exceptional violence occurred causing serious peril of considerable damage, those on board of her were entitled to require the persons in charge of the "Easdale" to remove the moorings of that vessel so as to allow the "Dunlossit" to go out to sea, and that, as the request to do this was refused, the crew of the "Dunlossit" were entitled to cut the moorings, and that the owners of the "Dunlossit" were not liable for the damage resulting to the "Easdale." This judgment was reversed by the First Division of the Court of Session, by whom it was held that the owners of the "Dunlossit" were responsible for the act of the captain in cutting the moorings of the "Easdale," and for the damage which resulted to that vessel, which was subsequently ascertained to amount to £407, 4s. 6d. No appeal was taken against this judgment, and this House is not therefore called on, or indeed in a position, to express any opinion on the question thus decided. The appellant holds a final decree against the owners of the "Dunlossit," and the question raised is whether in the circumstances he has in virtue of this decree a lien against the proceeds of sale of the ship which entitles him to be ranked preferably to the mortgagees.

I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the appellant has failed to establish any such right of lien. For the reasons fully stated by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and having regard to the authorities in the law of Scotland referred to by him—the maritime law to be applied in questions like the present—Admiralty questions—is, I think, the same in Scotland as in this country. I do not say that the Courts in Scotland are bound to accept a decision, not of this House, but given in other Courts in this country, as binding on them, or to give effect to these decisions unless they agree in thinking they are based upon sound and conclusive reasoning; but the greatest weight ought certainly to be given to a course of decisions in the Admiralty Courts in England, which has established a principle or rule of frequent application, for reasons which have commended themselves to many different Judges. Thus, if the lien here claimed had arisen because of a collision occasioned by the fault of those navigating the "Dunlossit" in the course of navigation, I should say that the English authorities and the rule which these have so long established should be conclusive in a case occurring in Scotland, and that the evil referred to by the Lord Justice-Clerk

No. 1. Inglis in Boettcher's case¹ of having conflicting rules applied in two different parts of the kingdom in maritime matters and in circumstances of frequent occurrence, should be avoided. If, then, this had been a case of collision caused by the fault exclusively of the "Dunlossit" as the offending ship, I should have had no difficulty in holding that the lien contended for existed. The learned Sheriff-substitute, Mr Balfour, in his judgment, has clearly and ably stated every consideration to support the view that the principle which has been applied in cases of collision ought to support the lien here claimed; but it seems to me, though I think the question is one not free from difficulty, that the act of the master in cutting the mooring ropes of the "Easdale" while attached to the pier, and so sending her adrift, does not make the "Dunlossit" an offending ship in the course of navigation, or the instrument which caused the damage, which seems to have been the test applied in all the cases which have hitherto occurred.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

THOMAS COOPER & CO.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.

No. 2. JAMES OGSTON (Complainer), Appellant.—D.-F. Asher, Q.C.—Haldane, Q.C.—Abel.
 Dec. 14, 1896. THE ABERDEEN DISTRICT TRAMWAYS COMPANY, Respondents.—
Lord-Adv. Murray—Sir Robert Reid, Q.C.—Dove Wilson.
 Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

Nuisance—Police—Street—Tramways—Snow and Salt—Interdict—Actio popularis.—A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines.

In a suspension and interdict brought by a member of the public to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, the tramway company pleaded that the operations complained of were within their statutory rights.

It was proved that the operations of the tramway company created a nuisance to the complainer and to the public using the streets for horse traffic.

Held (in rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the statutory powers given to the tramway company to use the streets did not authorise them to create a nuisance, and that the complainer was entitled to an interdict against the company removing snow from the tramway lines in certain streets, and from scattering salt, in the manner hitherto practised by them to the nuisance of the complainer and of the public using the streets for the purpose of traffic with horses.

Ld. Chancellor
 (Halsbury).
 Lord Watson.
 Lord Shand.
 Lord Davey.

(IN the Court of Session, Dec. 20, 1895, 23 R. 340.)

James Ogston, of Norwood, manufacturer in Aberdeen, presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Aberdeen District Tramways Company, incorporated by Act of Parliament. The prayer of the note was in these terms:—"To interdict the respondents (1) from removing the snow, hail, slush, or other matter of a like kind, from the lines of tramway running through the public streets or thoroughfares of Aberdeen, on to or upon the sides of the said streets or thoroughfares between the said lines of tramway and the foot-pavements, and in particular from doing so in" certain streets, "or otherwise from so

No. 2.

Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

removing said snow, hail, slush, or other like matter, as in any way to interfere with, interrupt, or impede the traffic along the said streets and thoroughfares, and in particular along "the streets mentioned; and "(2) from putting or scattering upon the said streets and thoroughfares and lines of tramways, or any part thereof, and in particular upon any part of the "streets mentioned, "or the lines of tramways therein, salt, or any other similar substance, or otherwise from doing so in time of frost, or when there is snow or slush on the ground, or to do otherwise," &c.

The complainer averred;—(Stat. 3) "For some years the respondents have been in the habit during the winter months, when snow falls, of shifting the snow from off the tramway lines on to the part of the street unoccupied by them, between the tramway lines and the foot-pavement, piling it up in heaps on the streets along the sides of the lines, and thus causing accumulations of considerable depth. They are also invariably in the habit, whenever there is frost or snow or slush on the streets, of throwing down salt all along the tramway lines and on the whole streets between the said lines and for some distance outside the same, for the purpose of thawing the frost and melting the snow and slush. . . ." (Stat. 4) "These operations for clearing their line of rails and rendering them passable for the tramway cars are a source of great inconvenience and danger to the public and horses using the streets. . . . About Christmas 1894 a severe snowstorm commenced in Aberdeen, and thereafter there was snow in Aberdeen on the ground almost constantly for several weeks . . . and the respondents carried on their operations as described . . . In consequence, there was frequently a freezing mixture of salt and snow, made by the respondents as aforesaid, lying on the streets as deep as the horses' knees. As a result of this, serious injury was repeatedly caused to horses passing along the streets belonging to the complainer and others. . . ."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The respondents having no right to carry on the operations complained of, and the same being illegal, the prayer of the note should be granted. (2) The complainer having suffered and being likely to suffer, serious loss, injury, and damage, by the actings of the respondents, he is entitled to interdict as craved, with expenses.

The respondents stated;—"It is the duty of the Town-council, and not of the respondents, to remove the snow from the streets. The respondents have a statutory right to run their cars, . . ."

The respondents pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (2) The statements of the complainer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the prayer of the note. (3) The statements of the complainer being unfounded in fact, the note should be refused. (4) The operations of the respondents in clearing and keeping clear their lines being within their statutory rights, interdict ought to be refused.

A proof was allowed. The complainer's averments above quoted were proved. It was also proved that if the snow and slush had been removed within a reasonable time after the salt had been used the nuisance would have been obviated.

The following facts were also proved:—In February 1886 the Town-council, after receiving an opinion of counsel, informed the tramway company that they were advised that the practice of sprinkling salt upon the tramway track in times of frost and snow, and of clearing the rails by heaping snow on either side of the track, was unwarrantable and illegal, and they requested the company to discontinue

No. 2.
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

the proceedings, and intimated that if the request was not complied with they would be compelled to have recourse to legal proceedings. In the beginning of 1895 the complainer brought the matter before the Town-council, and requested that they would take proceedings against the respondents. . . . In reply the town-clerk wrote to the complainer's agents on the 8th February 1895 as follows:—"The operation complained of is, as you are aware, not carried out by the Town-council but by the tramway company, and, under these circumstances, I am instructed to inform you that the Town-council repudiate all responsibility with the matter."

The complainer then brought the present note of suspension and interdict against the tramway company. The tramway company then brought the matter before the Town-council, and they made a remit to the streets and roads committee to consider the matter. The committee sent in a report, which was approved by the Council, in which they expressed the opinion that, if the complainer was successful, serious inconvenience would be caused to the public, and recommended that "such members of the Council as may be selected by the company should be authorised to give evidence on behalf of the Council in favour of the respondents."

Accordingly the provost and other members of the Council appeared as witnesses, and gave evidence to the effect that they were now satisfied that it was in the public interest that the respondents should be allowed to clear their lines as they have been in the habit of doing, and that the Council approved of the method adopted by the respondents.

On 28th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the prayer of the note.

The Court adhered.

The complainer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, in this case the appellant, who has a place of business in Loch Street, Aberdeen, complains that the Aberdeen District Tramways Company obstruct the highways in the city of Aberdeen and create a nuisance therein whenever a snowstorm occurs in that city. As to the facts which give rise to the complaint there is no serious dispute, and I do not understand that the Lord Ordinary or the Second Division of the Court of Session entertained any doubt that a serious inconvenience to horse traffic was caused by the acts complained of. It appears that the tramway company, when a snowstorm occurs in Aberdeen, are in the habit of clearing the snow off their track and piling it at the side of their rails. The heaps of snow thus piled are left sometimes for as long a period as a week together; and for the purpose of facilitating their own traffic the tramway company scatter salt, which causes the snow in the grooves of their rails to melt. The mixture thus created flows by gravitation into the heaps of snow already collected at the side, and forms a freezing mixture, which I think it cannot be doubted causes injury to the horses and inconvenience to the traffic wherever and whenever the carriage traffic, other than that of the tramway company themselves, is compelled to force its way through the freezing mixture of salt and snow. It cannot be doubted that unless this can be justified by some legal authority this does constitute a nuisance to the highway.

If the question had arisen in England, I think some doubt might be entertained whether the obstruction as proved was such that a private person could sue without further proof of peculiar damage to himself; but that question does not arise according to the law of Scotland. Mr Ogston is entitled to sue in respect of an interference with the highway, which is applicable to him in common with the rest of Her Majesty's subjects.

No. 2.
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

It is sought to justify the proceeding of the tramway company which I have described by the powers conferred by their Act of Parliament; and if the matters do constitute a nuisance, that is the only justification which is to be found on this record. I am of opinion that the Act of Parliament in question confers upon the respondents no such powers. It gives them the monopoly of using the tramway, where it is laid, with flange-wheels, or other wheels specially adapted to run on a grooved rail, and, except as otherwise specially provided by the Act, the track of the tramway is for all purposes to be and remain a part of the street or road. It is not suggested that, except in respect of the exclusive use to which I have referred, the tramway company have received any express authority to deal with the highways; but it is contended that in time of snow they can only continue the use of their tramway by scattering salt, and that if the municipal authority of Aberdeen were sufficiently prompt in sweeping up and carting away the freezing mixture thus created, the practice might be pursued without inconvenience to anyone. This may be perfectly true; but it is an absolutely untenable proposition that anyone may create a nuisance and shelter themselves from responsibility by suggesting that somebody else is under a legal responsibility to remove it. Each member of the public in turn might claim a right to create a nuisance by removing what was inconvenient to himself, and set up the same defence.

The question would be a very different one if the road authority were the persons sued, and were setting up that the acts complained of were necessarily done in the general interest of the community and in the course of clearing the streets from obstruction. I do not say that such a defence would be certainly complete: it would introduce questions of fact and degree with which I am at present not prepared to deal. That a snowstorm must cause some inconvenience to everyone may be true; but I cannot assent to the argument that a snowstorm in Aberdeen at some period of the winter is an extraordinary and unlooked for convulsion of nature, for which it is unreasonable to suppose that provision should be made; and the examples of Edinburgh and Glasgow would seem to indicate that it is not beyond the resources of civilisation to make such a provision; but, as I have said, I decline to enter into this field of inquiry.

If it were true, as the Lord Justice-Clerk assumes, that we were dealing here with what was done necessarily under the sanction of the public authority of the place, a great many of his Lordship's observations would be, I think, very pertinent; but that proposition is absolutely contrary to the fact I have already pointed out, that upon the record no such authority is pleaded. If it had been pleaded I think the proof would have failed—indeed, I think it is distinctly disproved. Not only did the Town-council of Aberdeen make a regulation against the practice, but by their letter of February 1, 1886, they had informed the tramway company that they had been advised that their operations in this respect were unwarrantable and illegal, and that if they did not desist the Council would be compelled to

No. 2.
—
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

take legal proceedings against them. I do not think that the Town-council of Aberdeen have ever altered their position in this respect. It is true that long after this action was raised they deputed three gentlemen to give evidence upon the trial of the action on behalf of the Council in favour of the respondents. What legal operation such a transaction as this may be supposed to effect I am wholly unable to conceive. Adoption is, of course, out of the question. The acts complained of were not done and could not purport to be done under the authority of the Town-council: they were in fact done in absolute defiance of that authority. It is manifest, therefore, that if obstruction of the highway is proved, and a claim to persist in that obstruction insisted on, it is a proper case for interdict.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from should be reversed; and I move your Lordships accordingly. [His Lordship read the order given at the end of the report.]

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, I also am of opinion that the method practised by the respondents of clearing and keeping open their tramway rails whenever there is a fall of snow is attended with injurious consequences, amounting to a legal nuisance, to those members of the public who have occasion to use the streets of Aberdeen for horse traffic. The evidence shews that on these occasions their first step is to clear their track, which is laid along the centre of the street, by means of a snow-plough—an operation which increases the deposit of snow upon the other parts of the street. Their next operation, which is repeated from time to time, is to scatter salt upon their rails and in their vicinity, the object of which is to prevent snow or snow-water from freezing in their grooves. The snow and salt in combination form a wet, briny amalgam, which does not freeze, although its temperature is considerably below the freezing point of water. The briny slush so produced is left on the street, and in course of time it gradually permeates a large portion and sometimes the whole of the street. It is, in my opinion, amply proved that the mixture thus diffused is injurious to horses standing or moving in it, and that its saline element has a direct and noxious effect of its own, if the skin of the animals coming in contact with it has been perforated or abraded.

The respondents have endeavoured to justify these proceedings by advancing a series of propositions, ingenious if not altogether consistent, which I shall notice in detail.

The first of these, which is the only defence stated by them in the record, upon the assumption that the allegations of the appellant have been established, is to the effect that their operations in clearing and keeping clear their lines are “within their statutory rights.” That plea, if well founded, would necessarily afford a good answer to the appellant’s prayer for interdict. But neither the provisions of their special Act nor those of the General Tramways Act of 1870 bear out that contention. Some statutory privileges they do possess which the law does not accord to the general public. They have the right to lay down and to maintain their grooved rails upon the public streets, and to use these rails for the passage of their tramway cars, to which, seeing that they cannot be deviated from the track, other vehicles meeting or passing must give precedence. But the respondents' use of their track is in no other sense exclusive. Any other vehicle which does not run on flanged wheels may use the track and the rails as freely as any other part of the street, whenever and so long as these are not actually occupied by the respondents' cars. Beyond the possession of these privileges, which are all that the statutes confer upon them, the respondents are in no better position, and have no higher right, than the appellant and other persons who use the public highway.

No. 2.
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

The respondents' next proposition was that, even if the operations complained of have not been expressly licensed by the statutes, they are sanctioned by implication, because they are necessary in order to the efficient carrying out of the purposes for which the respondents were incorporated by the Legislature. It was argued that tramway undertakings are authorised by the Legislature in the interest and for the accommodation of a large class of the community, who would be deprived of that accommodation, at times when they most require it, if the respondents were prevented from using the only means by which they can keep their tracks open, and maintain a regular tram-car service during times of snow. The answer to that argument appears to me to be obvious and conclusive. In the first place, the statutes give the respondents no right to create a nuisance, and they have no such right at common law. In the second place, it is not shewn that the nuisance complained of is in any sense necessary. Whilst I have little doubt that there may be other methods equally effective, I think the evidence very strongly suggests that the use of salt is involved in the only known methods which combine cheapness with efficiency. The experience of other cities appears to me to point to that result. But the same experience clearly demonstrates that salt may be effectively employed without occasioning a nuisance. Its injurious consequences may be obviated by the simple expedient of removing from the street, immediately or within a reasonably short time after the application of salt, both the snow and the brine which transforms it into slush. It would, in my opinion, be extravagant to suggest that what can be done and is done, either by the street authority or by the combined action of that authority and the tramway company, in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dundee, becomes an impossibility in the city of Aberdeen.

In the next branch of their argument the respondents accepted, but without admitting, the foregoing conclusion, their object being to shift the origin of the nuisance from themselves to the Town-council of Aberdeen. They maintained, upon that footing, that their use of salt does not necessarily lead to a nuisance, and that any nuisance which may thereby be created is entirely due to the fact that, after salt has been applied, the briny slush which it produces, and the snow which it may come in course of time to affect, are not removed with sufficient expedition. If they were, no injurious consequences would follow. Then it was maintained that the duty of removal rested with the Town-council as the street authority, and that they were chargeable with the creation of the nuisance, which resulted from their want of alacrity in the performance of their statutory duty. I see no reason to doubt that the Town-council, as constituting the road authority, are charged with the removal of snow from the streets under their jurisdiction whenever the fall is so heavy as to obstruct traffic; but I

No. 2.

Dec. 14, 1896.
 Ogston v.
 Aberdeen
 Tramways Co.

am unable to come to the conclusion that their dilatoriness in the performance of that duty will relieve the respondents of responsibility for the consequences of their own operations. The nuisance is ultimately and mainly due to the employment of salt, which is used by them and not by the Town-council. If they choose to employ means which, if certain precautions are not observed, will lead to nuisance, they must first ensure that these precautions will be taken. The Town-council are under no obligation, statutory or otherwise, to counteract the illegal proceedings of the respondents, and it is by no means clear that their delay in removing snow would create any nuisance; whilst it seems certain that, if it had that effect, the nuisance would be of a character different from and less aggravated than that which is complained of.

The last proposition submitted on behalf of the respondents is formulated by the second branch of the fourth reason in their appeal case, which is as follows:—"Because the operations of the respondents are in themselves legal, and are sanctioned by the street-cleansing authority." In the record there is not to be found either a statement of fact, or even a plea in law, calculated to raise the latter contention. The practice, which is becoming too common, of submitting for the consideration of this House points of controversy involving matters of fact which have neither been pleaded nor sent to proof in the Court below is not a commendable one. In the present instance the respondents have this excuse to offer—that the fact of the Town-council having either authorised or acquiesced in these operations, although it was neither pleaded nor remitted to probation, has been accepted and relied on both by the Lord Ordinary and by the Second Division of the Court, upon evidence which was not directed to the point.

The Lord Ordinary (Lord Low), after intimating an opinion that what the respondents have done "is to clear a part of the streets of snow with the acquiescence and approval of the Town-council," comes ultimately to the conclusion "that it is sufficient for the decision of this case that the Town-council have come to be of opinion—and I see no reason to doubt that the opinion has been formed honestly and after due consideration—that it is, upon the whole, in the public interest that the respondents should be allowed to do a part of the work of clearing the streets, by sending the snow-ploughs along the tramway lines, and melting the snow not removed by the ploughs by means of salt. And that that view is not an unreasonable one is, I think, shewn by the fact that the same practice is adopted in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dundee." His Lordship omits to notice that the practice of clearing snow from tramway rails which is followed in Aberdeen differs from that which obtains in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dundee in this essential respect—that in these cities it is carried on under conditions which practically obviate all risk of nuisance.

In like manner the Lord Justice-Clerk, who delivered the opinion of the Second Division, consisting of himself, with Lords Young and Trayner, observed,—“If we were here to express our own opinions as to the propriety of using salt upon the streets, I for one would have very little difficulty in expressing my opinion most emphatically against such a proposition. But we are dealing here also with what is done necessarily under the sanction of the public authority of the place; and if they are of opinion that the only reasonable way of getting the street cleared so as to allow that traffic which Parliament has sanctioned to be kept in operation, I do not think we are the judges at all of whether they are right in that matter or not." Again, in the same connection, his Lordship said,—“They” (i.e. the Town-council) “have the responsibility and duty imposed upon them by the ratepayers of seeing that the roads are properly managed in all circumstances to the best of their ability. If the inhabitants of Aberdeen are of opinion that their affairs in that matter are being mismanaged by the corporation, they have the remedy in their own hands.” The last remark is hardly to the point. The streets of Aberdeen are open to all the inhabitants of the realm, who have the same rights of user as the ratepayers themselves; and it is not a matter of course that the persons aggrieved by a nuisance must be municipal electors.

No. 2.
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

I am unable to concur either in the law which seems to be laid down in these opinions, or in the facts which they assume. So far as the law is concerned, I entertain no doubt that the road authority are invested with large discretionary powers in regard to such matters as the cleaning of the streets and the regulation of traffic upon them, and that a Court of law would decline to interfere with the due exercise of their discretion. But, in my opinion, in the case of a nuisance which the Legislature has not sanctioned, either expressly or by necessary implication, the road authority have no power or discretion either to commit it themselves or to authorise its commission by others. As regards the question of fact, an examination of those parts of the evidence which can be said to have any bearing upon it have satisfied me that the Town-council have not acquiesced in, and have not authorised, the operations complained of.

In dealing with these questions of acquiescence and authority, it is necessary to keep in view that the respondents have all along asserted, and in this suit are still maintaining, their statutory right to do the acts complained of, irrespective of any licence from the street authority. So far back as February 1886 the Town-council, acting upon the advice of counsel and the report of a subcommittee, intimated to the respondents that their operations, in so far as they consisted of sprinkling salt upon their track in times of snow and in clearing their rails by heaping the snow on either side of the track, “were unwarrantable and illegal,” and requested that they should discontinue those proceedings in the future. That intimation was never withdrawn, and the only answer which appears to have been sent to it was one or two letters of remonstrance, accompanied with a number of communications received by the respondents in reply to a circular addressed by them to the secretaries of various tramway companies throughout the country, all of which vindicate the practice of salting, and some of which go so far as to impeach the right of the road authority to interfere with it.

The respondents, in September 1895, sent to the Town-council a copy of the record in this action, which had been closed on May 18, 1895, together with a request that the council should nominate representatives “to give evidence supporting the conduct of the tramway company.” The Council remitted the matter to their streets and roads committee, upon receiving whose report they resolved (1) that such of their members as the respondents should select should give evidence, on behalf of the Council, in favour

No. 2.
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

of the tramway company ; and (2) that a committee be appointed to meet the officials of the company, and to report whether an arrangement could be effected "with the view of having the streets expeditiously cleared during snow-storms." I think the position which was taken up by the Town-council is perfectly intelligible. They were willing to enter into any reasonable arrangement for clearing away the snow and slush which would remove all cause of complaint by the appellant and others ; but they at the same time thought it better that the respondents should maintain at their own hand, and at their own cost, the only plea which they had stated against the merits of the action. It is to my mind a very significant circumstance that, neither in their record nor in any of their communications with the Town-council, is there the slightest suggestion made of acquiescence or authority. The attitude of the Council may savour of north country caution ; but it must be remembered that, if the respondents had succeeded in establishing their plea, the Town-council and the public would have been alike at their mercy.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and that the cause should be remitted to the Second Division of the Court, with directions to grant the appellant an interdict in the terms proposed by the Lord Chancellor. I also think that the appellant ought, as proposed by his Lordship, to have the costs of his appeal in this House, and also the costs in both Courts below.

LORD SHAND.—My Lords, I am also of opinion that the appeal should be allowed in this case for the reasons which have been already so fully stated as to render it unnecessary for me to add more than a very few observations.

My Lords, I think it has been clearly proved as a matter of fact that a serious nuisance did exist and was caused by the respondent company during the winter of 1894-5 in Aberdeen, as complained of by Mr Ogston. The learned counsel who appeared for the tramway company endeavoured to draw a distinction between the two operations of clearing away the snow from the parts of the street on which their rails were situated, and putting down salt on the street in such large quantities ; but it is plain to me that those two operations must be taken together. The nuisance was created as the result of the combined operations, namely, the way in which the streets were cleared, and the quantity of salt placed on them. That nuisance might have been obviated if the snow and slush had been immediately removed, or removed within a reasonable time after the salt had been used. It is clear, I think, from the evidence in regard to other towns, that in Aberdeen the clearing of the streets has not been carried out with the promptitude and dispatch shewn elsewhere. If it had been there would have been an end to the complaint that is made here, and a complete answer to the action. I see no reason to doubt that the nuisance is not by any means one that must necessarily be caused and endured even in times of severe storm ; and I cannot doubt that in future arrangements will be made by which any such nuisance will be obviated.

As to the other defence,—that what was done had the sanction of the Town-council,—I have to observe, referring to what has been so fully stated by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, that in my opinion that defence is not made out in point of fact. I think the Town-council did not sanction the proceedings of the tramway company ; but apart from that, I agree with the opinion which my noble friend has expressed, that even the Town-council themselves would not be entitled to continue and perpetuate a nuisance, and to defend themselves by saying that they were to be the judges in a matter of this kind. I think, even if the Town-council as administrators of the streets were causing a serious nuisance of this kind, that the Court would have the power, and ought to exercise the power, of putting a stop to it.

No. 2.

Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

LORD DAVY.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. I confess to some feeling of sympathy with the tramway company. In a time of snowstorm such as that which occurred in 1894-95, there must of necessity be some inconvenience and suffering to men and horses, and the directors of a tramway company might easily conceive that their first duty was to keep the tramway open for public traffic, and to avoid the general inconvenience that would be occasioned to the public, particularly at that time, by the tram-cars ceasing to run.

But, my Lords, what we have to consider is whether the complainer is entitled to the rights which he claims, and whether the respondents have infringed the rights of the complainer. He is entitled to have his rights protected even if it were shewn that a majority of the public who used the tramways were benefited by the acts of the respondents.

My Lords, I cannot doubt that to pile up large heaps of snow on the highway was in excess of the respondents' rights, and was in law a nuisance. The tramway company had no more right to do this than any other inhabitant of the street would have had to pile heaps of snow on the tramway itself. In the same way, with regard to the use of the salt: by the use of the salt in the manner in which it is proved in the evidence to have been used, the respondents produced a noxious mixture which they let loose upon the highway. That noxious mixture would not otherwise be there, and its presence, as I think is proved by the evidence, increased and aggravated to a material extent the inconvenience and danger to horses incident to the snowstorm itself.

My Lords, the only relevant defence that I can find pleaded is that the operations of the respondents in clearing and keeping clear their lines were within their statutory rights. I can only say that that argument depends on whether it was an incident necessary to the statutory rights conferred upon them. They have no statutory right to commit a nuisance, and the only attempt to make out or support that plea was by arguing that the statutory power of maintaining their tramways necessarily involved (and I say "necessarily" deliberately) the creation of this nuisance, and that in fact the statute has, if not expressly yet impliedly, authorised the nuisance. My Lords, I do not think that that is made out in this case, and I do not think there are any grounds whatever by which the respondents can maintain that the operations which I have held to be a nuisance were sanctioned or permitted by their Acts.

My Lords, the respondents point to the analogy of what is done in other towns, and evidence upon this point seems to have impressed the Lord

No. 2. Ordinary. But, my Lords, I think it is impossible to read the evidence of Mr Young as to what is done in Glasgow, and of Mr Pitcairn as to how the streets are cleared in Edinburgh, without coming to the conclusion that the analogy is entirely against the respondents, and not in their favour. I observe that in Mr Young's evidence he says, "we all knew what to do, and did it." It seems to me that that is exactly what did not take place at Aberdeen. And I observe that Mr Pitcairn says, "we exercise more care now than we used to do." Well, my Lords, perhaps the experience of the past and the knowledge of what has been done in Edinburgh may have a salutary effect in Aberdeen in the future.

Dec. 14, 1890.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

Now, my Lords, the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House seem to have thought that the case might be regarded for this purpose as if the Town-council had been the defenders or respondents. Indeed, the Lord Advocate and his learned junior, Sir Robert Reid, argued before us that the defenders were, in the operations complained of, agents of the Town-council, and that they acted by their authority. Now, I agree generally with the Lord Justice-Clerk's observations as to the amount of latitude and consideration to be shewn to a public body entrusted with the duty of clearing the streets. They are entitled to exercise their discretion as to the time, the order, and the means to be employed, and if they are supine in the exercise of their power, that is primarily a question to be considered by those who elect them to act on behalf of the community. But, my Lords, the defenders are not the Town-council, and, in my opinion, they have wholly failed to shew any ground upon which they can shelter themselves under the powers and immunities of that body.

I need not refer again to the minutes of the Town-council or to the correspondence which passed between them and the tramway company which have been referred to by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson), but the effect left upon my mind is that, so far from acting under the authority of the Town-council, the Town-council, wisely perhaps, left them to fight their own action in the best way they could, and declined to interfere beyond permitting some of their body to give evidence. I do not see that they interfered at all, or intended to make themselves in any way responsible for the defence.

My Lords, in this state of things, if it were merely a temporary interference with the highway which came to an end with the state of circumstances which occasioned it, and if there were no claim of right to do the acts complained of, your Lordships would not probably think it was a case for granting an interdict; but by their fourth plea in law the respondents claim a statutory authority for their operations, and therefore I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to the interdict he asks for; but, as it is quite possible that salt may be used for the purpose of clearing snow from the tramway (which cannot be so easily cleared by any other means) without occasioning a nuisance, I think the interdict should be in the qualified form proposed by your Lordships.

ORDERED, that the interlocutors appealed from be reversed: And it is hereby declared that the appellant (complainer) is entitled to have the respondents, the Aberdeen District Tramways Company, interdicted, prohibited, and discharged from removing snow from their tramway lines in the Great Western Road, Holburn Street, Union Street, and George Street, in the city of Aberdeen, and from scattering salt thereon, in the manner hitherto practised by them, to the nuisance of the appellant and of the public using said streets for the purpose of traffic with horses: Further ordered, that the cause be remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session, Scotland, to pronounce decree of interdict to the effect foresaid, and to find the appellant (complainer) entitled to the expenses of process hitherto incurred by him in the Court of Session: Further ordered, that the respondents do pay to the appellant his costs of the appeal to this House.

No. 2.
Dec. 14, 1896.
Ogston v.
Aberdeen
Tramways Co.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—MARTIN & LESLIE—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Appellants).—

D.-F. Asher—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Grierson.

NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—

Lord-Adv. Murray—Cripps, Q.C.—C. J. Guthrie—

A. O. M. Mackenzie.

No. 3.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

Railway—Running Powers—Right of owning company to exclude running power company—Railway Commission.—The East Coast Route between Edinburgh and London consisted of the lines of the North British Railway Company from Edinburgh to Berwick, of the North-Eastern Railway Company from Berwick to Shaftholme Junction, in Yorkshire, and of the Great Northern Company from Shaftholme Junction to London.

By an agreement incorporated in an Act of Parliament in 1862, it was provided that “for the purpose of maintaining and working in full efficiency in every respect the East Coast Route . . . the North British Company shall at all times hereafter permit the [North-Eastern] Company to run over and use the North British Company’s railway . . . between Berwick and Edinburgh and Leith, all inclusive . . . subject to the payment” of such rates as should be settled by agreement, or failing agreement by arbitration.

Down to 1869 the through traffic was conducted by each company working the through trains on their own line. In 1869 the North-Eastern Company claimed to send on certain trains as running-power trains, and in that year an arrangement, terminable on three months’ notice, was made, by which the through trains were hauled by North-Eastern engines between Edinburgh and Berwick. The carriages composing the through trains were for the most part carriages jointly owned by the three companies.

On 30th April 1894 the arrangement was terminated, and the North British Company raised an action to have it declared, inter alia, that the through trains run since 1869 were “their trains,” that they were entitled in the future to run the same service of trains between Edinburgh and Berwick as their own trains, and that the defenders were not entitled to work those trains. The defenders maintained that the trains run since 1869 had in fact been run by them in the exercise of their running powers, and pleaded that in any event they were entitled in the exercise of their running powers to run such a number of trains between Edinburgh and Berwick as might appear to them to be necessary or advisable, and that they had an exclusive right to run the East Coast trains between Edinburgh and Berwick.

The First Division sustained the defences and assolized the defenders.

In an appeal the House held (alt. judgment of the First Division) (1) that the agreement of 1869 having come to an end on 30th April 1894, the original statutory rights of the parties then emerged unaffected by the prac-

No. 3.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

tice under the agreement; (2) that the claims of the pursuers and of the defenders respectively were in excess of their respective legal rights; (3) that the extent to which, and the terms on which the running powers should be exercised, fell to be determined by agreement, or failing agreement by the Railway Commissioners; and (4) that the judgment sustaining the defences and assoilzieing the defenders fell to be recalled, and the action to be dismissed.

Process—All parties not called—Action by one of several joint owners against another.—The railway carriages on the East Coast Route from Edinburgh to London were the joint property of three companies, A, B, and C.

In an action by A against B concluding, inter alia, for declarator that B was not entitled to use the joint property without the consent of A, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the conclusion fell to be dismissed in respect that the third joint owner C had not been made a party to the action.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury.)
Lord Watson.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Shand.
Lord Davey.

THE EAST COAST ROUTE between Edinburgh and London was formed of the railways belonging to three companies. Between Edinburgh and Berwick the line was owned by the North British Railway Company; between Berwick and Shaftholme Junction in Yorkshire by the North-Eastern Railway Company; and between Shaftholme Junction and London by the Great Northern Railway Company.

The East Coast Route was opened in 1848. A large proportion of the carriages used in the through trains belonged jointly to the three companies, and were known as East Coast joint stock. The three companies shared the receipts from the through traffic in proportion to their respective mileages.

From 1848 down to 1869 the East Coast trains were worked by the North British Company on their own line to and from Berwick.

By an agreement, dated 14th May 1862, between the North British Company and the North-Eastern Company, which was scheduled and incorporated with the North-Eastern and Carlisle Railways Amalgamation Act, 1862, the North-Eastern Company acquired running powers over the line between Edinburgh and Berwick.* This agreement was in implement of a private agreement dated 12th May 1862.

In January 1865 the North-Eastern Company intimated to the North British Company that they intended to exercise their running powers, but no change was made till August 1869.

On 27th July 1869 an interim arrangement was agreed to, without prejudice to the rights of either company, by which the North British Company were to pay to the North-Eastern Company 1s. per mile for haulage, and to get the whole receipts. The arrangement bore to be till 1st September 1869.

* The agreement contained the following clause:—"Eightly, For the purpose of maintaining and working in full efficiency in every respect the East Coast Route by way of Berwick, for all traffic between London and other places in England and Edinburgh, Leith, Glasgow, and other places in Scotland, the North British Company shall at all times hereafter permit the company [North-Eastern], with their engines, carriages, waggons, and trucks, to run over and use the North British Company's railway, sidings, stations, wharves, and stopping, loading, and unloading places, water, watering-places, and other conveniences at and between Berwick and Edinburgh and Leith, all inclusive, . . . subject to the payment by the company to the North British Company for such user of such tolls, rates, or dues, or such share or proportion of tolls, rates, or dues, as have or has been or shall from time to time be agreed upon by and between the said companies, or in default of such agreement, as shall be fixed by arbitration in manner hereinafter provided."

On 7th August 1869 a minute of agreement was entered into between the two companies. No. 3.

This agreement, which was set out in the minutes of a meeting of deputations from the boards of the respective companies, contained the following clause :—" 10. That this arrangement be without prejudice to, and be not mentioned or referred to in connection with any further or subsequent arrangements or arbitrations which may become necessary, and be terminable at three months' notice on either side." Under this minute of agreement the whole through trains by the East Coast Route were to be hauled between Edinburgh and Berwick by North-Eastern engines, driven by North-Eastern servants, and were under the control of North-Eastern guards. Carriages were to be found at the expense of the North British Company, and the North British Company received the whole receipts, subject to payment of an engine mileage allowance of 9d. a-mile to the North-Eastern Company.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

On 18th January 1894 the North British Company gave notice to terminate the agreement of August 1869 on 30th April 1894, in so far as it related to haulage. The North-Eastern Company accepted this "as a formal notice terminating that arrangement."

Thereafter the North-Eastern Company maintained that the through trains which their engines had been and were then hauling between Edinburgh and Berwick had been, and continued to be, North-Eastern running-power trains, and that they were entitled to run them as such.

On 12th December 1894 the North British Company raised the present action against the North-Eastern Company.

The conclusions of the summons were as follows :—" (First) it ought and should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, that the trains from Edinburgh to London, via Berwick and York, and to other places south of Berwick, by the railways of the pursuers and defenders and the Great Northern Railway Company or of the pursuers and defenders, and the trains from London via York and Berwick, and from other places south of Berwick, by the said railways, to Edinburgh, have all along hitherto, or otherwise since August 1869, been and are, while on the railway of the pursuers between Edinburgh and Berwick, trains of the pursuers and not trains run by the defenders in the exercise of the running powers conferred by the articles of agreement made between the defenders and pursuers, of date 14th May 1862, scheduled to and confirmed by the North-Eastern and Carlisle Railways Amalgamation Act, 1862, or by the agreement made and executed by and between the defenders and pursuers, of date 12th May 1862, or by any Act of Parliament; (second) it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that from and after 1st January 1895, or such other date as our said Lords may fix in course of the process to follow hereon, the pursuers are entitled to run between Edinburgh and Berwick, with their own engines and guards, and otherwise as their own trains, the trains shewn in the schedule hereto annexed, subject always to such alterations as may from time to time be made by mutual consent of the pursuers and defenders and of the Great Northern Railway Company so far as the consent of the defenders or of the last-mentioned Company may be necessary, and that from and after 1st January 1895 the defenders are not entitled, in the exercise of their said running powers or otherwise, to work between Edinburgh and Berwick with their engines, guards, or other servants the said

No. 3. trains, or any of them, while and so long as the pursuers as the owners of the railway are able and willing and continue to run and work said trains in an efficient way; (third) it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the defenders are not entitled to use the East Coast joint stock carriages mentioned in the condescendence hereto annexed in any trains they may run on the pursuers' railway in the exercise of their said running powers without the consent of the pursuers; (fourth) the defenders ought and should be interdicted, prohibited, and discharged, by decree of our said Lords, from and after 1st January 1895, from attaching their engines at Edinburgh or elsewhere north of Berwick to such of the said trains shewn in said schedule (subject to alteration as aforesaid) as run from Edinburgh to the south, and from entering by their guards and other servants or in any way interfering with or molesting the pursuers in the control and management of such trains north of Berwick, and from attaching their engines at Berwick or elsewhere north of Berwick to such of said trains as run to Edinburgh from the south, and from entering by their guards and other servants or in any way interfering with or molesting the pursuers in the control and management of such last-mentioned trains at or north of Berwick; and (fifth) the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, from and after 1st January 1895, to hand over at Berwick to the pursuers the said last-mentioned trains, or otherwise the said East Coast joint stock carriages upon such trains, and to detach the engine or engines of the defenders from such trains at Berwick, and to remove from such trains at Berwick their guards and other servants."

On record, averments were made by the parties hinc inde relative, inter alia, to the question raised by the first conclusion of the summons, viz., whether the through trains run between Edinburgh and Berwick subsequent to 7th August 1869 were the trains of the pursuers, or were trains run by the defenders in the exercise of the running powers conferred by the agreements of 1862, but having regard to the ground upon which the judgment of the House of Lords was based, it is unnecessary to state them.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The East Coast trains in question between Edinburgh and Berwick being trains of the pursuers, and not having been run in virtue of the defenders' running powers, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (2) In respect the pursuers, as the owners of the railway, are able and willing to continue to run between Edinburgh and Berwick after 1st January next as their own trains the trains set forth in the said schedule hereto annexed (subject to alteration as aforesaid), the defenders are not entitled, in the exercise of their running powers, to work the said trains, or any of them, as running-power trains of the defenders, and the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the second conclusion of the summons, and to interdict and decree in terms of the fourth and fifth conclusions respectively of the summons. (3) The East Coast joint stock being the joint property of the pursuers, the defenders, and the Great Northern Railway Company, the defenders are not entitled, without the consent of the pursuers, to make use of the said East Coast joint stock upon any trains run by the defenders between Edinburgh and Berwick in the exercise of their running powers, and the pursuers are entitled to have decree of declarator in terms of the third conclusion of the summons. (6) Upon a sound construction of the scheduled agreement and the private agreement [of 12th May 1862], the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (7) Esto that all or any of the trains in question have hitherto been running-power trains of the defenders, the pursuers, as owners of the line from Edinburgh to Berwick, and in virtue of their statutory rights and powers, are entitled to have the defences repelled, and separatim, to insist that the said trains shall hereafter be run as their trains, et separatim, they are entitled to do so as long as they run the said trains so as to maintain an efficient service.

No. 3.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (2) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The East Coast trains in question between Edinburgh and Berwick having been and being trains run by the defenders in the exercise of their running powers, the defenders should be assoilzied from the first conclusion of the summons. (4) The defenders are entitled, under the powers conferred upon them by the agreements of 12th and 14th May 1862, to run such number of East Coast trains between Edinburgh and Berwick as may appear to them to be necessary or advisable. (5) The defenders being entitled, under the powers conferred upon them by the agreements of 12th and 14th May 1862, to run such number of East Coast trains between Edinburgh and Berwick as may appear to them to be necessary or advisable, the pursuers have no interest to insist in the action. (6) The defenders, being under no obligation to hand over East Coast trains to the pursuers at Berwick, should be assoilzied from the fifth conclusion of the summons. (7) Under the agreement of 12th May 1862, the defenders have an exclusive right to run the East Coast trains between Edinburgh and Berwick.* (8) Under the conditions regulating the use of the East Coast joint stock agreed upon between the pursuers, defenders, and Great Northern Railway Company, the pursuers are not entitled to object to the defenders using such stock upon the East Coast trains run by them. (9) The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

Proof having been taken, the Lord Ordinary (Low), on 10th December 1895, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, sustains the first plea in law for defenders, so far as regards the third conclusion of the summons, in reference to the East Coast joint stock carriages, and dismisses the same: And as regards the remaining conclusions of the summons, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders therefrom, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the Auditor of Court to tax and report."

The pursuers reclaimed, and on 5th March 1896, the First Division adhered.†

* Plea 7 was founded upon certain clauses of a private agreement concluded between the companies on 12th May 1862. The plea was not maintained either in the Inner-House or House of Lords, but was not withdrawn.

† The Lord Ordinary and the First Division decided the question of fact raised by the first conclusion of the summons in favour of the defenders.

After reviewing the evidence and stating his opinion on the question of fact, the LORD PRESIDENT proceeded,—If the question tabled by the pursuers in the first conclusion of their summons must be decided against them, then, in my judgment, they cannot prevail under the second. On

No. 3.

The pursuers appealed.

At delivering judgment, after consideration,—

Dec. 17, 1896.
 North British
 Railway Co. v.
 North-Eastern
 Railway Co.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case two railway companies have placed contentions before the Railway Commissioners, neither of which appear to me well founded. The North-Eastern Company claim to have running powers, which they certainly possess. The North British Company are the owners of the line over which the North-Eastern claim to run. The object of each of them is by means of facilities to reach London and obtain the profit of that traffic. The North British used to start a train upon their own line, which in due course went over some parts of the North-Eastern line and the Great Northern line. It is admitted that up to the 1st of June 1869 the trains to London were worked by the North British on their own line. At that date a controversy arose which was settled by an agreement, which, however, was one which the parties had reserved power to put an end to upon three months' notice. It was put an end to. The the hypothesis which I state the question stands thus: Given that the whole trains in question are North-Eastern trains, can the Court ordain that in future North British trains are to be run in place of them?

I must own that an initial, and, as I think, an ultimate difficulty arises from the want of harmony between the theory of the summons and the facts and conditions of through railway communication by these East Coast railways. The summons begins by personifying a "train," and assigning to it an identity and a continuous and apparently perpetual existence. To this fanciful notion I make no demur, so long as it corresponded with the facts, as was the case in the historical question submitted under the first conclusion. But, when we pass into the region of the future, the fallacy vitiates the argument. The summons assumes that certain "trains," so numerous as to require a schedule for their enumeration, are such well-established institutions that they will, of themselves, run from Edinburgh to London and back at their appointed hours, and that the only question is which company shall have their control in Scotland. All this is flagrantly contrary to—I shall not say anything wider than—the admitted conditions of the traffic in question. There is no law of nature—there is no law of railways or of railway facilities—by which the pursuers, having their will and running what they call the 10 A.M. train from Edinburgh to Berwick, will get their passengers sent straight on in the same train from Berwick to London. The pursuers have no running powers beyond Berwick; and the practical result of our adopting the theory of the second conclusion would be that we should set up a new series of local trains from Edinburgh to Berwick, clearing the North British line of through trains for this futile purpose, which nobody desires. What the pursuers really desire is that they, as the owning company of the North British line, shall be held in law, by our decree, entitled to run a series of trains from Edinburgh to Berwick, which shall have the legal quality of running right on to London. No decree that we could pronounce will have this stimulating effect. In this imaginary journey from Berwick to London the pursuers would, without the consent of the two English companies, override the vested rights of both the defenders and the Great Northern Railway Company, over whose lines the pursuers have no running powers whatever. Corresponding difficulties beset the pursuers' theory, when they picture themselves as waiting at Berwick, with a purely North British train, for a North-Eastern train, which, so far as we know, and so far as we have jurisdiction, need never arrive. The essential difference in the strategical strength and in legal right between the pursuers and the defenders, in relation to through traffic between controversy again arose, and the parties proceeded before the Railway Commissioners to do that which the Railway Commissioners are empowered by the statute to do, namely, to arrange upon what terms the running powers should be exercised and what facilities afforded. When there each party appears to have been impartially unreasonable. The North British Company, relying upon the practice up to the 1st of June 1869, maintained that they had a vested right in what they were pleased to call their train, which started at a particular hour, and that the Railway Commissioners had no right to deal with the North British right to start a through train at that hour. The North-Eastern Company, on the other hand, founding their supposed rights on the agreement to which I have referred, and the practice under it, claimed themselves a right to start that train as theirs. The Railway Commissioners did not feel themselves competent to deal with these claims set up as absolutely legal rights, and accordingly this action has been raised to determine what they are.

No. 3.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

It appears to me that neither of the claims put forward can be sustained. The possessive pronouns used by either party are inaccurate, at least they

London and Edinburgh, is that the defenders have running powers for the conduct of such traffic over the pursuers' line, and the pursuers have no running powers over the defenders' line. The summons adopts the easy course of ignoring this distinction.

The Court has no material before it for determining the complicated question what would be a fair exercise of the running powers of the defenders as to the hours of their trains. That question would have to be determined according to the equitable principles which regulate the possession or use of one subject by two persons having rights of different qualities. No such question is stated. We are not asked to frame a scheme for the use of this line by the owning company and the running-power company, nor are the facts before us so that we could decide it, even assuming that it is within our jurisdiction and not within that of the Railway Commissioners, a subject on which only a very meagre argument was offered by the pursuers.

On the third conclusion, I believe the Lord Ordinary to be right. For my own part, I think that the question raised by that conclusion legitimately enters the consideration of the first conclusion; but it is right that, in the absence of the Great Northern Railway Company, and as the pursuers must be held to decline to call them as defenders, we should not give any decree upon it.

The fourth and fifth conclusions follow the fate of the first and second.

On the question—at first sight not very clear—what matters the summons really meant to submit for our decision, counsel were not well agreed; and we had read to us passages from what was said to be the shorthand writer's notes of the proceedings before the Railway Commission, as to the result of which counsel did not profess a common understanding. Upon this I have only to observe that, while I am sure that this Court would be desirous to facilitate the settlement of disputes originating in the Railway Commission, by determining questions of legal right, it rests with the party resorting to a Court of law to state the question which he desires to have decided, and upon that question as defined in the writ, by which it is submitted, and upon no other, can the Court give judgment.

I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that LORD M'LAREN, who was absent at the advising, also concurred.

No. 3. do not express what either party in truth means to claim. What each means to claim is the exclusive right to start a train which is to go through to London at a particular time. The right of the North British to start a train at some time or another on their own line I should have thought was incontestable. The right of the North-Eastern to apply for and get from the Railway Commissioners some times for the exercise of their running powers is, I should have thought, equally incontestable; but neither company can claim to exclude the other, and the questions of what facilities shall be given, or under what regulations the running powers shall be exercised, are questions which the Legislature has remitted to the Railway Commissioners.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

I confess that I am unable to follow the reasoning which is supposed to establish that the through trains to London were North-Eastern trains. The objection which the Lord President so forcibly urges against the second conclusion of the summons, and in which I entirely concur, seems to me equally applicable to the first. "I must own that an initial, and, as I think, an ultimate difficulty arises from the want of harmony between the theory of the summons and the facts and conditions of through railway communication by these East Coast railways. The summons begins by personifying a 'train,' and assigning to it an identity and a continuous and apparently perpetual existence. To this fanciful notion I make no demur, so long as it corresponded with the facts, as was the case in the historical question submitted under the first conclusion. But when we pass into the region of the future, the fallacy vitiates the argument. The summons assumes that certain 'trains,' so numerous as to require a schedule for their enumeration, are such well-established institutions that they will, of themselves, run from Edinburgh to London and back at their appointed hours, and that the only question is which company shall have their control in Scotland. All this is flagrantly contrary to—I shall not say anything wider than—the admitted conditions of the traffic in question. There is no law of nature—there is no law of railways or of railway facilities—by which the pursuers, having their will and running what they call the 10 A.M. train from Edinburgh to Berwick, will get their passengers sent straight on in the same train from Berwick to London."

I agree in every word of this except the statement that the fanciful instance corresponds with the fact in the historical question submitted under the first conclusion. The moment that it is admitted that the practice was under the agreement, even if this agreement had not been "without prejudice," it seems to me no part of that practice can be looked at to establish a right. Upon the termination of that agreement, the parties were, I think, remitted to the status quo ante, whatever that was, but I do not think that status quo ante necessarily establishes the right now claimed by the North British Company. I decline to go into the question of the haulage agreement, the joint property in the carriages, or the modes of payment by the North-Eastern, or what either party have said or done in the nature of admissions against themselves. Nothing that either party could have said or done would, in my judgment, determine the question which the Railway Commissioners have the jurisdiction to solve, and which it appears to me they are just as much able to solve now, unfettered by anything either company has done, as if they were hearing their respective applications the day after the running powers were granted. They would probably respect any convenience which the owning company had been in the habit of enjoying, because the problem to be solved is to what extent the owning company should be ordered to permit the company having running powers to exercise those powers. But whether they would or not is a question for them, and not for your Lordships. I think the only question which your Lordships can answer is whether the absolute rights claimed exist in law. I am of opinion that neither company possess the absolute rights they claim, and that therefore this action ought to be dismissed.

No. 3.
Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that both the interlocutors appealed from be reversed; that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session to dismiss the action, and find neither party entitled to their costs in this House, nor to the expenses of process in either of the Courts below.

LORD WATSON.—The direct East Coast route between London and Edinburgh is by the main line of the Great Northern Company from King's Cross to a point between Selby Junction and York, from that point by the main line of the North-Eastern Company to Berwick, and from Berwick to Edinburgh by the main line of the North British Company.

By the eighth article of an agreement between the North-Eastern and the North British Companies, which is scheduled to and incorporated with "The North-Eastern and Carlisle Amalgamation Act, 1862," it is provided as follows:—"For the purpose of maintaining and working in full efficiency in every respect the East Coast route by way of Berwick, for all traffic between London and Scotland, and Edinburgh, Leith, Glasgow, and other places in Scotland, the North British Company shall at all times hereafter permit the company" (i.e. the North-Eastern Company), "with their engines, carriages, waggons, and trucks, to run over and use the North British Company's railway, sidings, stations, wharves, and stopping, loading, and unloading places, water, watering-places, and other conveniences at and between Berwick and Edinburgh, all inclusive." . . . "Subject to the payment by the company to the North British Company for such user of such tolls, rates, or dues, or such share or proportion of tolls, rates, or dues, as have or has been, or shall from time to time be agreed upon by and between the said companies, or in default of such agreement, as shall be fixed by arbitration in manner hereinafter provided."

For a period of forty-five years prior to the institution of this action in December 1894, there had been a regular and daily service of passenger trains both ways between Edinburgh and London. The number of these trains, their times of departure and arrival, and their rates of speed had been raised from time to time. It is not matter of dispute, that until the year 1869 these trains were the joint adventure of the three companies, who shared the receipts in proportion to their respective mileages. The rolling stock chiefly used for them was the joint property of the three companies, but their engine power was supplied between King's Cross and York by the Great Northern Company, between York and Berwick by the North-Eastern, and between Berwick and Edinburgh by the North British Com-

No. 3. pany. When carriages belonging to one of the companies were required to make up the train, that company received a mileage allowance for their use.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

In 1869 a new arrangement was made in regard to these trains, under which the position of the Great Northern Company appears to have remained the same as it previously had been. In January 1865 the North-Eastern intimated to the North British Company their intention to commence using the running powers conferred upon them by statutory agreement; but no change was made, of any kind, until August 1869, when certain heads of agreement were settled between the representatives of the two companies, which contained the proviso that the arrangement which they embodied should be without prejudice to, and should not be mentioned or referred to in connection with any further or subsequent arrangements or arbitrations which might become necessary, and also that it should be terminable at three months' notice on either side.

Apart from the terms of the arrangement of August 1869, the only apparent change which it effected in the working of the trains, and in the distribution of their earnings, consisted in the fact that thenceforth the haulage of the trains from Berwick to Edinburgh, and vice versa, was performed by the North-Eastern Company with their own engines, and that a mileage allowance for such haulage was deducted from the proportion of receipts paid to the North British Company. That fact is not, in my opinion, conclusive of the question argued at your Lordships' bar, and largely discussed by the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low), as well as by the Lord President, in delivering the opinion of the First Division—whether, in working under the agreement, the North-Eastern Company were or were not exercising their running powers. I have no intention of entering upon that discussion, because, in the view which I take, its determination one way or another cannot affect the present position or rights of the parties to this litigation.

The North British Railway Company, on the 18th January 1894, gave notice to terminate the agreement of August 1869 on the 30th day of April next, in so far as it related to haulage between Edinburgh and Berwick. As that notice affected what the North-Eastern Company regarded as a cardinal feature of the arrangement contained in the agreement, they accepted the notice "as a formal notice terminating that arrangement." At that time the object of the North British Company apparently was to restore in substance the arrangement which prevailed before August 1869, by substituting their own haulage of the trains for that of the North-Eastern Company between Edinburgh and Berwick, and getting rid of the payment made on that account out of their share of earnings to the latter company. Before examining the record, I think it may be advisable to consider what the respective rights of the parties were in law on the 30th April 1894, because these remained unaltered at the time when the present action was brought by the North British Company. At that date the agreement of August 1869 had come to an end, and the arrangement which had been operative before it had been superseded for five-and-twenty years. Neither the one nor the other of these arrangements could any longer affect the legal interests of the two companies, who were, in my opinion, remanded to their respective statutory rights. The North British Com-

No. 3.

Dec. 17, 1896.
 North British
 Railway Co. v.
 North-Eastern
 Railway Co.

pany were the owners of the railway between Edinburgh and Berwick, and in that capacity had an absolute right to use it as they chose, save in so far as that right might be qualified and restricted by the due exercise of the running powers competent to the North-Eastern Company under the statutory agreement of 1862. They also had, or might have, the right to insist upon facilities being afforded by the North-Eastern Company for the forwarding of their traffic beyond Berwick; but the existence and extent of that right are matters beyond the cognisance of the ordinary Courts of the country, and can only be considered and determined by the proper tribunal—the Railway Commissioners. On the other hand, the North-Eastern Company have unquestionably running powers over the railway between Edinburgh and Berwick; but to my mind it is clear, from the terms in which these powers are conferred, that they have not the right to intrude, at their own hand, upon the North British system, and to use them according to their own will and pleasure. Until the extent of their legitimate use has been determined by the proper tribunal, or by mutual consent, these powers will continue to exist, but the right to exercise them will be practically suspended.

The remedy asked by the North British Company is expressed in declaratory conclusions, and two other conclusions, one for interdict and another for a peremptory order, both of which are consequential upon the declaratory conclusions being affirmed. The declaratory conclusions refer to and incorporate a schedule setting forth all the through trains which ran during the year 1894 until the date of the summons, with their monthly times of departure from and arrival at Edinburgh and London, and certain intermediate stations where they stopped. The substance of the first conclusion is to have it found and declared that these trains “have all along hitherto, or otherwise since August 1869, been and are,” while on the railway of the pursuers, between Edinburgh and Berwick, trains of the pursuers, and not trains run by the defenders in the exercise of the running powers conferred by the articles of agreement. The substance of the second is a declaration that the pursuers are entitled to run these trains between Edinburgh and Berwick, with their own engines and guards and as their own trains; and that the defenders are not entitled to do so, so long as the pursuers are able to work these trains in an efficient way. The third conclusion relates to a separate matter which I shall subsequently notice.

I fail to see what possible interest the North British Railway Company has to insist in either of these conclusions. The object of a declaratory decree in a case like the present is to establish the right of the pursuers as it existed at, and will continue to exist after, the date of the action. But the judicial ascertainment of what the North British Company's rights in relation to these trains were, either under the agreement of 1869, or under the arrangement which preceded it, cannot, in my opinion, afford any aid towards determining what their rights were at the commencement of this action, and are now, which is the only real subject of controversy between the parties. In order to arrive at an intelligible construction of these conclusions, in so far as they relate to the through trains which continued to run after the determination of the agreement of 1869, I have found it necessary to assume,—what I understood to be admitted as matter of fact

No. 3.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

by both sides of the bar,—that both parties, who were then at issue as to their respective rights, in their own interest very properly consented to the continuance of the trains until their rights were settled. An arrangement of that kind cannot give rise to any right in either of them, or detract from any right which they possess. It is also clear to my mind that the North British Company are not in a position to ask a Court of law to determine what their rights were or are to be in relation to through trains, after the date of the summons, and that is a matter which, as I have already pointed out, must depend upon the arrangement which the parties may make for themselves, or have settled for them by the Railway Commissioners.

The leading pleas stated in defence to the action by the North-Eastern Company were—that under their running powers they are entitled “to run such number of East Coast trains between Edinburgh and Berwick as may appear to them to be necessary or advisable”—that they may have exclusive right to run the East Coast trains between Edinburgh and Berwick. As already indicated, it appears to me that these pleas are in excess of their legal rights. To this extent—that they have no power, at their own hand, and with no authority beyond their own—I do not hesitate to express my opinion. But I purposely abstain from pursuing the question further, because that course would necessarily involve considerations which are beyond my jurisdiction. If the parties choose to resort to the proper authority, that authority will be able to determine the cognate questions whether, and how far, the North British Company are in a position to insist for forwarding facilities at Berwick, and also to what extent and in what manner the North-Eastern Company ought to use its running powers.

The third conclusion is for a declaration to the effect that the North-Eastern Company are not entitled to use the East Coast joint stock carriages in any trains which they may run on the railway of the pursuers without their consent. It is admitted that these carriages are the joint property of the three companies; but it is pleaded in defence that the conditions regulating the user of these carriages excluded the objection taken by the North British Company, and also that it could not be disposed of in this suit, inasmuch as the Great Northern Company had not been made a party to it.

The Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) sustained the plea of all parties not called, as regards the third conclusion, and dismissed the same; and as regarded the whole other conclusions of the summons, he sustained the defences stated to the action, and assoilzied the respondents therefrom, with expenses. Upon a reclaiming note to the First Division of the Court, his Lordship's interlocutor was affirmed, with additional expenses.

I think that the third conclusion of the summons was rightly disposed of by the Courts below. The use which has been or was being made of the carriages in question by the North-Eastern Company was in reality one in which the Great Northern Company participated, and from which it derived pecuniary benefit; and a decree, in the terms craved, against the North-Eastern Company would have the effect of compelling that company to eliminate their carriages from the train when or before it reached Berwick, and would so deprive the Great Northern Company of the right to use the carriages for the conveyance of passengers from King's Cross to Edinburgh. It appears to me that they ought not to be deprived of that right without an opportunity of being heard for their interest. No. 3.

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to explain, I am of opinion that the North British Company have shewn no interest entitling them to insist in the other declaratory conclusions of the action, the affirmance of which would not ascertain, or assist in the ascertainment, of their legal rights, as in a question with the North-Eastern Company, either at the present time, or at and after the date of the summons. The logical result of that opinion is, that these conclusions also ought to be dismissed, together with the remaining conclusions of the summons, which are dependent upon them. The interlocutors of the Courts below go a great deal further,—they sustain the defences and assoilzie,—the effect of which is to make the affirmance of each and every plea in law put on record by the respondents res judicata as between the litigants. There are several of these pleas, including the most important of them, which I should be prepared to repel, if it were necessary.

I have, in these circumstances, come to the conclusion that the proper course for your Lordships to take is to reverse both interlocutors appealed from, and to remit the cause to the Court of Session in order that the action may be dismissed. Having regard to the nature of the litigation, and to the purposeless or extravagant claims advanced by both these litigants, I think the justice of the case will be met, as your Lordship has proposed, by allowing costs to neither of them, either here or in the Court of Session.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely agree in the motion which has been proposed, and in the reasons which have been assigned for it.

LORD SHAND.—Apart from the arrangements or agreements which have been made between the parties for the regulation of the traffic on the North British Railway from Berwick to Edinburgh during the last twenty-five years, the relative position of the pursuers and defenders is that, on the one hand, the pursuers are vested with the right to their own line, and to the use of their own line with all the powers which their statutes confer on them; and on the other hand, it is not disputed that the defenders, the North-Eastern Railway Company, under the Statute of 1862, have the right to running powers over the pursuers' line.

The true purpose of this action, as it appears to me, in the circumstances in which it has been raised, is not that the Court should define the respective rights of the parties as binding upon them in all future time, but rather that it should determine the question of possession, with reference to the working of the numerous through trains which have been in existence since 1869, as such possession might affect the relative positions of the parties before the Railway Commissioners, by whom the regulation of the mode of exercising the running powers has to be determined. The pursuers on the one hand maintain that these numerous trains have been what they describe as their trains, and not the trains of the defenders, the North-Eastern Railway Company. The defenders on the other hand maintain that the trains, on the contrary, were their trains, and that they are entitled to the entire control of them. I observe that the learned Lord Ordinary in his judgment, in sustaining the defences, as has been pointed out by my noble and

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

No. 3. learned friend Lord Watson, has expressly said, "I am of opinion that the agreement of the 7th August 1869 was entered into because the defenders were exercising their running powers, and for the sole purpose of regulating the working of the running-power trains, and if that view is sound, then the trains to which that agreement is applicable have continued to be running-power trains of the defenders ever since." Substantially, therefore, his Lordship finds that these trains were North-Eastern Railway trains, and under the control of that company. And the learned Lord President, in delivering the opinion of the First Division of the Court, in a similar way observed,—“I have come to think that the better opinion is that the trains were run by the defenders in exercise of their running powers, and that the agreement was not a compromise by which those running powers were waived, but was merely the necessary adjustment of the terms on which the running powers were exercised.”

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

My Lords, I am unable to agree in these opinions. The effect of the judgments, which proceed on the grounds now stated, undoubtedly would be that no fewer than ten important trains have been daily running on the pursuers' line for so many years as North-Eastern Company trains—and the North-Eastern Railway Company would seem to have the practical possession of the North British line during a very great part of every day. When we look at the language of the statute which refers to these working powers as to be used by permission of the North British Company, it would seem to follow that that company have really themselves permitted the North-Eastern Railway Company practically to absorb their line, and to oust them, though the owners of it, during a very great and important part of every twenty-four hours. My Lords, I agree in thinking that the North British Railway Company cannot be said to have made any such large concessions, and I think that neither of the parties can say that these numerous trains were the trains either of the one company or of the other.

It appears to me in the circumstances to be unnecessary to consider the details of the arrangements that were actually made and carried out, because I agree with your Lordships in thinking that these arrangements must be regarded as having been temporary arrangements, made by agreement for the very purpose of avoiding the determination or the admission on either side of the alleged legal rights of the parties, and that they were made without prejudice to these rights. It is true, on the one hand, that the North-Eastern Railway Company, by their own engines, engine-drivers, and guards, ran the through trains to and from Edinburgh; but, on the other hand, it is clear that, while running these trains, they were paid for the haulage of them by the North British Company. It is further clear that the whole of the pecuniary arrangements as between the parties were quite such as one would naturally expect if each company were working the traffic on its own line; and, as has been pointed out by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, not only were the pecuniary arrangements of that nature, but they certainly did not proceed upon the footing that either party was giving up his rights. It is in these circumstances difficult to draw the inference that these trains were the trains of either the one party or the other, even if the agreements did not exclude that idea, but in truth I am satisfied that the whole of the arrangements were of a temporary character, and made for the convenience of the time, and under reservation of all rights. No. 3.

The agreements of 1869 expressly bear on their face that they were intended to be temporary. It is true that they have lasted for a very long time—for no less than twenty-five years—but the minutes of 1869 in which the agreements were expressed make it clear that they were not intended to be in any sense permanent. I refer especially to what is said in the minute of the meeting of the 27th of July 1869, in which it was said, “after some conversation” (which took place between the representatives of the different companies) “it was agreed, as an interim arrangement, and without prejudice to the rights of either company, which are reserved entire, that the North British Company shall pay to the North-Eastern Company one shilling per mile for the use of their engines, the North British Company finding the carriages and using the trains in every respect as though they were their own, but so as not to prejudice the through traffic, and receiving the whole receipts accruing between Edinburgh and Berwick.” Again referring to the minutes of a subsequent meeting of the 7th of August 1869, not only was it intended, as their language plainly shews, to be a temporary arrangement, but there is this provision,—“That this arrangement be without prejudice to, and be not mentioned or referred to in connection with, any further or subsequent arrangements or arbitrations which may become necessary, and be terminable at three months’ notice on either side.” My Lords, I can scarcely conceive language which parties could use more clearly intended to indicate that the arrangements were not arrived at as an admission of legal rights, but were under reservation of each party’s rights, and that in any future question, whether arising for judicial determination or otherwise, the parties had carefully provided that this particular agreement, and the working of the trains under it, should not even be referred to as the basis of an argument for the determination of any dispute or difference.

There is no doubt that these arrangements were made in consequence of the right to the running powers having been given to the defenders; and in order to avoid settling precisely what the rights of these parties were as to the exercise of their running powers, either as regards the times at which trains should be run or the terms on which the powers should be exercised. It appears to me that although they are arrangements made in consequence of the powers which the North-Eastern Railway Company possessed, they cannot be represented as being arrangements which were in the actual exercise of these powers.

My Lords, the result, in my view, is as has been stated by your Lordships. It is admitted that up to the 1st of June 1869 the North British Railway Company worked their own trains and carried their own traffic. From that date downwards during the intervening five-and-twenty years there have been only temporary arrangements, which cannot be founded upon by either party as conferring a right against the other. The Commissioners, in taking up any question which may arise for their determination, will therefore be in the same position as if the question had arisen in June 1869, or, in other words, if I may use the expression, the parties in going before the Commissioners will present “a clean sheet” as regards the period after 1869. The Commissioners will have the consideration, on the one

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

No. 3. hand, that the North British Company are the owners entitled, in the first instance, to the possession and use and working of their own line and the trains upon it; but upon the other hand, that the North-Eastern Railway Company have obtained running powers which they will be entitled to exercise. There is this difference, of course, between the year 1869 and the present, that there is a much larger traffic to be dealt with now than would have had to be taken into consideration then, and this circumstance, and the public necessities and convenience, may require some arrangements of a kind different from what they would have been if the question had arisen for determination then. Perhaps with the light which the parties have, I hope, received from what has fallen from your Lordships to-day, they may find that their wiser course is still to continue some mutual arrangement between themselves; but failing that, the Commissioners will take up the question with reference to the legal position of the pursuers and defenders which your Lordships have now defined.

Dec. 17, 1896.
North British
Railway Co. v.
North-Eastern
Railway Co.

On the other question—I mean with regard to the use of the railway carriages—I agree entirely in thinking that the Court was right in dismissing that conclusion of the summons, because all parties were not called.

My Lords, each party in this case has made demands so much in excess of their legal rights that I agree that in dismissing the action on the grounds which have been already so fully stated, it should be dismissed awarding costs to neither party.

LORD DAVEY.—I agree entirely in the order which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and in the reasons which have already been given by your Lordships in support of that order. It is quite unnecessary to repeat them. I will only say that I think both parties in this litigation have put their claims far too high, and in fact that the claims put forward in some of the pleas in law, both of the pursuers and the defenders, are, in my opinion, extravagant.

THE HOUSE remitted to the Court of Session to dismiss the action, and find neither party entitled to the costs in this House, nor to the expenses of process in the Courts below.

LOCH & Co.—J. WATSON, S.S.C.—WILLIAMSON, HILL, & Co.—COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.

No. 4. ALEXANDER M'NAB, Complainer (Appellant).—Lord-Adv. Murray—Cosens Hardy, Q.C.—Abel.

Dec. 15, 1896.
N'Nab v.
Robertson.

G. M. ROBERTSON AND OTHERS (Sir George Campbell's Trustees), Respondents.—Cripps, Q.C.—Macfarlane.

River—Lease—Lease of water in ponds and "streams leading thereto"—Whether water percolating to pond from spring a "stream."—Under the lease of a distillery there was let to the tenant the distillery and a piece of land, with two ponds, "with right to the water in the said ponds, and in the streams leading thereto." A stream from the hills entered the upper pond, from which the water flowed in a stream into the lower pond. A few yards from the lower pond, but not within the land leased, was a spring, from which water percolated through marshy ground into that pond. After the date of the lease the landlord collected the water from the spring already mentioned, and from other springs, into a tank, and by means of a pipe carried part of this water to the house of another of his tenants, the remainder of the water collected in the tank passing through an overflow pipe into the pond. The tenant of the distillery brought an action to have the landlord interdicted from interfering with the water from the spring.

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.

M'Nab v.
Robertson.

Held (diss. the Lord Chancellor, aff. judgment of Second Division) that the tenant was not entitled to interdict, in respect that water percolating from a spring to a pond did not constitute a stream in the sense of the lease.

Held further (by the whole House) that assuming that there was an implied obligation on the landlord not to execute any operations which would have the effect of decreasing the amount of water in the ponds, the tenant had failed to prove that the landlord's operations had this effect.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that such an implied obligation was to be inferred from the terms of the lease.

(In the Court of Session, March 11, 1896, 23 R. 1098.)

The complainer appealed.¹

Ld. Chancellor
(Halabury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Shand.
Lord Davey.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the first question which it is necessary to consider in this appeal is whether the spring which the respondents have impounded by means of a tank was, at the date of the lease, connected with the lower pond by a flow of water constituting a stream or streams within the meaning of the lease. If it were, there would not appear to me to be any room for doubting that the operations of which the appellant complains have encroached upon his legal rights as tenant.

According to my apprehension, the word "stream," in its primary and natural sense, denotes a body of water having, as such body, a continuous flow in one direction. It is frequently used to signify running water at places where its flow is rapid, as distinguished from its sluggish current in other places. I see no reason to doubt that a subterraneous flow of water may in some circumstances possess the very same characteristics as a body of water running on the surface; but, in my opinion, water, whether falling from the sky or escaping from a spring, which does not flow onward with any continuity of parts, but becomes dissipated in the earth's strata, and simply percolates through or along those strata, until it issues from them at a lower level, through dislocation of the strata or otherwise, cannot with any propriety be described as a stream. And I may add that the insertion of a common rubble or other agricultural drain in these strata, whilst it tends to accelerate percolation, does not constitute a stream as I understand that expression.

The spring in question, which is a very small one, is situated at a short distance from and above the level of the lower pond. There is little evidence, and that neither explicit nor altogether satisfactory, in regard to the condition of the spring and its effluents at and before the granting of the lease in September 1889. Most of the witnesses speak to their condition after the operations of the agricultural tenant, which were subsequent to that date, and before the year 1892. But I am satisfied, upon the proof, that, whilst a small proportion of the water escaping from the spring may have gone in another direction, the bulk of its water must have gravitated

¹ Appellant's Authorities.—Whitehead v. Parks, 1858, 2 H. and N. 870; Cowan v. Kinnaird, Dec. 15, 1865, 4 Macph. 236, 38 Scot. Jur. 131; Blair v. Hunter, Finlay, & Co., Nov. 29, 1870, 9 Macph. 204, 43 Scot. Jur. 169; Chasemore v. Richards, 1858, 7 H. L. C. 349; Wheeldon v. Burrows, 1879, L. R., 12 Ch. Div. 31; Suffield v. Brown, 1863, 4 De G. J. and S. 185.

Respondents' Authorities.—Taylor v. Corporation of St Helens, 1877, L. R., 6 Ch. Div. 264.

No. 4. towards the pond, and that a considerable proportion of it must ultimately have found its way into the pond.

Dec. 15, 1896.
M'Nab v.
Robertson.

Galbraith, the agricultural tenant, describes the land between the spring and the pond, before he commenced his operations, as a marsh which did not come quite close up to the side of the pond. He, in order to dry the soil, put a drain into the marshy part, which he continued by means of an iron pipe three feet long to a tub sunk on the edge of the pond, from which he drew water for domestic use, and the overflow from which went into the pond. Lawson, who was assistant factor for the estate of Garscube, at the date of the lease, describes the intervening land as "soft spongy ground"; and there are other witnesses who describe the water as "seeping" from the adjacent land into the pond—a Scottish expression equivalent to "oozing"—which is an accurate description if applied to the escape of percolating water from the strata through which it has passed, and is to my mind altogether inconsistent with its running in a stream. Boyne, one of the appellant's witnesses, no doubt says that there was a sort of channel formed by the water from the spring; but he is the only person who appears to have detected it, and the bulk of the evidence upon the point, as well as the natural inference to be derived from facts established aliunde, alike lead me to the conclusion that, until the time of Galbraith's operation, the water of the spring reached the pond by the natural process of percolation, and that no part of the supply derived from the spring flowed in a body which could with any degree of accuracy be described as a stream.

I therefore differ in opinion from the Lord Ordinary, who came to the conclusion that the water of the spring in question was one of the streams specifically let to the appellant. Had I been able to arrive at that result, I should not have thought it necessary to consider whether, by interfering with the spring, the respondents had injured the appellant's water supply. In that case, every drop of water which they took from the spring, otherwise than in the due exercise of their reserved right in connection with farm purposes, would have been an illegal diminution of the supply secured to the appellant by the terms of his lease.

The result of my opinion, so far as hitherto expressed, is that the waters of the spring in question were not demised to the appellant, subject to a reservation permitting a certain user of them to agricultural tenants, but remained with the respondents under their title as proprietors. The appellant, upon that view of the case, maintained alternatively that the respondents are under a contractual obligation to allow as much of the water of the unlet sources from which the pond is fed to continue to enter it as may be equivalent to the average of the water supply derived from these sources at the date of the lease; and in aid of that contention he relied upon the general principle of law—that the grantor of a right cannot himself do anything in derogation of his own grant. The application of that principle must depend upon the extent of the right which the tenant got under his lease, whether by demise or by contract. I see no reason to doubt that such a contract right as the appellant alternatively claims, seeing it may be the subject of express stipulation, may also be derived by reasonable implication from the terms of the lease. But any such implication is attended with difficulty in cases like the present, where certain sources of supply are specified and let. I am not prepared to affirm that a contract to the effect pleaded is implied in the stipulations of the lease of 1889; but I am willing, for the purposes of this appeal, to assume its existence. Upon that assumption, it is incumbent upon the appellant to establish that the result of the respondents' operations has been to diminish the supply of water now finding its way from the spring into the pond, as compared with the supply which came from the same source at and before the date of the lease.

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.

M'Nab v.
Robertson.

I think the necessary effect of Galbraith, the agricultural tenant's, operations, which were subsequent to the granting of the lease, was to convey the water of the spring more rapidly and more directly to the pond, and to prevent its dissipation in the soil or its evaporation. If so, their tendency would necessarily be to increase and not to lessen the quantity of water reaching the pond from the spring. The immediate effect of the respondents' operation which followed was to collect, as soon as they came to the surface, the whole waters issuing from the spring, including a proportion of them which had not previously gravitated towards the pond, and to make them available for transmission in undiminished volume. The water collected in the tank serves, in the first place, to supply a pipe which is not used for agricultural purposes, and the remainder is directly conveyed by another pipe to the tub sunk by Galbraith through which the water of the spring previously entered the pond. A comparison between the quantity of water which now runs over the tub and that which previously escaped from it must therefore afford the means of ascertaining whether there has been a diminution of the supply since the arrangement made by Galbraith was superseded.

The whole evidence which bears on the alleged diminution in the amount of the spring water which now enters the pond, as well as on the amount which entered it before the lease was granted, is,—it may be necessarily,—somewhat vague. In considering that evidence, it is, in my opinion, not immaterial to keep in view the fact that, in the time of his predecessors, the weekly output of the distillery never exceeded 1300 gallons of whisky, whereas during the tenancy of the appellant it was increased to about 1700 gallons, which represents an addition of about 30 per cent to the quantity of water used for distillery purposes at the date of the lease. I have also to observe that the scarcity of water in such an exceptional season as that of the year 1894 cannot throw much, if any, light upon the average quantity derived from the spring at and before the date of the lease—a question which in the absence of more reliable data can, in my opinion, best be solved by ascertaining whether or not the overflow from the tub has been sensibly diminished since, and by reason of the respondents' operations. Upon that point there is conflicting evidence; but, on the whole, I prefer the testimony which is favourable to the respondents; and, in any view, I have no difficulty in holding that the appellant has failed to prove diminution.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed, with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD SHAND.—My Lords, I am also of opinion that this appeal fails and

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.
M'Nab v.
Robertson.

towards the pond, and that a considerable proportion of it must ultimately have found its way into the pond.

Galbraith, the agricultural tenant, describes the land between the spring and the pond, before he commenced his operations, as a marsh which did not come quite close up to the side of the pond. He, in order to dry the soil, put a drain into the marshy part, which he continued by means of an iron pipe three feet long to a tub sunk on the edge of the pond, from which he drew water for domestic use, and the overflow from which went into the pond. Lawson, who was assistant factor for the estate of Garscube, at the date of the lease, describes the intervening land as "soft spongy ground"; and there are other witnesses who describe the water as "seeping" from the adjacent land into the pond—a Scottish expression equivalent to "oozing"—which is an accurate description if applied to the escape of percolating water from the strata through which it has passed, and is to my mind altogether inconsistent with its running in a stream. Boyne, one of the appellant's witnesses, no doubt says that there was a sort of channel formed by the water from the spring; but he is the only person who appears to have detected it, and the bulk of the evidence upon the point, as well as the natural inference to be derived from facts established aliunde, alike lead me to the conclusion that, until the time of Galbraith's operation, the water of the spring reached the pond by the natural process of percolation, and that no part of the supply derived from the spring flowed in a body which could with any degree of accuracy be described as a stream.

I therefore differ in opinion from the Lord Ordinary, who came to the conclusion that the water of the spring in question was one of the streams specifically let to the appellant. Had I been able to arrive at that result, I should not have thought it necessary to consider whether, by interfering with the spring, the respondents had injured the appellant's water supply. In that case, every drop of water which they took from the spring, otherwise than in the due exercise of their reserved right in connection with farm purposes, would have been an illegal diminution of the supply secured to the appellant by the terms of his lease.

The result of my opinion, so far as hitherto expressed, is that the waters of the spring in question were not demised to the appellant, subject to a reservation permitting a certain user of them to agricultural tenants, but remained with the respondents under their title as proprietors. The appellant, upon that view of the case, maintained alternatively that the respondents are under a contractual obligation to allow as much of the water of the unlet sources from which the pond is fed to continue to enter it as may be equivalent to the average of the water supply derived from these sources at the date of the lease; and in aid of that contention he relied upon the general principle of law—that the grantor of a right cannot himself do anything in derogation of his own grant. The application of that principle must depend upon the extent of the right which the tenant got under his lease, whether by demise or by contract. I see no reason to doubt that such a contract right as the appellant alternatively claims, seeing it may be the subject of express stipulation, may also be derived by reasonable implication from the terms of the lease. But any such implication is attended with difficulty in cases like the present, where certain sources of supply are specified and let. I am not prepared to affirm that a contract to the effect pleaded is implied in the stipulations of the lease of 1889; but I am willing, for the purposes of this appeal, to assume its existence. Upon that assumption, it is incumbent upon the appellant to establish that the result of the respondents' operations has been to diminish the supply of water now finding its way from the spring into the pond, as compared with the supply which came from the same source at and before the date of the lease.

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.
M'Nab v.
Robertson.

I think the necessary effect of Galbraith, the agricultural tenant's, operations, which were subsequent to the granting of the lease, was to convey the water of the spring more rapidly and more directly to the pond, and to prevent its dissipation in the soil or its evaporation. If so, their tendency would necessarily be to increase and not to lessen the quantity of water reaching the pond from the spring. The immediate effect of the respondents' operation which followed was to collect, as soon as they came to the surface, the whole waters issuing from the spring, including a proportion of them which had not previously gravitated towards the pond, and to make them available for transmission in undiminished volume. The water collected in the tank serves, in the first place, to supply a pipe which is not used for agricultural purposes, and the remainder is directly conveyed by another pipe to the tub sunk by Galbraith through which the water of the spring previously entered the pond. A comparison between the quantity of water which now runs over the tub and that which previously escaped from it must therefore afford the means of ascertaining whether there has been a diminution of the supply since the arrangement made by Galbraith was superseded.

The whole evidence which bears on the alleged diminution in the amount of the spring water which now enters the pond, as well as on the amount which entered it before the lease was granted, is,—it may be necessarily,—somewhat vague. In considering that evidence, it is, in my opinion, not immaterial to keep in view the fact that, in the time of his predecessors, the weekly output of the distillery never exceeded 1300 gallons of whisky, whereas during the tenancy of the appellant it was increased to about 1700 gallons, which represents an addition of about 30 per cent to the quantity of water used for distillery purposes at the date of the lease. I have also to observe that the scarcity of water in such an exceptional season as that of the year 1894 cannot throw much, if any, light upon the average quantity derived from the spring at and before the date of the lease—a question which in the absence of more reliable data can, in my opinion, best be solved by ascertaining whether or not the overflow from the tub has been sensibly diminished since, and by reason of the respondents' operations. Upon that point there is conflicting evidence; but, on the whole, I prefer the testimony which is favourable to the respondents; and, in any view, I have no difficulty in holding that the appellant has failed to prove diminution.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed, with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD SHAND.—My Lords, I am also of opinion that this appeal fails and

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.

M'Nab v.
Robertson.

should be disallowed; and I agree with my noble and learned friend who has just spoken in thinking that the water of the spring in question which rises at a comparatively short distance from the pond to which the tenant has a right was not within the subjects which were let or demised by the lease. At the date of the lease, and before the operations either of the tenant, in making a short drain through the ground, or of the landlord at a later period, that water oozed or trickled from the spring into the ground between it and the pond, and lay in that marshy and spongy ground which was afterwards by drainage made of some use for agricultural purposes. It did not, I think, flow, in any proper sense of the term, towards the pond. The witnesses, speaking in Scottish terms, talk of it as water which "siped" or "seeped" down towards the pond; and in Jameson's Dictionary these words are thus described: "Siping or seeping means to ooze or distil very gently as liquids do through a cask which is not quite tight." It being the fact that the water merely oozed or percolated towards the pond through ground of that character, I turn to the lease to see whether such water was demised or let. What is there demised is the distillery as described, and the two ponds specially mentioned, together with "right to the water in the said ponds and in the streams leading thereto." The subjects of the lease appear to me, therefore, to be distinctly defined as being the water in the ponds and the water in the streams leading thereto. I am of opinion that water of the character which has been thus described cannot be regarded as water in any stream leading to the pond; I think that the term "streams" necessarily means flowing water, and not water which oozes from a piece of marshy ground, and that unless water flows more or less in a channel, and continuously, it cannot be described as water that flows in "streams" leading to the ponds.

There remains, however, the question whether, although the water is not included in the grant, there is not from the whole terms of the lease an implied obligation on the landlords that they shall not withdraw water which would naturally find its way into the ponds or streams to an extent which would diminish the supply as it was at the time when the lease was granted, and I am disposed to hold that there is such an obligation implied. The purpose of the lease is the working of a distillery, which, of course, without a proper supply of water could not be carried on. The ponds and streams are themselves directly leased; and, in addition, we find that there is an obligation on the landlord to "maintain the subjects hereby let, with the sluices, water supply, roads, and fences." It appears to me that although the water in question is not directly conveyed, there is an obligation here on the part of the landlords that they will not in any way diminish the water supply.

But, my Lords, assuming such an obligation to exist, this differs very materially in its legal effect from a lease in which the water itself is let. I agree in thinking, as the Lord Ordinary says, that "if the water of the spring was part of the subjects let to the complainer, prima facie the respondents were not entitled to interfere with it in spite of the complainer's remonstrances, and the onus lies with them to shew that the complainer has not been prejudiced by their operations." But if the water is not so let the position of the parties is different. It then follows that the tenant is only entitled to complain, and to have a remedy if he is able to prove, that the landlords have diminished the water supply. This raises a question of fact for the consideration of the House; and in that question it appears to me that the onus is on the tenant, who founds on an obligation not to diminish the water supply. It lies on the tenant to prove that the water supply has been diminished. On that question I agree with my noble and learned friend that the tenant has failed to establish this averment.

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.
M'Nab v.
Robertson.

The Lord Ordinary, in the elaborate judgment which he has delivered, has examined with great care and minuteness the evidence upon this subject. His Lordship, after going in detail over the statements made by the different witnesses, and expressing his views as to the weight to be attached to them, concludes in these terms,—“The question upon the evidence is very narrow, but I have come to the conclusion that the respondents have failed to prove that by interfering with the spring they have not injured the complainer's water supply.” He was then looking at the question with the onus lying upon the landlord according to his view, and all that he is able to say in the result is not that there has been any diminution of the water, but that the landlords have failed to prove that by interfering with the spring they had not injured the water supply.

There are several considerations which are material upon the question of fact. It is to be kept in view that by the recent operations of the landlord which formed the occasion for interdict being applied for, there was a material addition made to the water that was turned towards the pond. From one spring which was close to the pond, the water, in so far as it did not remain in the intervening marshy ground, found its way to the pond; but there were smaller springs surrounding it, the water from which did not find its way to the pond, but in a totally different direction—in the direction of the blacksmith's house which is referred to in the proceedings. I am satisfied upon the evidence that there was a material addition made to the water sent towards the pond by the landlord's operations, for he included the springs to which I now refer. These were caught and enclosed with puddle so as to send the water to the pond.

There is no doubt a conflict of evidence as to the effect which the tank or cistern and pipe put in by the landlord had; but it appears to me that the weight of the evidence is with the landlords rather than with the tenant; at all events, I am satisfied that there is not proof on the part of the tenant sufficient to shew that there was a diminution of the water supply as the effect of the tank and pipe.

My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend in thinking that it is also not unimportant to observe that the operations of the distillery have been largely growing in recent years, requiring therefore a greater supply of water than was previously necessary. That circumstance may have induced some of those who were connected with the distillery to think that the water supply was somewhat diminished, when the truth was that it was rather the distillery's demands which were increased. I also agree in thinking that one cannot judge with any safety of the result of these operations from taking a very dry season, such as that of 1894, as a test for examination, and on the whole I agree that the appellant has failed to prove that

No. 4. this water supply, as it was at the date of the lease, has been diminished by the landlords' operations.

Dec. 15, 1896.
M'Nab v.
Robertson.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords, I am also of opinion that the interlocutor of the Inner-House should be affirmed.

The subjects demised are the distillery of Tambowie, with certain cottages and lands, and with the two ponds numbered 140 and 134 on the Ordnance Map, "together with right to the water in the said ponds and in the streams leading thereto." The first question is the construction of the lease. It appears that the land between the spring in question in this appeal and the lower pond was not included in the land demised to the distillery, and at the date of the lease it was just a marsh through which the water from the spring soaked and percolated, and some of it no doubt ultimately found its way into the pond. But the water did not flow from the spring in any defined or visible channel. The appellant contended that all the sources of supply to the pond, and, if I understood his counsel rightly, all the water which, if left to itself, would by gravitation find its way into the pond, were within the subjects demised. And the Lord Ordinary by his interlocutor found that the water of the spring was a stream leading into the pond within the meaning of the lease, although the said water did not flow into the pond by any definite or visible channel, but by percolation through marshy ground. I find myself unable to agree with the construction put upon the words of the lease by the Lord Ordinary. I think that the word "streams" in the lease is used in its ordinary dictionary sense, and means a rivulet or course of running water, and that neither the spring nor the water soaking or percolating through the marshy ground can with propriety be termed a "stream." I find no context in this instrument to induce me to put what I consider an unusual and inaccurate meaning upon that word. I agree with the opinion of Lord Trayner on this point.

But the lease contains a clause of warrandice against the facts and deeds of the lessors, and the appellant also relies on the well-known maxim—that a grantor may not derogate from his own grant. Like my noble and learned friend opposite I have a difficulty in holding that, when certain feeders or sources of supply are expressly granted, the operation of the lease can be extended by implication so as to impose an additional burden or servitude on the grantor. But I will assume, without deciding, that there is in the present case an implied covenant that the lessors will not by their facts and deeds diminish the quantity of water in the streams or ponds, which, I think, is the most favourable way of stating the case for the appellant. Of course, if the spring and the water from it is in the demise, it is no defence to say, "We give you other water in compensation, and have not on the whole diminished your supply." The lessors on that hypothesis have no right to touch the spring at all. But if the rights of the appellant are in contract, or in implied covenant, the situation is entirely different. The burden is in that case upon him to prove breach of the covenant, or (in other words) to prove that he has suffered a material loss of water by the operations of the respondents. If the Lord Ordinary had thought that the burden of proof was on the appellant, I am not sure that he would have found in his favour on this point. But however that may be, I agree with Lord Young in the Court below, and with your Lordships who have already addressed the House, that on the evidence it is not proved that the respondents by their operations have diminished the water in the streams or ponds, and I agree with the interlocutor pronounced in the Inner-House, and think the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

No. 4.

Dec. 15, 1896.

M'Nab v.
Robertson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I regret to say I am unable to concur in the opinion which the majority of your Lordships entertain. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that “by the lease two ponds are let to the tenant, ‘together with right to the water in the said ponds and in the streams leading thereto.’” That the learned Judge says in his opinion “includes as between lessor and lessee all the sources of supply of the ponds,” and I am of that opinion. I think that the demise of the pond and all streams leading thereto was intended to convey, and did convey, all sources of supply. Though it be true that the word “stream,” in its more usual application, does point to a definite stream within defined banks, I do not think it is confined to that meaning. We speak of a stream of tears flowing from the eyes, and we speak of blood streaming from a vein—I think we may well speak of “streams” in the plural as meaning water passing over the superficies of a plane—we may call such a flow of water a stream. I think that the root idea is water in motion from one place to another as distinguished from stagnant water. Each gush of water from this small spring formed a stream whether big or little, and whether under ground or over ground. I cannot think that any sound distinction can be made between the smallest rill which passes over ground or under ground, in its being a stream or a streamlet, and a rill or other little supply of water coming down, as these sources of supply are alleged to have come down into the pond. But in this case, in order to get rid of the plural “streams,” one has to make two heads of the same stream mean two streams—it is necessary to read the word “streams” in an unnatural sense. There is but one stream in the ordinary sense, and you must read that stream as being two streams, or at least more than one, by taking different parts of the same stream. So far as one can get any light from the nature of the thing, the subject-matter with which the parties were dealing, it appears to me that what the grantor intended to convey to the grantee, and what the grantee, who was a distiller, was getting, was every source of supply which it was possible to get by general words—it was intended that he should get all the water that could be conveyed to him by any general words.

I confess I think that the pollution by the grantee of the other sources of supply is irrelevant. I think the greater flow of water procured by the grantor at other times is irrelevant; and I regret to some extent the decision at which your Lordships have arrived, because I think it will tend to multiply words in every conveyance by the parties in future. If, however, the true construction of the grant be what your Lordships have considered it to be, I should not differ or disagree from what in that case would be the rights of the parties.

APPEAL dismissed, with costs.

FLUX, THOMPSON, & FLUX—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—NICHOLSON & PATTERSON—
TAIT & CRIGHTON, W.S.

No. 5.

Feb. 18, 1897.
Lord Advocate
v. Robertson.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Pursuer), Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Murray—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. B. Finlay—E. Charteris.
MRS ELIZABETH FLEMING OR ROBERTSON (Defender), Respondent.—Shaw, Q.C.—A. M. Anderson.

Revenue—Insurance Policy—Succession-Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 51), secs. 2 and 17.—The Succession-Duty Act, 1853, sec. 2, enacted that,—“Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently . . . shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition . . . a ‘succession.’”

A father who had for many years paid the premiums upon policies of insurance on his own life, assigned the policies, seven years before his death, gratuitously, but absolutely, to his daughter, who, from the date of the assignation, kept up the policies by herself paying the premiums. Upon the father's death the Crown maintained that the assignation of the policies disposed of the moneys payable under them, so as to create a “succession” in the sense of section 2 of the Succession-Duty, 1853, and to make the daughter liable for succession-duty.

Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the daughter did not become entitled to the sum in the policy by the disposition of her father, but partly by her own payment of premiums, and that the section did not apply.

Revenue—Account-duty—Succession-duty—Policy of insurance—Premiums—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 Vict. c. 7), sec. 11.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, section 11, enacted that account-duty should be chargeable upon money received “under a policy of assurance effected by any person dying on or after 1st June 1889 on his life where the policy is wholly kept up by him for the benefit of a donee, whether nominee or assignee, or a part of such money, in proportion to the premiums paid by him, where the policy is partially kept up by him for such benefit.”

A person who had for many years paid the premiums on an insurance policy on his own life for his own behoof, assigned it to his daughter, who thereafter paid the premiums.

In a claim by the Crown against the daughter for account-duty, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the section did not apply, as the payments made by the father were not made for the benefit of a donee.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Morris.
Lord Shand.]

(In the Court of Session, March 20, 1895, 22 R. 568.)

The Lord Advocate appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that in this case there is a plain interpretation to be put upon plain words. I am only reiterating what has been said over and over again in dealing with taxing Acts, when I say that we have no governing principle of the Act to look at, we have simply to go on the Act itself to see whether the duty claimed under it is that which the Legislature has enacted.

This claim has been put in two ways. It appears to me to be susceptible of a very simple answer in respect of either of them.

The first question is whether it comes under the 2d section of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853.

This policy of insurance has been in existence a considerable number of years. The person entitled ultimately to this money herself in one sense created the property—that is, she continued the contract under which, if she continued to pay premiums, certain money would be payable upon the death. She continued that for a period of seven years, and therefore, reading simply the words as they stand, I do not think she has “become beneficially entitled” “upon the death of any person,” because she has become entitled by reason, among other things, of her own payments during the period of seven years; and it appears to me, under that section, in order to make this a “succession” we must introduce some words of this kind,—“disposition of property by reason whereof either partly or wholly a person has become entitled.” If those words were introduced, in a certain sense it is true she did partly become entitled by reason of premiums previously paid, the policy effected and the assignment then made, supposing she continued to pay the premiums. But I find no such words in the statute, and I decline to do anything else than construe the words which I find there. I therefore am of opinion that under that part of the statute it is impossible to maintain the claim of the Crown on this first ground.

I then turn to the alternative claim, which is for account-duty, and it appears to me that it is susceptible of an equally plain answer. I do not know that I can state it more plainly than Lord Adam has done. He says, —“I confess I have never been able to understand in this case how a policy of insurance could be kept up for the benefit of a donee when no donee was in existence.” Here again, in order to apply the tax to the particular case in dispute, one must introduce words into the statute such as, “for the benefit of any existing or future donee or person who may become a donee.” I find no such words. Unless you introduce by construction those words into the statute it is impossible, as Lord Adam says, to understand how it could be kept up for the benefit of a donee when no donee was in existence; I agree with him. The Lord Ordinary’s view seems to have been that the moment a policy of insurance is taken out, the person who takes out the policy keeps it up not only for his own benefit, but for the benefit of some possible donee at a future time. That really is an essential condition of the construction contended for by the Crown, and I am unable to agree with that construction.

Under these circumstances I think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs, and the interlocutors affirmed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

The first question is whether the money payable under the policies was property to which the lady became entitled on the death of her father by reason of the disposition which he made when he assigned the policies to her. I do not intend to lay down any principle or to say anything applicable to any case but the one with which we are dealing. I shall solely consider whether that comes within the words of the enactment or not. In my opinion it does not. I do not think it is accurate to say that the sum payable by the insurance company became hers by reason of the disposition which her father made. It is admitted that the entire sum cannot be said to have become hers by reason of that disposition; she would never have got it but for the fact that the premiums continued to be paid upon the

No. 5.

Feb. 18, 1897.
Lord Advocate
v. Robertson.

No. 5. policy. Therefore the suggestion is that it must be split up into two portions, the one to be attributed to the payment of premiums by her father before the donation, the other to be attributed to the payment of premiums by her afterwards; and that being so divided, upon the former of those sums the duty would be payable. I can find nothing in the words of the Act to warrant and give support to such a contention. For these reasons I think that the appeal entirely fails so far as the Succession-Duty Act is concerned.

Feb. 18, 1897.
Lord Advocate
v. Robertson.

Then it is said that account-duty is payable by virtue of the Act of 1881 and the 11th section of the Act of 1889. In order to bring the case within those statutes it is necessary to shew that the policy, the duty on the proceeds of which is in question, has been either "wholly kept up" "for the benefit of the donee"—which of course is not the case here—or has been partially kept up for the benefit of the donee. In my opinion it would be really an abuse of words to say that the policy was "kept up for the benefit of the donee" at the time when payments were being made by the father of the lady, not for her benefit as far as appears, or for anybody's benefit but his own. The contention is that, because he afterwards creates a donee, the payment of premiums which he made, when for aught that appears he had no donee at all in his mind—I do not mean merely any individual donee, but no notion of creating a donee—must be regarded, if he creates a donee, as having been made for her benefit. I do not think it is reasonable to treat the language of the Act of Parliament in that way. I think that it would really be not using the words of the statute but abusing them if we put such a construction upon them.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and while quite concurring in what has fallen from your Lordships, I think the grounds of judgment have been very clearly and accurately stated by the learned Lord President and Lord Adam in the Court of Session.

APPEAL dismissed, with costs.

FRANCIS F. GORE, Solicitor for England of the Board of Inland Revenue—P. J. H. GRIERSON, Solicitor for Scotland of the Board of Inland Revenue—KEEPING & GLOAG—WILLIAM GUNN, S.S.C.

No. 6.

PERTH GENERAL STATION COMMITTEE (Petitioners), Appellants.—
D.-F. Asher, Q.C.—Balfour, Q.C.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

ALEXANDER ROSS (Defender), Respondent.—Thesiger.

Railway—Right of Railway Company to exclude from stations persons other than travellers.—Railway companies are entitled, as proprietors of their stations, to exclude from them all persons except passengers and persons entitled to enter them in virtue of any order or regulation of the Railway Commissioners.

Railway—Facilities—Jurisdiction—Railway Commissioners.—The Railway Commissioners have an exclusive jurisdiction to determine what rights of access members of the public who are not travellers may have to a railway station.

Process—Interdict—Competency of declarator in process of interdict— No. 6.

Railway.—In a petition by a railway company for interdict to prevent a hotelkeeper, by himself or his servants, entering the station to meet customers arriving by train, except as permitted by the company, held (diss. Lord Morris) that the pursuer was entitled to a declaration that, subject to any order or regulation which might thereafter be made by the Railway Commissioners, the defender, as tenant of his hotel, had no right to enter by himself or his servants, except with leave of the pursuers, and under such conditions as they might prescribe, and that in respect of the declaration it was unnecessary to dispose of the prayer for interdict.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

(In the Court of Session, June 26, 1896, 23 R. 885.)

The pursuers appealed.¹

The proceedings in the action are fully narrated in the opinion of Lord Watson.

Id. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Davey.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord Morris.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I have no doubt whatever of the power of the station committee to regulate the use of the station—"to regulate it even in the case of passengers actually going and arriving"; and these words I have quoted from the judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk. His Lordship adds that they must be subject nevertheless to being put right if they take any steps in the "regulation of the station which are not truly steps of reasonable regulation, but steps which they have no right to take." And so far I do not differ, if those words point to the station committee of the railway company itself being set right by the appropriate tribunal. But I am of opinion that the station is absolutely the property of the railway company, and that the rights of the railway company are just as absolute in the first instance as those of any other proprietor. That by appeal to the appropriate tribunal they may be compelled to permit passengers and traffic under a variety of conditions under proper orders of Court is true; but that against their will any member of the public has a right to force himself upon the platform or into the booking-office I cannot agree.

The public has a right to go, and has a right to enter into a contract with them; and the railway company may be compelled if they refuse, either by action at the suit of the complaining party or by an application to the Railway Commissioners. But I should be sorry to throw any doubt on the absolute right of the railway company in the first instance to regulate their own traffic in their own way, and to refuse access to their station under the circumstances stated in this case. Of course it would be represented as a ludicrous exercise of authority to prescribe the dress in which persons may approach their station; but I can quite understand the inconvenience which might result to the passengers,—that is to say, to the public, if apart

¹ Appellants' Authorities.—Case v. Storey, 1869, L. R., 4 Ex. 319, 326; Barker v. Midland Railway Co., 1856, L. R., 18 C. B. 46; Beadell v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 1857, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 509; Ilfracombe Public Conveyance Co. v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 1868, 1 Nev. and Mac. 61; Painter v. Brighton Railway Co., 1857, 1 Nev. and Mac. 58; Johnson v. Midland Railway Co., 1849, 4 Ex. 367, 372.

Respondents' Authorities.—Mulliner v. Midland Railway Co., 1879, L. R., 11 Ch. Div. 611, 619; Marriott v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 1857, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 499, 1 Nev. and Mac. 47.

No. 6. from the annoyance of actual solicitation of custom for various hotels outside, the persons who rush in to solicit custom should do it by conspicuous badges describing the hotel to which they belong.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

I do not believe that any actual inconvenience to the public can result from the recognition of the right of the railway company to carry on their business in their own way. Their own interest is the best security that their strict legal right will not be abused.

I think there would be some difficulty in framing an interdict in the language originally asked, but the order which your Lordships have agreed to is such that I think no inconvenience will arise; and I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed, and the order which your Lordships have agreed upon, which is as follows, substituted. [His Lordship then read the order.]

LORD WATSON.—This appeal is from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session, which recalls, and in substance reaffirms, two interlocutors pronounced in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire by the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff. Your Lordships are therefore bound to treat the findings of fact contained in the interlocutor appealed from as having the force and effect of the special verdict of a jury. The effect of these findings cannot, in the present case, be fully appreciated without referring to the circumstances which gave rise to the litigation, which appear on the face of the record, and are not in dispute.

The respondent, Alexander Ross, is a hotel-keeper, being tenant of the Royal British Hotel, Leonard Street, Perth, in the vicinity of the General Railway Station, the property and management of which are vested by statute in the appellants, for behoof of certain companies who use the station for the purposes of their traffic. Until the date of this action the appellants, who have a hotel of their own within the limits of the station, permitted all the hotel-keepers in Perth, including the respondent, to have free access to the platforms by themselves and their servants, for the purpose of accompanying their guests to the train by which they were departing, and of meeting them upon their arrival; but that privilege was qualified by the condition that no servant should, on these occasions, wear a distinctive badge or livery.

The respondent was dissatisfied with the condition, of which he admittedly had notice, and on July 1, 1895, he intimated by letter to the appellants' station-master, "I am resolved to send my 'boots' to Perth General Station wearing the badge and uniform of my hotel, whereby my customers may be attended to on arrival here, as they are at other railway and steamboat stations over the country." That intimation was followed up by the respondent sending his "boots," with badge and uniform, to the passenger platforms on numerous occasions during the month of July 1895, who on all these occasions refused to leave the station when requested to do so by the officials of the appellants.

On July 26, 1895, the appellants presented a petition to the Sheriff Court of Perthshire at Perth, craving to have the respondent, by himself or by his servants, interdicted (1) from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, or other works or premises of the appellants;

No. 6.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

(2) in particular from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises therewith connected, while wearing the uniform or badge of the Royal British Hotel; and (3) from waiting the arrival of passenger trains therein for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel. The respondent by his defence denied that he or his servants had committed any trespass, and alleged that the object of the appellants in preventing hotel servants from coming to their platforms with badges, or in uniform, was to give a preference to their own Station Hotel, to his prejudice. His fifth plea in law is to the effect that "the object of the petition being an attempt to restrict the liberty of the defender Ross, or his servants, in the matter of wearing a uniform or badge, is illegal, and the pursuers are not entitled to interdict."

A proof was led before the Sheriff-substitute, who, on 13th February 1896, issued an interlocutor containing various findings of fact and law, by which he refused the prayer of the petition. The basis of the decision is indicated in one of the learned Judge's findings, which is to the effect that the appellants, "as proprietors of said station, hold their said property under the condition of their not preventing its convenient use by any member of the railway travelling public, or with the presence therein of the keeper or servants of the hotel where such traveller has been staying, or which he may propose to go to, except in so far as is necessary for the proper management and control of the station, and for the securing of which the pursuers have power to make such regulations or bye-laws as they may think necessary." The learned Judge appears to have been of opinion that, it not having been proved to his satisfaction that the presence of the respondent in the station by himself or his servants, interfered with the proper control and management thereof, their exclusion would, in point of law, constitute an illegal interference with the convenience of the members of the railway travelling public. The Sheriff, on 17th April 1896, affirmed the judgment of his Substitute, apparently in deference to these or similar considerations.

On appeal to the Court of Session, the Second Division of the Court, on 26th June 1896, by the judgment submitted to review, recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and his substitute, and found in fact,—“(1) That the defender did not, by himself or his servants, enter the pursuers' station except for the purpose of accompanying passengers who were leaving his hotel, or of meeting passengers who had intimated that they were to arrive at the defender's hotel; and (2) that neither the defender nor his servants ever caused any obstruction to or inconvenience at the pursuers' station.” Their Lordships found in law, upon these findings in fact, that the appellants were not entitled to interdict, and they therefore refused the petition, with expenses in the Court of Session and in the inferior Court.

The logical connection between these two findings of fact, and between them and the conclusion of law which is deduced from them, is not supplied by any finding, and is not very apparent. The first would be a pertinent finding if it could be affirmed that every hotel-keeper and his servants have, at common law or by statute, an absolute right to enter any railway station and use its platform if they go there for the purpose of

No. 6.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

accompanying or meeting passengers who are either leaving or have intimated an intention of coming to their hotel, so long as their presence does not cause obstruction or inconvenience. In that case it would be within the competency of an ordinary Court of law to enforce such legal right. It is obvious that the second finding might apply, with equal truth, to many persons who enter a station without having any legal right to do so. The judgment, as framed, does not deal directly with that which is the real and only question in the case, namely, what legal right has the respondent to use the General Station at Perth without the leave and against the will of its proprietors? As to the views entertained by the learned Judges of the Court of Session upon that point, very little information can be gleaned from the opinions which they delivered at the advising of the case. I find in all of them great stress is laid upon the circumstance that it is within the power of the appellants, if they think fit, to frame regulations for the use of their station, and to submit them for the sanction of the Board of Trade; and that these regulations, if approved of by the Board, will be enforceable under penalties. Some of the learned Judges have expressly said, whilst others have plainly suggested, that the proper course for the appellants, in dealing with such claims as are advanced by the respondent, is to proceed by way of regulation, subject to the sanction of the Board of Trade, and not by interdict in a Court of law. I cannot concur in that opinion. It appears to me that such regulations are only intended to govern the conduct of those persons whom the owner of the station cannot exclude, or whom he may choose to admit. When their right is permissive merely, and the permission is conditional, I can see no reason why, in order to enforce the condition, a regulation sanctioned by the Board of Trade should be required. I do not think it was intended by the Legislature that the Board of Trade, in sanctioning regulations of that kind, should have jurisdiction to determine what members of the public, if any, being neither travellers nor interested in goods traffic, shall have the right to use a station, or what facilities are to be allowed to those who are entitled to use it.

The claim which the respondent sets up is, in substance, that he and his hotel servants have an absolute legal right to enter upon and use the passenger platforms of Perth General Station without observing the conditions which the appellants have attached to their admission. In my opinion that is a claim beyond the cognisance of a Court of law, which can only deal with legal rights as they exist, and not with rights as they might possibly have existed if the Railway Commissioners had been applied to and had affirmed their existence. The learned Sheriff-substitute, in affirming by his interlocutor as one of the grounds of his decision that the recognition of the respondent's claims to their full extent would be of convenience to members of what he terms the railway travelling public, does not seem to have thought that he was invading the province of the Railway Commission. Yet it hardly admits of doubt that jurisdiction to determine, in the first instance, whether the respondent has a statutory title to demand the privilege which he claims, and, in the event of his having a title, to determine whether and how far his claim ought to be allowed, belongs exclusively to the Commissioners. Accordingly, these

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

are questions with which I conceive that I have nothing to do in the present case, and upon the merits of which I desire to express no opinion.

Apart from any facilities which might by possibility be given him by the Railway Commissioners, whose intervention has never been invoked either by the respondent or by anyone in his behalf, has the respondent any right, capable of being legally enforced, to use the appellants' station at all or upon any other conditions than the appellants choose to prescribe? That is the cardinal question in this case, and one to which I cannot find that any attempt has been made to give a satisfactory reply in the Courts below. The respondent makes no claim as one of the members of the travelling public, or as a person interested in goods conveyed by rail to or from the appellants' station. His counsel, in the absence of any materials for a stronger argument, very fairly and plausibly maintained that the respondent was invited to use the station, and that, when using it in response to such invitation, he could not be deprived of his natural liberty to clothe his servant with any badge or garment which he chose; and also that the adoption of an hotel badge or uniform was required in the interest and for the convenience of railway travellers who were to arrive at the station on their way to his hotel. The first of these arguments fails, because it is not shewn that any invitation was held out to the respondent which was not coupled with the intimation that he was not to send any servant to the station with a badge or uniform. As regards the second, it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that the respondent is not one of the railway travelling public who frequent his hotel. So far as appears, none of them have complained that facilities to which they were entitled have been withheld from them by the appellants; and, even if they had just cause of complaint, they could have no redress except by an application to the Railway Commissioners.

It is no doubt true that whilst the appellants are vested with the ownership and administration of the station, their statutory powers were conferred upon them by the Legislature, as in the case of railway companies, with a view to the accommodation of the public. But the Legislature has not committed to the ordinary tribunals of the country the duty of determining whether the implied obligation of giving accommodation to the public has been duly fulfilled. When a member of the public having the right to use a railway or a station has reason, or without reason thinks fit, to complain that some facility which he ought to have has been withheld from him, and that an undue preference had been shewn to others in the same position, a Court of law can give him no remedy. He must resort to the tribunal which the Legislature has constituted for that purpose, the Railway Commissioners; and, until they have decided in his favour, he is not in a position to say, and no Court would be justified in holding, that he stands possessed of the right which he asserts.

His claims to use the appellants' station, which have been maintained in defence by the respondent, appear to me to be in excess of any legal right which he possesses. In my opinion, so long as there is no decision to the contrary by the Railway Commissioners in an application to them by some person having a proper title, it is within the discretion of the appellants either to exclude him and his servants from the station, or to admit them

No. 6. upon such conditions as may be thought fit. The right of the respondent, if he can be said to have any right, must depend upon the extent of the licence accorded to him by the appellants. It might have been a reasonable course, had it been adopted at an earlier stage of these proceedings, to stay the present suit until the respondent had an opportunity, either by himself or through some other person having a more direct interest, of endeavouring to bring his claims, such as they are, under the consideration of the Railway Commissioners. But, seeing that the respondent has persisted in relying upon his supposed legal rights, with the barren result of three years' unprofitable litigation, I think your Lordships ought now to dispose of the case as it stands.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

This action, although in the form of a petition for interdict, was obviously brought for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of a Court of law upon the relative rights of the parties as they existed at the date of the petition, and still exist. And, although the conclusions for interdict are so framed that they might be made to square with that view of their relative rights which I have ventured to suggest, I have come to the conclusion that the more expedient course for your Lordships to follow is to make a declaration in regard to the right, or want of right, of the respondent in such terms as will not exclude him from the benefit of any order or regulation which may hereafter be made by the Railway Commissioners. I am satisfied of the competency of taking that course; and I see no reason to apprehend that the respondent will proceed to act in excess of his rights as defined by the House.

LORD DAVEY.—The judgment I am about to read is that of my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten, who is engaged at the present time at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and has requested me to read his opinion.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The real question at issue upon this appeal is a very simple one, though it has been complicated to some extent by the terms in which the pursuers have framed their prayer for relief, and by the mass of irrelevant matter with which both parties have encumbered the case.

The appellants are a committee nominated by three railway companies, whose lines meet at the General Station in Perth. They are incorporated by the Perth General Station Act, 1865. The Act vests the station in them for the benefit of their constituents. The respondent is the lessee and manager of an hotel in Perth known as the Royal British Hotel. On behalf of himself and his servants he claims to be entitled, as of right, to enter the station for the purpose of accompanying hotel visitors to the railway, and also for the purpose of meeting railway passengers who propose to stop at his hotel.

The appellants apparently do not object to the respondent and his servants escorting hotel visitors to the train, nor do they object to the respondent and his servants meeting railway passengers on their arrival, provided the uniform of the hotel is not worn. Reasonably or unreasonably they object to that, and particularly to a cap which is said to display the name and badge of the hotel in a very conspicuous manner.

It is obvious that, if the appellants have the right of excluding from

No. 6.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

their station all persons except those who use or are desirous of using the railway, they may impose on the rest of the public any terms they think proper as the condition of admittance. On the other hand, they can have no power to regulate the dress of persons whom they cannot exclude.

The question, therefore, seems to be this: Is the respondent, when not using or desirous of using the railway, entitled as of right, by himself or his servants, to enter the station? Or, to put the question in simpler form, Are the appellants entitled to exclude all persons other than those who use or are desirous of using the railway?

The learned Judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session have held that the appellants are not entitled to an interdict against the respondent.

Their Lordships find in fact (1) that the defender did not enter the station except for the purpose of accompanying passengers who were leaving his hotel or of meeting passengers who had intimated that they were to arrive at his hotel; and (2) that neither the defender nor his servants ever caused any obstruction or inconvenience at the station. Their Lordships all agree in thinking that the broad question, which seems to me to be the only possible question in the case, was not properly raised; but, with the exception of Lord Trayner, they all express an opinion adverse to the right claimed by the appellants. The Lord Justice-Clerk says,—“This is a somewhat novel case. Indeed,” he adds, “none of the cases which were referred to in the course of the argument come near to it at all.” He holds that a servant of an hotel going with passengers or going to meet passengers is “going on what is plainly, in itself, perfectly lawful business.” So he is, I should say; but it may be that he is going too far when he forces his way into a place which he is forbidden by a competent authority to enter. He says it would be “a very extraordinary thing” if an interdict should be granted against the respondent “from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, and other works or premises of the pursuers.” Why so, I would ask, if the respondent insists on making an entry which is unlawful? “The station,” adds his Lordship, “is a place which he has a right to enter into, and in the course of business may require to enter.” Well, that is just the question. If the station is open, can he enter it at all times and under all circumstances, or only when he is travelling or about to travel by the railway, or can he, as the Court seems to think, give himself the right to enter by attaching himself with or without a special invitation to persons who have the right of entry? It can hardly be enough that in the course of business—that is, for his own profit—he may require to enter. Lord Young says that the general proposition advanced on behalf of the appellants is “not maintainable.” Lord Moncreiff calls it a startling “proposition,” which, as at present advised, he is, he says, not prepared to affirm.

My Lords, I have the misfortune to differ from the learned Judges of the Second Division on almost every point. I venture to think, with deference, that their findings in fact are not relevant. On the other hand, it seems to me that the general proposition which was advanced on behalf of the appellants, and which was put forward plainly enough in argument, whatever may be said about the pleadings, is well founded in law. I think, too, that

No. 6. that general proposition is sufficiently raised by the claim to interdict the defender from unlawfully entering or trespassing on the station, because I agree with the Court of Queen's Bench (*Foulger v. Steadman*¹) in their view that if a man not using or being desirous of using the railway enters upon the railway premises after being forbidden to do so, or stays on the railway premises after being requested to leave, he commits a wilful trespass within the Railway Regulation Act, 1840, and not the less so because he claims some right which cannot exist at law.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

Nor can I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk that the case is a novel one. It seems to me that the question of law was decided, and decided rightly, forty years ago by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Barker v. Midland Railway Co.,² to which, unfortunately, the attention of the learned Judges of the Second Division was not directed. In that case an omnibus proprietor claimed the right to enter a railway station with his omnibus bringing passengers and goods for conveyance by the railway or going to fetch railway passengers. The first count related to passengers; the second to goods. The third count stated that "on divers occasions the plaintiff was desirous of bringing his omnibus into the station for the purpose of taking away on each of such occasions a person who, expecting to be carried and deposited as a passenger by the defendants to and at the said station, had directed the plaintiff to meet such expected passenger with the said omnibus at the said station for the purpose of taking such passenger from the said station." Each of the first three counts alleged a malicious refusal on the part of the railway company to allow the plaintiff to enter. The fourth count alleged that the refusal of the railway company to allow the plaintiff to enter their station was a breach of their obligation under the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31, to afford all reasonable facilities for receiving and delivering traffic. The defendants pleaded that the station was their private property, and demurred to the first three counts on the ground that they did not shew any right on the part of the plaintiff to enter the station, nor, consequently, any wrong by them in preventing him from entering. They demurred to the fourth count on the ground that it did not disclose any cause of action, and was founded on a misapprehension of the statute for facilitating traffic arrangements.

The Court gave judgment unanimously against the plaintiff. "The declaration," said Jervis, C. J., "proceeds upon the assumption that the station is the private property of the railway company, subject to the rights of the public using the railway. It is not contended that the plaintiff was using or seeking to use the railway. What right, then, can he have to say to the company, 'I will use your private property for my profit'? There is no pretence for the action. It has neither principle nor any colour of authority to sustain it. Nor does the 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31, give any such remedy as will support the fourth count." Cresswell, J., observed,—“The plaintiff had no intention to use the railway, and therefore he has experienced no obstruction which gives him any right of action. He merely desired that other persons should use the railway.” “It is said,” added Willes, J., “that it is the duty of a carrier to allow persons who bring passengers or goods to be carried, to enter his premises for the purpose of delivering there the passengers or the goods. It would certainly be somewhat extraordinary if any such right could exist in one to whom the company owes no direct duty, but who merely brings to the station the individual with whom the company contracts."

¹ (1872) L. R. 8 Q. B. 65.

² 18 C. B. 46.

No. 6.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

My Lords, I think the reasoning of the Court of Common Pleas is unanswerable, and I cannot think the learned Judges of the Second Division would have dissented from it if it had been brought to their notice.

It was made a matter of complaint that the appellants did not avail themselves of the summary mode of proceeding given them by the Railway Regulation Act, 1840. But it must be remembered that the respondent had ample warning, and that he insisted on entering the appellants' station as a matter of right. Having regard to the view that has been taken of this case by the different Courts in Scotland before whom the matter has been brought, I think it by no means unlikely that the magistrates would have refused to convict the respondent of wilfully trespassing upon the railway; and I may observe that, although according to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in 1872, to which I have already referred, the respondent was a wilful trespasser within the meaning of the Railway Regulation Act, 1840, there is an earlier decision (*Jones v. Taylor*¹) of the same Court, when presided over by Lord Campbell, in which it was held that the Justices were not bound to find a person who came on the land of a railway company under the belief that he was entitled to do so a wilful trespasser.

If your Lordships maintain the rights asserted by the appellants, I do not think there is any reason to apprehend that the decision will be followed by any of those painful separations between members of the same family which Lord Young seems to contemplate as possible. Railway companies are not insensible to public opinion or indifferent to motives of self-interest. They are more likely, I think, to be too lax than too rigorous in the exclusion of the public from their stations. Everyone knows that there have been occasions when railway stations have been used for purposes somewhat foreign to the accommodation of travellers.

As the respondent does not claim any special or peculiar right to enter upon the appellants' property, but rests his case on the supposed rights of the public, I do not think it is necessary that he should be placed under an interdict. It will probably be sufficient that a declaration should be made in general terms. It seems to me that it would be enough to make a declaration as proposed, to the effect in substance that the appellants are entitled to exclude from their premises all persons other than those who use or are desirous of using one or other of the railways served by their station. I think the appeal should be allowed.

LORD DAVEY.—I will only add, on my own behalf, that I so entirely agree in the judgment of my noble and learned friend, Lord Macnaghten, which I have just read, that I have not thought it necessary to prepare a judgment of my own.

¹ (1858), 1 E. and E. 20.

No. 6. LORD MORRIS.—I am unable to concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

July 27, 1897.
Perth General
Station Com-
mittee v. Ross.

The action in this case is an action upon a petition for interdict. The subject-matter on which the interdict is sought appears in the prayer of that petition. It is that the defender, Alexander Ross, "himself or by his 'boots,'" should be restrained "from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, or other works or premises of the pursuers." Stopping there, it appears to me that that is entirely too vague standing by itself. I apprehend it would be necessary in a petition for interdict to state the circumstances and the specific terms on which the person who is to be interdicted is to be prevented from doing that which he seeks. This is merely a general statement that the defender in the action should not unlawfully trespass upon the station and premises of the pursuers. The mere use of the word "unlawfully" cannot give to it any particular validity. If it were private property absolutely, the entry upon it without the assent of the owner would be unlawful, but in this case it was conceded and admitted in argument on behalf of the appellants that a passenger had a perfect right to go upon the station if he intended to use the railway. Therefore in its generality this statement cannot, in my opinion, be sustained.

And that appears to have been the idea of the pleader, because, having stated it in these general terms, he points out and particularises the matters on which the defender should be interdicted. No. 1 is, "from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises therewith connected, while wearing the uniform or badge of the defender Alexander Ross." The second is, "and from waiting the arrival of passenger trains therein for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel." The answer to the latter of those particular subjects for interdict is that the facts have been found against the appellants. It has been decided as a matter of fact that Alexander Ross or his "boots" were not there for the purpose of obtaining customers, or, as it is familiarly called, touting for customers, but were there for the purpose of meeting customers who had given an intimation that they were coming. Therefore that ground cannot be sustained, as a matter of fact it being found against the appellants.

Therefore, my Lords, the whole petition subsides into that portion of it which deals with the defender, or his servants, entering the station wearing a particular badge. Now, if he had a right to enter the station he had a right to enter it wearing any sort of badge or costume he wished. I do not feel inclined to follow this subject deeper, because it has been fully and adequately dealt with by Lord Trayner in the Court of Session, and I entirely adopt his reasoning. I am, therefore, of opinion that this petition for an interdict could not be sustained.

But, my Lords, it has not been dealt with in your Lordships' House upon the prayer of the petition. It has now been decided, or is about to be decided, that the appellants are not entitled to a grant of their petition of interdict, which, as I understand, would make the respondent amenable to contempt of Court if he violated it; but a declaration is to be made of the rights between the parties. I am of opinion that that should be done, if at all, in a suit instituted by the appellants for that purpose, and that it should not be given as a relief upon a petition of interdict which, as I understand, is an entirely different species of suit, followed by entirely different consequences. There would have been nothing to prevent the appellants, if the order of the Court of Session was affirmed in this case, from instituting upon the grounds I have stated a suit for a declaration of right. What the course that would have been taken in that case by the present respondent would have been I cannot say. It is possible he might resist it—it is probable he would resist it. I do not know, but that is not the case which he came to meet. The case he came to meet was decided in his favour by the Sheriff-substitute of Perthshire, by the Sheriff's Court, and by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Session. In this case, however, the respondent is made to pay the costs of the entire suit in a matter in which there has been, as it appears to my mind, a change of front to a certain extent, inasmuch as the petition of interdict is not persevered in, but a declaration of right is substituted for it.

Upon these grounds, my Lords, I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Session should be affirmed.

"ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that the interlocutor dated June 26, 1896, of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the Second Division, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby, reversed, except in so far as it recalls the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff of Perthshire, dated respectively February 13 and April 17, 1896: And it is declared that, subject to the terms of any order or regulation which may be hereafter made by the Railway Commissioners, the respondent, Alexander Ross, as tenant of the Royal British Hotel, Leonard Street, Perth, has no right, by himself or his servants, to enter upon or use the Perth General Railway Station, except with the leave of the appellants, and under such conditions as they may prescribe: Further declared, that, in respect of the preceding declaration, it is unnecessary to dispose of the conclusions of the present action for interdict: Further ordered, that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Second Division of the Court of Session, with directions to find in terms of the above declarations, and to dismiss the appellants' petition, and to find the defender, Alexander Ross, respondent here, liable to the pursuers, the appellants here, in the expenses of process incurred by them both in the Court of Session and in the Sheriff Court: Further ordered, that the said respondent do repay, or cause to be repaid, to the said appellants the expenses paid by them to the said respondent under the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the Second Division: And it is further ordered, that the said respondent do pay, or cause to be paid, to the said appellants the costs incurred by them in respect of the said appeal to this House."

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

1896-97.

JAMES DRUMMOND, Complainer.—Guy.

ROBERT DUNCAN MACMILLAN (Burgh Prosecutor of Rothesay), Respondent.—Clyde.

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Drummond v.
Macmillan.

Complaint—Bye-law—Stage carriage—Specification.—A bye-law issued by the magistrates of a burgh provided that “every stage carriage . . . shall be driven at a regular and steady rate, not exceeding six miles an hour, upon the journey, except when taking up or letting down passengers.”

The driver of a stage carriage was convicted on a complaint, which set forth that on a certain date and in a certain street within the burgh, and on a certain journey, he did fail “to drive said stage carriage at a regular steady rate not exceeding six miles an hour.”

Conviction quashed on the ground that the complaint was irrelevant for want of specification in respect that the bye-law might be contravened in a variety of different ways, and that the complaint did not specify the particular mode of contravention which it was proposed to prove against the accused.

ON 10th July 1896, James Drummond, bus-driver, 24 Watergate, Rothesay, was charged before the Magistrates of Rothesay on a complaint at the instance of the burgh prosecutor setting forth that the accused “did on 23d June 1896, while in charge as driver thereof of a stage carriage which was appointed by your Honours to depart from the stance at Albert Place, Rothesay, on the journey after-mentioned, at 1.10 afternoon on said date, fail in Albert Place, in the burgh of Rothesay, to drive said stage carriage at a regular and steady rate not exceeding six miles an hour upon the journey from Albert Place, in said burgh, to Mount Stuart, in the parish of Kingarth, Buteshire, contrary to the bye-laws, particularly No. 13 thereof,* made and enacted by the Magistrates of the burgh of Rothesay, on 5th February 1892, and duly confirmed for the regulation of omnibuses or other carriages for the conveyance of passengers plying within the burgh, and drivers, guards, and conductors thereof” in terms of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, whereby the accused was liable, &c.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Ld. Moncreiff.
Lord Low.

Drummond was convicted of the contravention charged and fined.

* The bye-law referred to was in the following terms :—13. “Every stage carriage shall depart from the place where the journey commences, and from any other place within the burgh at which it statedly calls for taking up passengers, punctually at the time fixed for such departure, and shall be driven at a regular and steady rate, not exceeding six miles an hour, upon the journey, except when taking up or letting down passengers. No driver, guard, or conductor shall stop a stage carriage to take up or let down passengers upon a crossing.”

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Drummond v.
Macmillan.

He brought a suspension, pleading, inter alia;—The warrant or sentence complained of ought to be suspended simpliciter, and the complainer ought to be found entitled to expenses, in respect—(1) That the complaint is irrelevant. (2) That there is an insufficient specification of the crime or offence libelled.”

Counsel for the prosecutor, who admitted at the hearing that the foregoing objections had been stated in the Court below, was called upon to support the conviction, and argued;—The complaint was sufficiently specific. The accused was charged with a contravention of a particular bye-law of which he had ample notice, in that he had failed to maintain a steady pace, except when taking up or letting down passengers. It was unnecessary to state whether the contravention consisted in his having driven too fast or too slow.

Counsel for the complainer was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Whatever may have been decided as to certain bye-laws and statutes, and admitting the excellent purpose the bye-law before us had in view, I cannot for one moment hold that this bye-law, which can be contravened in several ways, is sufficiently libelled by saying, “You did, at a particular time and place, fail to drive at a regular and steady rate not exceeding six miles an hour.” The accused may have done that in either of two distinctly opposite ways. He may have driven slower than six miles an hour, but not at a regular and steady rate, or he may have driven at a regular rate of over six miles an hour. Other alternatives may easily be conceived.

Now, in such a case it is not only reasonable, but it is the right of the accused, that such specification be given as may be necessary to let him know what it is that the prosecutor proposes to prove against him.

There may be bye-laws and Acts of Parliament where such specification may be sufficiently given by repeating the words of the bye-law or statute, because there may be no ambiguity or alternative involved. But here, where two modes of contravention are possible, and these modes are contrary to one another, the one a stopping when you are not picking up passengers, and the other a driving at a regular rate of more than six miles an hour, I cannot hold that it is sufficient in the libel to repeat the words of the bye-law.

I am therefore of opinion that the suspension must be sustained.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion, and would merely add that all difficulty in our sustaining the objection is obviated in this case by the objection having been stated at the proper stage in the inferior Court.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the meaning of the bye-law is at all doubtful, but it can be contravened in a variety of ways, and it is the right of the accused to know the kind of case to be made against him.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—J. B. DOUGLAS & MITCHELL, W.S.—Agents.

ANDREW SANGSTER AND OTHERS, Complainers.—Salvesen—Crabb Watt.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—C. N. Johnston, A.-D.

No. 2.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Sangster v.
H. M. Advocate.

Procedure—Separation of trials—Oppression—Fraudulent Bankruptcy.—Five persons were charged upon an indictment which contained eight charges of concealing property falling under bankruptcy, with intent to defraud the creditors of the bankrupt. The charges related respectively to the bankruptcy of one or other of three persons. All the acts charged were of a similar kind and were committed about the same time, and in the same neighbourhood. Two of the bankrupts were among the accused. One of the accused (not a bankrupt) was charged under one of the charges only. Each of the remaining accused was charged under two or more of the charges, but none of the accused was charged under all the charges. At the first diet the Sheriff granted a motion for separation of the trials in the case of the accused who was charged under one charge only, and refused the motion as regarded the remaining accused, three of whom were convicted. Suspension brought on the ground that the Sheriff had acted oppressively in refusing to separate the trials refused.

Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Art and part—Aiding or abetting a fraudulent bankrupt.—Aiding or abetting a bankrupt or insolvent person on the eve of bankruptcy in putting away or concealing his effects with intent to defraud his creditors is a crime at common law.

Robertson v. Caird, Aug. 17, 1885, 5 Couper, 664, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 1, distinguished.

ANDREW SANGSTER, farmer, Artamford, parish of New Deer, Thomas Henderson, farmer, Whitehill, parish of Strichen, John Roger, farmer, Clayfords, parish of Strichen, William Roger, farmer, Burngrains, parish of Old Deer, and John Craib, farmer, Blackhill, Adziel, parish of Strichen, all of Aberdeenshire, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen on an indictment which set forth, “ (first) that William Henderson, farmer, lately residing at Mains of Fortrie, parish of Ellon, Aberdeenshire, and whose present residence is to the complainer unknown, having, on 26th February 1896, declared himself bankrupt, you the said Andrew Sangster did, in concert with the said William Henderson, in February and March 1896, conceal property consisting of two horses and two cows, falling under the bankruptcy of the said William Henderson, in order to defraud the creditors of the said William Henderson, by removing said animals from the farm of Mains of Fortrie, parish of Ellon aforesaid, then occupied by the said William Henderson, to the premises at Artamford, parish of New Deer aforesaid, occupied by you the said Andrew Sangster; (second) that the said William Henderson having declared himself bankrupt as aforesaid, you the said Andrew Sangster and Thomas Henderson did, in concert with the said William Henderson, in February and March 1896, conceal property, consisting of a horse and a cow, falling under the bankruptcy of the said William Henderson, in order to defraud the creditors of the said William Henderson, by removing said horse from the said farm of Mains of Fortrie to Artamford aforesaid, thence to the farm of Milltown, Anquhorthie, parish of Strichen, Aberdeenshire, occupied by James Cameron, farmer, and thence to the farm of South Littlehill, parish of New Deer aforesaid, occupied by John Fowlie, farmer, and by removing said cow from said farm of Mains of Fortrie to Artamford aforesaid, thence to Maud in the said parish of

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Ld. Moncreiff.
Lord Low.

No. 2.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Sangster v.
H. M. Advocate.

New Deer, and thence to the farm of Whitehill aforesaid, occupied by you the said Thomas Henderson ; (third) that you the said John Roger having, on 6th January 1896, declared yourself bankrupt, and having thereafter, on 25th January 1896, been declared bankrupt, you the said John Roger and Thomas Henderson did, in January or February 1896, conceal property consisting of a horse, falling under the bankruptcy of the said John Roger, in order to defraud the creditors of the said John Roger, by removing said horse from the farm of Clayfords, in the parish of Strichen aforesaid, occupied by you the said John Roger, to the farm of Whitehill in the said parish of Strichen, occupied by you the said Thomas Henderson ; (fourth) that you the said John Roger having declared yourself bankrupt as aforesaid, you the said John Roger and Andrew Sangster did, in February or March 1896, conceal property consisting of a cow, falling under the bankruptcy of the said John Roger, in order to defraud the creditors of the said John Roger, by removing said cow from the said farm of Clayfords to Artamford aforesaid, thence to the farm of Dykeside, Artamford, in the said parish of New Deer, occupied by John Milne, farmer, and thence to the farm of Mains of Asleed, parish of Monquhitter, Aberdeenshire, occupied by Alexander Ironside, farmer ; (fifth) that you the said John Roger having declared yourself bankrupt as aforesaid, you the said John Roger and John Craib did, in April and May 1896, conceal property consisting of " certain specified articles of harness " falling under the bankruptcy of the said John Roger, in order to defraud the creditors of the said John Roger, by removing the same from the said farm of Clayfords to the farm of Blackhill, Adziel, parish of Strichen aforesaid, occupied by you the said John Craib ; (sixth) that you the said William Roger having, on 3d March 1896, declared yourself bankrupt, you the said William Roger and Andrew Sangster did, in February or March 1896, conceal property consisting of 1 cow and 3 stirks, falling under the bankruptcy of the said William Roger, in order to defraud the creditors of the said William Roger, by removing said cow and 3 stirks from the farm of Burngrains in the parish of Old Deer, Aberdeenshire, then occupied by you the said William Roger, to Artamford aforesaid, occupied by you the said Andrew Sangster ; (seventh) that you the said William Roger having declared yourself bankrupt as aforesaid, you the said William Roger did, in February or March 1896, conceal property consisting of " certain specified articles of furniture " falling under your bankruptcy, in order to defraud your creditors, by removing the same from the said farm of Burngrains to the dwelling-house at Auchreddie, parish of New Deer aforesaid, occupied by George Milne, mason, and thence to the farm of Bruxie, parish of Old Deer aforesaid, occupied by James Scott, farmer ; (eighth) that you the said William Roger having declared yourself bankrupt as aforesaid, you the said William Roger, Andrew Sangster, and Thomas Henderson did, in April 1896, conceal property consisting of a horse, falling under the bankruptcy of the said William Roger, in order to defraud the creditors of the said William Roger, by removing said horse from the farm of Burngrains aforesaid to Artamford aforesaid, thence to the farm of Whitehill aforesaid, occupied by you the said Thomas Henderson, and thence to Braeside, New Byth, parish of King Edward, Aberdeenshire, occupied by George Stewart, farmer."

At the first diet on 14th July 1896 the relevancy of the indictment was objected to on behalf of all the accused, on the ground that " it was incompetent to charge the accused under one indictment for what were distinctly separate charges." No other objection to the relevancy of the complaint was stated in the Sheriff Court.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown) sustained the objection as regarded the accused John Craib, who was associated with John Roger in the fifth charge, and the procurator-fiscal thereupon deserted the diet against Craib pro loco et tempore.

The rest of the accused pleaded not guilty.

A motion for a separation of the trials was made for the accused, but refused by the Sheriff.

The trial proceeded upon 27th July and following days, and was concluded at two o'clock in the morning of the 30th. The following was the verdict:—"The jury, by a majority, find the pannel Andrew Sangster guilty of the first charge in the indictment as libelled, and also of the second charge in the indictment in respect of the cow libelled, and otherwise find the said second charge, as regards the horse, not proven; by a majority find the said Andrew Sangster guilty of the fourth charge in the indictment as libelled; unanimously find the sixth charge against the said Andrew Sangster in the indictment not proven; and unanimously find him not guilty of the eighth charge in the indictment; by a majority find the pannel Thomas Henderson guilty of the second charge in the indictment, in respect of the cow there libelled, and unanimously find the said charge, as regards the horse there libelled, not proven as against the said Thomas Henderson; by a majority find the said Thomas Henderson guilty of the third charge in the indictment as libelled, and unanimously find him not guilty of the eighth charge in the indictment; unanimously find the pannel John Roger guilty of the third and fifth charges in the indictment as libelled, and by a majority find the said John Roger guilty of the fourth charge in the indictment as libelled; unanimously find the sixth charge in the indictment, as against the pannel William Roger, not proven; and unanimously find the said William Roger not guilty of the seventh and eighth charges in the indictment."

Sangster was sentenced to six months', John Roger to five months', and Thomas Henderson to two months' imprisonment. William Roger was assolizied.

They brought a bill of suspension, in which they pleaded;—The said conviction and sentence were illegal and unwarrantable, and ought to be suspended as craved, in respect (a) the said proceedings were oppressive; (b) the libel was irrelevant; (c) the complainers were not charged with or convicted of a crime known to the law of Scotland.

Argued for the complainers;—(1) An individual might be charged in one indictment with many, even dissimilar, crimes. But here there was an accumulation of charges involving different acts and different individuals. The accused were not all implicated in the various acts charged—there was not even one charge which embraced the whole of the accused—and it was not said that there existed amongst the accused anything of the nature of a confederacy to commit the crime of fraudulent concealment. By the joint trial the complainers were deprived of the benefit of each other's evidence; and besides, the duration of the trial, and the conjoining of so many charges relating to three different bankruptcies, must have tended to confuse the minds of the jury and thus prejudice the complainers' chance of a fair trial. The Sheriff-substitute had acted oppressively

No. 2.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Sangster v.
H. M. Advoca-
cate.

No. 2.
—
Nov. 2, 1896.
Sangster v.
H. M. Advocate.

in not separating the trials.¹ (2) The indictment was irrelevant. The first charge stated that William Henderson having, on 26th February 1896, declared himself bankrupt, Sangster, in February and March 1896, concealed his property. That was capable of being read as a charge relating to a period when there was no bankruptcy or insolvency, and when there could be no crime on the part of anyone except the bankrupt or insolvent.² (3) It was not said that the complainants had "knowingly" defrauded. Knowledge was of the essence of the charge. (4) Aiding or abetting a bankrupt or insolvent person on the eve of bankruptcy in putting away or concealing his effects with intent to defraud was not a crime at common law.³

Argued for the respondent;—The question of separation of trials was one which the Court always left to the discretion of the Sheriff, and in this case he shewed that he had applied his mind to it, because he had separated the trials as regarded Craib. The indictment disclosed what was, on the face of it, a conspiracy among the accused. The offences took place about the same time, the acts being of the same kind, and each of the accused was more or less involved in all the acts charged.⁴ (2) The indictment was relevant. Fairly read, the first charge meant that Sangster had been guilty of removal and concealment after the bankruptcy. In any case the objection should have been taken in the Court below. (3) The word "knowingly" was unnecessary.⁵ (4) It was a crime at common law to conceal the effects of a bankrupt or insolvent person, on the eve of bankruptcy, with intent to defraud the creditors. *Robertsons v. Caird*⁶ was a case on the construction of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1878.

LORD MONCREIFF.—This bill of suspension is presented by three parties, Andrew Sangster, Thomas Henderson, and John Roger. In the indictment two other parties, John Craib and William Roger were charged, but we have nothing to do with them. At the first diet a motion was made for separation of the trials of the various prisoners, and the Sheriff-substitute, after consideration, sustained the motion with regard to John Craib, whose name appears only in the fifth charge, and the diet against him was deserted pro loco et tempore. The result of the trial of the other parties was that William Roger was acquitted, and therefore we have only to deal with the cases of Andrew Sangster, Thomas Henderson, and John Roger, who were convicted.

¹ Hume on Crimes, vol. ii. pp. 173 and 174; Marr v. Stuart, Feb. 4, 1881, 4 Couper, 407, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 21; Kerr v. Phyn, March 21, 1893, 3 White, 480, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 60; cf. H. M. Advocate v. Parker and Barrie, Nov. 5, 1888, 2 White, 79, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 5; Rowbotham, March 19, 1855, 2 Irvine, 89.

² Clendinnen v. Rodger, Dec. 2, 1875, 3 Couper, 171, 3 R. (Just. Cases) 3; H. M. Advocate v. Sneden, April 10, 1874, 2 Couper, 532, 1 R. (Just. Cases) 19.

³ Robertsons v. Caird, August 17, 1885, 5 Couper, 664, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 1.

⁴ Hume on Crimes, vol. ii. p. 117; Coupland v. Beattie, April 14, 1863, 4 Irvine, 370; Marr v. Stuart, 4 Couper, 407, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 21; McGrath and Others v. Wingate, May 15, 1869, 1 Couper, 260.

⁵ Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 8; H. M. Advocate v. Swan, Dec. 10, 1888, 2 White, 137, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 34; H. M. Advocate v. Bourdais, Jan. 28, 1889, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 68.

⁶ Robertsons v. Caird, 5 Couper, 664, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 1.

No. 2.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Sangster v.
H. M. Advo-
cata.

Now, the first ground of suspension, which has been very fully argued, is that the conduct of the Sheriff in refusing to allow a separation of the trials was oppressive. A motion for separation of trial is very frequently made, but very seldom granted. Still more seldom does this Court quash a conviction on the ground that it has been refused. There may be other cases, but at present I know of no case except Kerr v. Phym.¹ The reason is that the question is one for the discretion of the presiding Judge, and unless it can be made out conclusively that he was wrong in the exercise of that discretion, we will not interfere. Now, in the present case it would seem that the Sheriff has carefully applied his mind to the question, with the result that he has allowed a separate trial in the case of John Craib, and refused it in the case of the other prisoners. All the accused were represented by competent procurators. There is therefore prima facie no sign of oppressive conduct. But we are bound to look at the indictment to see whether the case is one in which any real injustice would be done by refusal to separate the trials. The case is undoubtedly a peculiar one. There are three bankruptcies, those of William Henderson, John Roger, and William Roger, and there are five prisoners; but then we find that all the acts charged are of the same kind, and amount to a charge of fraudulent bankruptcy, by putting away and concealing the bankrupt's effects from the creditors. We find also that all the offences were committed about the same time. What is still more peculiar is that Andrew Sangster, Thomas Henderson, and John Roger were all more or less involved in all the acts alleged. Thus, in the first two charges, relating to the bankruptcy of William Henderson, Andrew Sangster and Thomas Henderson are charged. Turning to the bankruptcy of John Roger, we find that Andrew Sangster, Thomas Henderson, and John Roger are all implicated in the charges connected therewith. And in the bankruptcy of William Roger we find Thomas Henderson and Andrew Sangster again involved. That being the case as appearing on the face of the indictment, it indicates a close connection and contingency between the various charges. That in itself is a reason for a single trial stronger than we find in most cases where prisoners are charged together. The passage quoted from Hume seems to me to apply directly to the present case. He says (vol. ii. p. 177)—“For although, as I have said, our practice does disown this sort of cumulation in ordinary cases, and in respect to crimes and persons nowise connected with each other, yet in numerous instances the prosecutor has been allowed to accumulate his charges on account of an affinity among the pannels or their crimes, much less intimate than in the case of these two riots. And, indeed, wherever there was any natural contingency of the matters charged, as when the several crimes arose out of each other, or were directed towards the same object, or when the several pannels appeared to be in a society for committing crimes of a certain sort—nay, in some instances, where the offences were only of the same class, and were not the result of any such confederacy, or where all the pannels were charged with some of the articles in the libel though not with others—in any of these cases it seems to have been nowise unusual to allow the cumulated action.” It seems to me that on the face

¹ 3 White, 480, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 60.

No. 2.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Sangster v.
H. M. Advo-
cate.

of this indictment there is disclosed a confederacy among the prisoners to assist in concealing the effects of those of them who were or pretended to be bankrupt from their creditors. We have not the evidence before us, neither had the Sheriff, but I think that, looking to the indictment, the Sheriff acted quite properly in refusing separation of the trials.

The second ground of suspension is an objection to the relevancy of the indictment. Such an objection ought to have been taken in the Court below. It would require an extreme case for us to sustain an objection of this kind when it was not so taken—a case in which the indictment was practically a nullity, no crime being charged. Now, let us examine the objections to relevancy which have been made. First, it is said that it is not a crime for a person who is not insolvent to conceal his effects from his creditors, nor is it a crime to assist a person in that position in such concealment. On that assumption, it is argued that this indictment admits of being read as applying to a period when there was no bankruptcy and no insolvency. I think this objection at most amounts to want of specification. On reading the indictment I think that the natural meaning of the charges is that the acts of concealment took place after bankruptcy was declared. Taking the first charge, the statement is that William Henderson, farmer, having “on 26th February 1896, declared himself bankrupt, you, the said Andrew Sangster, did, in concert with the said William Henderson, in February and March 1896, conceal property consisting of two horses and two cows, falling under the bankruptcy of the said William Henderson, in order to defraud the creditors of the said William Henderson, by removing the said animals from the farm of Mains of Fortrie, then occupied by the said William Henderson, to the premises at Artamford, occupied by you the said Andrew Sangster.” Now, I think the fair meaning of that charge of removal and concealment is removal and concealment after the bankruptcy. The words of the third charge lead to the same result. Even if there were any doubt about this, I think it was the duty of the agents for the prisoners to state the objection at the trial. They did not do so, and I think the argument fails in shewing that what is charged does not necessarily constitute an indictable offence. I recognise the authority of the case of Clendinnen v. Rodger,¹ but the present case is a charge against a debtor of putting away his effects after his bankruptcy.

With regard to the argument on relevancy, in respect that the word “knowingly” is not inserted in the indictment, it is sufficient to refer to section 8 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887.

There is one other argument which also was not stated before the trial, and which, if sound, would at once have set free two at least of the complainers, viz., that there is no such crime as aiding and abetting a bankrupt or insolvent person in concealing his effects in order to defraud his creditors. That is new to me; there is no doubt that the putting away by a bankrupt or insolvent person on the eve of bankruptcy of his goods, with intent to defraud his creditors, is a criminal offence at common law, and I cannot see any distinction between aiding and abetting the commission of that offence and aiding and abetting the commission of any other crime. We have only been referred to one authority on the point—Robertsons v. Caird.² Of course we should be bound to follow that case if it were applicable, but in my opinion it is not in point. In that case the libel contained first a common law charge of fraudulent concealment of property by a person insolvent or on the eve or in contemplation of bankruptcy, as also a charge of certain statutory crimes set forth in section 13 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1878, subsecs. (a) (3) and (b) (5). The parties charged were the insolvent David Robertson and Robert Robertson, who was charged with aiding and abetting David in putting away the goods, well knowing him to be insolvent. Both pannels were found "guilty as libelled." On a suspension being brought the conviction and sentence were suspended as regarded Robert Robertson, the ground of judgment being that the statutory charges on which he was convicted were offences which in the opinion of the Court could in terms of the statute only be committed by a debtor in a process of sequestration or cessio. The Court held that the terms of the statute excluded the liability of anyone else, and as the conviction, though it covered a charge at common law, was general, it was suspended in toto as regarded Robert Robertson.

¹ 3 Coup. 121, 3 R. (Just. Cases) 3.

² 5 Coup. 664, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 1.

That case, as I have said, has no application where the charge is that the accused is art and part in the commission of a crime at common law.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the bill of suspension should be refused.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD LOW concurred.

THE COURT refused the suspension.

ALEXANDER ROSS, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

ANDREW MORTON, Appellant.—M'Lennan.
PETER FYFE, Respondent.—Lees—Salvesen.

No. 3.

Public Health—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 63), secs. 13 and 14—Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879 (42 Vict. c. 30), sec. 3—Analysis—Division of sample—Milk—Statute—Incorporation.—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, creates certain offences connected with the sale of food and drugs, and, inter alia, by sec. 6 subjects to a penalty any person who sells, to the prejudice of the purchaser, any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality, of the article demanded by the purchaser.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

Sec. 13 enacts that any of certain specified public officials "may procure any sample of food or drugs, and if he suspects the same to have been sold to him contrary to any provision of this Act, shall submit the same to be analysed," and then follow certain provisions as to the conduct of the analysis.

Section 14 enacts:—"The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed, or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent."

The Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3, enacts that any of certain officials (being those specified in sec. 13 of the Act of 1875) "may procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of

No. 3.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

delivery to the purchaser or consignee, in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee, of such milk; and such "official" "if he suspects the same to have been sold contrary to any of the provisions of the principal Act [of 1875] shall submit the same to be analysed, and the same shall be analysed, and proceedings shall be taken, and penalties on conviction be enforced, in like manner in all respects as if such "official" "had purchased the same from the seller or consigner under section 13 of the principal Act."

An official procured a sample of certain milk in terms of section 3 of the Act of 1879, but did not notify his intention to have the same analysed, or follow out the other procedure specified in section 14 of the Act of 1875. The consigner of the milk was convicted of having sold the milk to the official in contravention of section 6 of the Act of 1875.

In an appeal, held that section 14 of the Act of 1875 did not apply to cases in which an official had procured a sample of milk under section 3 of the Act of 1879; and that the conviction was valid.

Rouch v. Hall, L. R., 6 Q. B. Div. 17; Harris v. Williams, 6 T. L. R. 47; Rolfe v. Thompson, L. R. [1892], 2 Q. B. 196, followed.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

On 4th May 1896 Andrew Morton, farmer, Inchbelly Farm, Kirkin-tilloch, Stirlingshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, on a summary complaint, at the instance of Peter Fyfe, Inspector of Nuisances of the city of Glasgow, setting forth that the accused "having, in pursuance of a contract of sale with William Pitcairn Robley, wholesale and retail dairyman," Glasgow, "forwarded, on the 1st of April 1896, to the said William Pitcairn Robley, eight gallons of sweet milk to the terminus of the tramway rails at No. 594 Springburn Road, Glasgow; and William Thomas Armstrong, ordinary sanitary inspector or police-constable, Glasgow, having, on behalf of the complainer, procured on said date, at the said terminus of the tramway rails, No. 594 Springburn Road aforesaid, being the place of delivery of said eight gallons of sweet milk, a sample of the said sweet milk for the purposes of the Acts after mentioned, and the said sample having, on analysis as prescribed by said Acts, been found to contain 14 per cent or thereby of added water, the said Andrew Morton did thus at said terminus of the tramway rails, No. 594 Springburn Road aforesaid, time above libelled, within the meaning of section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sell to the said William Thomas Armstrong for the complainer, to his prejudice, said sample of sweet milk, the same not being of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, in respect that it contained 14 per cent or thereby of added water"; then followed two similar charges with respect to two other butts of milk that were delivered by the accused to Robley at the same time and place: "all contrary to the Acts 38 and 39 Victoria, chapter 63, section 6, and 42 and 43 Victoria, chapter 30, section 3, whereby the said Andrew Morton for each of said offences is liable," &c.*

* The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), creates certain offences connected with the sale of foods and drugs, and, inter alia, by sec. 6 enacts,—“No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser under a penalty,” &c.

Sec. 13 enacts,—“Any medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or inspector of weights and measures, or any inspector of a market, or any police-constable, under the direction and at the cost of the Local Authority appointing such officer, inspector, or constable, or charged with the execu-

No. 3.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined £4 for each offence.

He obtained a case. The case stated by the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

bore :—

"Before the trial it was objected for the appellant that the trial should not proceed on account of the failure of the respondent, or person employed by him, to offer to divide each of the samples of milk taken into three parts, as, he averred, was required by section 14 of the said Act 38 and 39 Victoria, chapter 63, in order, if required to do so, to deliver one part of each sample to the appellant's servant at the time the samples were taken.

"I repelled said plea and proceeded with the trial. As bearing on this plea, the following facts were admitted or proved :—

"Two of the respondent's inspectors attended on the morning of Wednesday, 1st April 1896, at Springburn Road about 6 A.M. There they found one of Robley's milk-carts used for distributing the milk in the city waiting the arrival of the appellant Morton's milk. Shortly afterwards a van arrived in charge of a lad from the appellant's farm. This van contained, inter alia, three butts of sweet milk, each containing about eight gallons, consigned to Robley. The contents of the said three butts of sweet milk were about to be delivered by the appellant's man to Robley's man on the street, by being emptied from tion of this Act, may procure any sample of food or drugs, and if he suspects the same to have been sold to him contrary to any provision of this Act, shall submit the same to be analysed by the analyst of the district or place for which he acts, or if there be no such analyst then acting for such place, to the analyst of another place, and such analyst shall, upon receiving payment as is provided in the last section, with all convenient speed analyse the same, and give a certificate to such officer, wherein he shall specify the result of such analysis."

Sec. 14 enacts,—“The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed, or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent.

"He shall afterwards retain one of the said parts for future comparison, and shall submit the third part, if he deems it right to have the article analysed, to the analyst."

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 3, enacts,—“Any medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or inspector of weights and measures, or any inspector of a market, or any police-constable, under the direction and at the cost of the Local Authority appointing such officer, inspector, or constable, or charged with the execution of this Act, may procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee, in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee of such milk; and such officer, inspector, or constable, if he suspect the same to have been sold contrary to any of the provisions of the principal Act, shall submit the same to be analysed, and the same shall be analysed, and proceedings shall be taken, and penalties on conviction be enforced, in like manner in all respects as if such officer, inspector, or constable had purchased the same from the seller or consigner under section 13 of the principal Act.”

No. 3.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

the butts on the appellant's van into the butts or barrels of Robley's milk van. As the milk was being so poured out, the respondent's inspector drew a sample from each butt into three bottles. It was on the samples so taken from each of the three butts that the three charges in question were founded. The said three samples the inspector sealed up and took the same morning to Dr John Clark, the city analyst, who opened the bottles, and at the request of the inspector divided the contents of each bottle and retained one half of each for analysis. He then resealed the bottles with the other half of the milk in them and returned them to the inspector, who produced them at the trial along with the analyst's report applicable to each portion of milk retained by him. At the time of taking the samples from the butts or afterwards, the respondent's inspector did not offer to the appellant or to the lad in charge of the appellant's van to divide each sample into three parts."

The question of law was,—“Whether the conviction in question is invalid by reason of the failure of the respondent or those acting for him to offer to divide each of the samples of milk in question taken into three parts, in order, if required to do so, to deliver one part of each sample to the appellant's servant.”

Argued for the appellant;—The offence here charged was constituted by section 6 of the original Act of 1875. Section 13 of that Act made provision for certain public officials procuring samples of food or drugs by actual purchase, and for the analysis of such samples when purchased. Then came section 14, which was undoubtedly, so far as the original Act went, a condition of any prosecution under section 6, on account of a sale to a public official under section 13. Coming next to the Act of 1879, the true view of section 3 of that Act was that it formed an addition to section 13 of the original Act, entitling the public officials mentioned in section 13 to procure samples of milk in course of delivery, and treat them as if they had been purchased. Section 13 was expressly referred to, because that was the section of the original Act which dealt with purchases by public officials. Express reference to section 14 of the Act of 1875 was not necessary in order to make section 14 applicable to prosecutions on account of milk procured under section 3, because once it was fixed that the procuring of milk under section 3 was to be regarded as a sale warranting a prosecution under section 6 of the original Act, then all the incidents and conditions of such a prosecution became applicable, including the provisions of section 14. The English Courts, in the decisions founded on by the respondent,¹ had applied too strict a construction. It was true that section 3 taken literally might mean that the whole sample should be submitted to analysis, but the same might be said of section 13 of the Act of 1875, yet it was past question that section 13 was controlled by section 14. “Proceedings” in section 3 did not mean judicial proceedings only; it included also proceedings for the division of the sample, as provided in section 14. The object of section 14, which was to give the accused an opportunity of obtaining an analysis of his own, was as applicable to cases under section 3 as to cases under section 13.

Argued for the respondent;—This question had been settled in England adversely to the contention of the appellant.¹ The grounds upon which the English decisions proceeded were well founded, and ought to be adopted here. The utmost that could be said for the appellant was that the Act was capable of two constructions. That being so, the construction which would best enable the Act to be carried out ought to be adopted. But, as had been pointed out in the English cases, to read section 14 into section 3 would practically make section 3 a dead letter, for how could the official procuring the sample "forthwith" notify to the seller (that was to say, the consigner), or his agent, and offer to divide the sample, and deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent, if, as would frequently be the case, the seller lived in a distant part of the country and had no agent on the spot for the purposes of such notification, &c. In dubio, at all events, the English decisions ought to be followed, the statute being applicable to the United Kingdom.

¹ Rouch v. Hall, 1880, L. R., 6 Q. B. Div. 17; Harris v. Williams, 1889, 6 Times Law Reports, 47; Rolfe v. Thompson, L. R. [1892], 2 Q. B. 196.

At advising,—

No. 3.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the appellant, who carries on business as a farmer in Stirlingshire, had a contract by which he had to deliver a quantity of milk to a dairyman in Glasgow. On a certain day the milk in transit was stopped at the place of delivery, and there the official authorised to do such an act took a quantity for analysis. It was duly analysed, and was found to be diluted with water, and there was a prosecution and conviction.

The question in the case is, whether that conviction is bad in respect that the statutory procedure under the Act of 1875 was not carried out, by which, on taking a sample of that kind, a division should be made into three parts, and one of these parts delivered to the opposite party. The contention on behalf of the appellant is that the Act of 1879 says that "proceedings shall be taken and penalties on conviction be enforced in like manner in all respects as if such officer, inspector, or constable had purchased the same from the seller or consigner under section 13 of the principal Act," and that this proceeding was not according to the former Act in respect of the non-division of the samples.

This is an important question, and had it not been one which has already been made matter of decision in the Supreme Courts of the country, I should think one requiring very careful attention. What opinion I might form upon it I do not say if the question had not already been made matter of decision. There are cases in England deciding the point unfavourably to the view taken by the appellant. And while we are by no means bound to follow these decisions, it is of the greatest possible consequence that the administration of the same law should be uniform in both countries if possible. I have considered the matter very carefully in this view, Can it be said that these Acts of Parliament cannot be read in the sense of the decision pronounced in the Court below? I have come to the conclusion that they can be so read.

Having come to that conclusion, and considering that they have been so read by Courts of equal jurisdiction with ourselves, I think we ought not to disturb the law thus established, and therefore the proper course is to refuse this appeal.

LORD TRAYNER.—The facts in this case are not in dispute. The appellant, a farmer in Stirlingshire, was under contract to deliver a quantity of milk to a retail dairyman in Glasgow. On 1st April last part of the milk

No. 3.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

so contracted for reached Glasgow, and while still under the control of the person sent by the appellant in charge thereof, samples of it were taken by an inspector acting under the powers conferred by the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act of 1879. The inspector did not offer to divide the samples taken by him, or give any part thereof to the person in charge of the milk as representing the appellant, as required by the 14th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. His failure to do so is said by the appellant to vitiate the whole proceedings taken against him, and consequently to entitle him to have the conviction which followed set aside. He maintains this on the ground that under the Act first above cited (the Amendment Act) it is provided (sec. 3) that "proceedings shall be taken, and penalties on conviction be enforced, in like manner in all respects as if such officer, &c., had purchased the same from the seller or consigner under section 13 of the principal Act," and that the "proceedings" here referred to include division of the sample taken in the manner provided in section 14 of the principal Act. I think there is great force in the appellant's contention, and had the question been quite an open one, one might have been disposed to give effect to it. But the same question has been more than once submitted to judicial consideration in England, and the judgments pronounced there have been adverse to the appellant. I cannot say that the reasons assigned for these judgments are so conclusive as to command my assent to them, but I would hesitate, in respect of the doubts I entertain, to pronounce a judgment on the meaning and construction of an imperial statute different from that which has already been pronounced in England. I am therefore prepared, in deference to the cases cited, to answer the question now put to us in the negative.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Having regard to the construction of the third section of the Act of 1879 which has been adopted by the English Courts, and the practice which has followed upon their decisions, I agree that we ought to adopt that construction unless we are clearly satisfied that these decisions are erroneous. Now, I confess I have great hesitation in following these decisions, the first of which, Rouch v. Hall,¹ was decided ex parte. The third section of the Act of 1879 provides that "after a sample has been taken of the milk, the person who takes it shall submit the same to be analysed, and proceedings shall be taken, and penalties on conviction be enforced, in like manner in all respects as if such officer, inspector, or constable had purchased the same from the seller or consigner under section 13 of the principal Act"—that is, the Act of 1875. Section 14 of the principal Act provides that any person purchasing under section 13, if he intends to submit the milk to an analyst, "shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts." Now, without unduly straining the words of section 3 of the Act of 1879, the direction that "the same shall be analysed," and so forth, "in all respects as if the purchase had been made under section 13 of the Act of 1875," might be held as including the preliminary steps which are enjoined by section 14 of the Act of 1875.

¹ L. R., 6 Q. B. D. 17.

I do not think that there would be any great difficulty in carrying out, in regard to cases covered by section 3 of the Act of 1879, the directions in section 14 of the Act of 1875. But at the same time the later enactment, taken literally, relates to analysis—actual analysis and proceedings following upon analysis. The reasons suggested by the English Judges for adopting different procedure with regard to such cases from that enforced in regard to cases falling under the Act of 1875 are possibly correct, and although I am not quite satisfied, I agree with your Lordships that for the sake of uniformity we should adopt the same construction and sustain the conviction and dismiss the appeal.

No. 3.

Nov. 2, 1896.
Morton v.
Fyfe.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative and dismissed the appeal.

J. DOUGLAS GARDINER & MILL, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

GAVIN RITCHIE M'CALLUM, Complainer.—Cullen.

DAVID BARROWMAN, Respondent.—Guy.

No. 4.

Nov. 3, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Barrowman.

Conviction—Penalty—Omission of statutory award of penalty—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 108), sec. 26.—The Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 26, enacts that “the Sheriff by whom any penalty shall be found due by virtue of this Act shall award such penalty to the funds for the support of the poor of the parish or combination in which the offence shall have been committed, and shall order the same to be paid over to the inspector of poor, or other officer of the parochial board, for that purpose.”

A person charged, at the instance of the inspector of poor of the parish, with a contravention of the above statute, pleaded guilty and was convicted by the Sheriff. The conviction adjudged the accused to pay a penalty of 20s., but contained no award and order regarding the penalty in terms of section 26 of the statute.

In a suspension, held that the conviction fell to be quashed in respect that it contained no award and order in terms of section 26.

ON 30th July 1896 Gavin Ritchie M'Callum, plumber, 201 Kilmarnock Road, Pollokshaws, in the parish of Eastwood, was charged, in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, with an offence against the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, in so far as he did, on 6th May 1896, within his house aforesaid, refuse to allow his child to be vaccinated. The complaint was at the instance of “David Barrowman, Inspector of Poor for the parish of Eastwood, on behalf of and as representing the Parish Council of that parish.”

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Ld. Moncreiff.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

The accused pleaded guilty and was convicted.

The conviction was in the following terms:—“Paisley, 30th July 1896.—The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the judicial confession of the said Gavin Ritchie M'Callum, convicts the said Gavin Ritchie M'Callum of the offence charged, and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay the sum of 20s. sterling of penalty, with the sum of 19s. 6d. sterling of expenses, and in default of payment thereof within seven days from this date, adjudges him to be imprisoned for the period of ten days from the date of his imprisonment unless said sums shall be sooner paid, and grants warrant to officers of Court to apprehend him and convey him to the prison of Glasgow, and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him accordingly.”

M'Callum brought a suspension on the ground that the conviction

No. 4.

Nov. 3, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Barrowman.

was null, in respect that it did not contain an award of the penalty in terms of section 26 of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863.* He cited the undernoted authorities.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The conviction here was in the form given in schedule K of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, and nothing more was necessary to satisfy the Vaccination Act. Unlike some of the cases founded on by the appellant, the inferior Judge here had no discretion as to whom he should award the penalty, and where the statute made it clear to whom a penalty was to go it was not necessary that the conviction should contain an express award.² Besides, if the conviction contained no award of the penalty, the prosecutor took it,³ and as the prosecutor here was the inspector of poor, the statutory result followed without the necessity of an award. There was nothing to prevent the Sheriff-substitute pronouncing an award now.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Act of Parliament with which we are dealing says, in section 26, in words as distinct as words can be, that where a penalty is found due by the Sheriff in virtue of the Act, he shall award such penalty in a certain way, and shall order the same to be paid to a certain person. It is plain that no award can be given by a Judge, and no order can be pronounced by him, except an order in writing under his hand. He has no power of verbally ordering anything. Everything he does in the way of disposing of a case must be recorded and be signed by him. Now, it may be quite possible to argue that this clause of the statute was unnecessary, and to say that it is very difficult to find any special reason for its insertion in the statute. On the other hand, it would not be difficult to state reasonable grounds for its being in the statute. With this question, however, we have nothing to do. The Legislature has thought proper to order that where a penalty shall be found due, the Judge shall make an award and pronounce an order. That stands unrepealed, and that is necessarily imperative under the statute. In that view there is not much importance in any of the cases quoted to us, in regard to which Mr Guy's criticism certainly goes some way, that in these cases there was some necessity for the award, because a discretion was given to the magistrate which he must exercise. But these cases all bring out this, that where a conviction is pronounced by a magistrate in a summary case of this kind, and he is directed by statute to do any particular thing, he must do it in the conviction, and cannot do it afterwards. They seem to make it certain that he cannot afterwards make a separate award so as to dispose of the penalty.

* The Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), sec. 26, enacts, that "the Sheriff by whom any penalty shall be found due by virtue of this Act shall award such penalty to the funds for the support of the poor of the parish or combination in which the offence shall have been committed, and shall order the same to be paid over to the inspector of poor, or other officer of the parochial board, for that purpose."

¹ Lamont v. Baker, Feb. 9, 1860, 22 D. 718, 32 Scot. Jur. 277; Galt v. Ritchie, July 19, 1873, 11 Macph. 971, 45 Scot. Jur. 562, 2 Coup. 470; King v. Dimpsey, 1877, 2 T. R. 96; Rex v. Seale, 1807, 8 East, 568; Chaddock v. Wilbraham, 1848, 5 C. B. 645.

² M'Callum and Sealy v. MacLulich, Oct. 31, 1870, 9 Macph. 46, 1 Coup. 486.

³ Alison, vol. ii. p. 675.

Here the Sheriff has not, by any award or order, given directions as to the disposal of the penalty. I confess that if the matter had been open I should have had some doubt whether the magistrate, having the duty to award, might not do so by a separate deliverance from the conviction. But that appears to have been decided otherwise, and I therefore am compelled to hold that this conviction must be quashed.

No. 4.

Nov. 3, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Barrowman.

LORD MONCRIEFF.—I am of the same opinion. I am reluctant to interfere with the Sheriff's judgment on what seems a very technical ground. But we cannot disregard the provision in the statute which directs the Sheriff who convicts to award the penalty to a particular person. That has not been done in the present case. I think the result of the authorities quoted is that where a statute contains a direction to a magistrate to award or apportion a penalty on conviction, that must be done in writing at the same time as the conviction is signed, and cannot be done later. It is no answer to say that the person convicted and ordered to pay the penalty has no interest in the purpose to which the penalty is to be applied. If the statute had merely said that the penalty should belong to the inspector of poor or other officer of the parish or combination, there is authority for holding that it would be no objection to the conviction that this was not noted in the judgment. But here the Sheriff is directed to award the penalty to the inspector of poor or other officer, and although there may be no doubt that he would have awarded it to the prosecutor if he had made an award, his failure to make any award, in the light of the decided cases, invalidates the conviction.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff here was exercising statutory power, and had power only to do what the statute directs. Section 26 directs most distinctly the form which the conviction is to take. I cannot say that I see very clearly the reason of this direction. But this is the only conviction which the Sheriff is entitled to pronounce, and without the award it is not a conviction which the statute authorises. It is said that this award may be pronounced afterwards. But I cannot so read the statute, and I cannot believe that the statute authorises such an unnecessary double procedure. Anyone who is convicted has certainly interest and right to object that the conviction is not authorised by the statute on which the prosecution is founded.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE FOWLER, Appellant.—Salvesen—Wilton.

GEORGE HODGE (Interim Burgh Prosecutor, North Berwick), Respondent.—Graham Stewart.

No. 5.

Nov. 3, 1896.
Fowler v.
Hodge.

Police—Regulation of traffic—Police-constable—Assault.—The driver of a hackney carriage having been convicted of assaulting a police-constable of a burgh while in the execution of his duty, appealed on a case stated. The facts stated were :—On the occasion in question a public entertainment was being held in a hall in the burgh. The police, without any special authority from the magistrates, ordered the carriages going to the hall to draw up

No. 5.
 Nov. 3, 1896.
 Fowler v.
 Hodge.

in a single line. The appellant, who was taking his carriage to the hall, at first drew up accordingly, but afterwards broke out of the line and began to drive off towards the hall, when he was stopped by the constable in question, and the assault was committed.

The question of law was,—Whether, in the absence of any magisterial order for the regulation of traffic upon the occasion libelled, the constable was acting in the execution of his duty when the assault was committed?

The Court—being of opinion that it was the duty of every police-constable in a burgh to regulate the street traffic of the burgh—dismissed the appeal, and found that upon the facts stated there was no legal ground upon which the magistrate was bound to hold that the constable was not acting in the execution of his duty at the time when the assault was committed.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.
 Ld. Moncreiff.
 Lord Kin-
 cairney.

On 28th September 1896 George Fowler, junior, cab-proprietor, 67 High Street, North Berwick, was charged in the Police Court there with having, on 24th September 1896, assaulted John M'Petrie, police-constable, North Berwick, while in the execution of his duty.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined 15s., with the alternative of five days' imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The case set forth:—On the evening of 24th September 1896, when the assault took place, an entertainment was being held in the Foresters' Hall in the High Street. The police, having reason to apprehend that there might be danger to the public from the carriage traffic at the close of the entertainment, unless it were regulated, the street being a narrow one, called on all the coach-hirers in the town, including the appellant, late on the afternoon of that day, and informed them that, in order to prevent obstruction and danger, the carriages would require to be kept in line, facing westward, one behind the other, and that the police would call each cab as it was wanted.

On driving up the appellant was asked by a policeman where he was going, and he stated he was going to the Foresters' Hall to take up a party attending the entertainment. The policeman informed him that he must take his place in rear of the cabs then waiting, and this, after some objection, the appellant did, but soon afterwards he took his cab out of the line and commenced to drive rapidly westwards towards the Foresters' Hall. M'Petrie, the constable assaulted, who was on duty in the immediate vicinity, called on him to stop, but he paid no attention and continued to drive rapidly. M'Petrie thereupon caught hold of the appellant's horse by the head, whereupon the appellant repeatedly struck M'Petrie with his whip on the face, hands, and body, continuing at the same time to urge his horse on.

It was admitted by the prosecutor that the police, in regulating the traffic upon the occasion in question, were not acting under any special written authority of the magistrates of the burgh granted for the occasion in question, but only in discharge of what they considered to be their ordinary duty, and further, that the magistrates had not made bye-laws or issued any notices in terms of sec. 385 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. It was further conceded by the prosecutor that the appellant was not transgressing the rule of the road in driving westwards as before stated, and that M'Petrie was assaulted when enforcing compliance with the requisition of the police.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether or not, in the absence of any magisterial order for the regulation of traffic upon the occasion libelled, police-constable M'Petrie was acting in the execution of his duty at the time the assault was committed on him?" No. 5.

Nov. 3, 1896.
Fowler v.
Hodge.

Argued for the appellant;—The police had no power to regulate the traffic in the way they did unless they had the special authority of the magistrates, and as they had not such authority here, the constable M'Petrie was not engaged in the execution of his duty when he was assaulted. The conviction therefore could not stand.¹

The respondent was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is most unfortunately stated. The question is one which we should not be called on to answer. It is largely a question of fact.

It is quite a new proposition to me that when a street is likely to be blocked by traffic, or the traffic is likely to be difficult to manage from whatever cause, the police-constable on duty is not entitled in the execution of his duty to do his best to regulate the traffic. If he did not do this he would fail in his duty. This street in North Berwick is an instance where a policeman would fail grievously in his duty if he did not do his best to make the traffic work smoothly for the benefit of the community. That every good citizen would support the police in such a case is, I think, undoubted. The citizens may have their own views as to the discretion which the policeman exercises, but he is the responsible person on the spot, and they will do their best to support him and obey his directions. It may be possible to conceive cases where it might be the duty of citizens to pay no attention to his orders, but such cases must be very rare, and I give no opinion on the point.

Here what happened was in accordance with what is carried on in all such cases that I have ever heard of. A large assemblage was gathered at a particular hall, the door of which abutted on a very narrow street. It was a very sensible thing for the police to give notice to the cab-hirers beforehand as to how they proposed to regulate the traffic for that night, but the case is not different from what it would have been if on the night in question each person had been told what the police wished them to do with their cabs and carriages. This is done every day in large cities without any special regulation of the magistrates in the matter at all. As Lord Kincairney pointed out in the course of the argument, in the case of a private house the matter is regulated by the policeman on duty. I have no difficulty in holding that this policeman was acting in the exercise of his duty in giving the appellant the instructions which he did, and in insisting on their being carried out. The question, however, is one of fact and not of law, and I do not think we should answer it.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I entirely agree with your Lordship that this is not a question which we should be called on to answer at all. I do not understand it to be maintained that there are no circumstances in which a police-constable is not entitled to stop a carriage being driven rapidly along a

¹ H. M. Advocate v. Cook, April 17, 1856, 2 Irv. 416; Gunn v. Procurator-fiscal of Caithness-shire, Nov. 24, 1845, 2 Brown, 554; Codd v. Cabe, 1876, L. R., 1 Excheq. Div. 352.

No. 5.

Nov. 3, 1896.
Fowler v.
Hodge.

street in a town unless there happens to be in existence a bye-law in virtue of which he exercises that right. If that cannot be maintained—and it is not—there are, no doubt, cases where a policeman would be thoroughly justified in stopping a carriage. And then the question is, whether in the particular case a policeman is or is not acting in the exercise of his duty, and that depends upon the circumstances. It is a pure question of fact, which the Police Commissioners ought to have decided. And therefore I do not think we should answer the question.

But on the facts stated, I have no hesitation in holding that the policeman was acting within his duty. The police had short notice of this entertainment. The streets of the town are very narrow, and in the opinion of the police the only safe course for the conduct of the traffic was to make those carriages which were going to take up parties from the entertainment go in single line. Apparently this appellant fell into the line. He then became impatient and left his position and drove rapidly westward. It is plain that if the other carriages had done the same thing there would have been serious danger to the safety of the lieges. It cannot be said that a policeman who in these circumstances stops a driver is not acting in the exercise of his duty. If we were called upon to answer this question I should have said that the conviction is good.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I am of the same opinion. It is one of the primary duties of police-constables to keep order in the streets, so as to promote and preserve both the safety and the comfort of those who frequent the streets. If a number of carriages be brought together in a public place in a narrow street, and if a policeman thinks that it will promote the convenience or the safety of the people that they shall all draw up in one line, it cannot be said that a policeman who objects to a person going outside of this line, and asks him to take his position in it, is not doing his duty, whether with a regulation from the magistrates or not. Whether he be right or wrong in doing so, he is not the less under the protection of his duty. I do not consider what is the extent of the chief constable's power to regulate the traffic, but I think it is the right of all policemen to keep the streets clear, and to act in such emergencies as this.

In this case I do not think it is possible to say that the policeman was not acting in the exercise of his duty. Even if he went to excess, he was still under the protection afforded to an officer who is in the exercise of his duty.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Find that upon the facts stated there is no legal ground upon which the magistrate was bound to hold that the constable M'Petrie was not acting in the execution of his duty at the time when the assault was committed, and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses, which modify to seven guineas."

JOHN W. CHESSEY, S.S.C.—JOHN MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES MARTIN, Appellant.—Cullen.

PETER BEATTIE (Inspector of Poor of Barony Parish), Respondent.

—Deas.

No. 6.

Jan. 27, 1897.
Martin v.
Beattie.

Procedure—Case stated—Refusal of inferior Judge to state case—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), secs. 3 and 5.—Section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, enacts,—“On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst . . . by himself or his agent applying in writing within three days after such determination to the inferior Judge to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of a superior Court of law. . . .”

Section 4 empowers the inferior Judge to refuse an application to state a case should he consider the application frivolous, and requires him to give the applicant a certificate of refusal should the same be asked for.

Section 5 enacts,—“When an inferior Judge shall refuse to state and sign a special case, the appellant may, within three days of such refusal, apply by a written note to the superior Court to which the case would, if stated and signed, have to be transmitted under this Act, for an order on such Judge and on the other party to shew cause why a case should not be stated. . . .”

A Sheriff-substitute refused to state a case for appeal against a conviction on the ground (as stated in his certificate of refusal) that “the only question discussed and decided was . . . a pure question of fact.” The accused presented a note under section 5 for an order on the Sheriff-substitute to shew cause why a case should not be stated, and set forth as reasons for granting the order a number of propositions which involved questions of law, but the note did not state that any of these questions had been raised before or decided by the Sheriff-substitute, or that the Sheriff-substitute had been asked to state any questions of law for appeal.

The Court refused the note, on the ground that it did not appear either from the Sheriff's certificate or from the note that any questions of law had been raised before or decided by the Sheriff-substitute, or that he had been asked to state any question of law.

JAMES MARTIN, wirework labourer, Bridgeton, was charged before the Sheriff-substitute (Strachan) at Glasgow, upon a complaint at the instance of the Inspector of Poor of Barony Parish, setting forth that the accused had contravened section 18 of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), in respect that he had refused to allow his child to be vaccinated.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kinnear.

The accused having been convicted, applied to the Sheriff-substitute to state and sign a special case for appeal to the High Court under section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (quoted in the rubric).

The Sheriff-substitute refused the application, his certificate of refusal bearing,—“I refused the said application, on the ground that no question of law had been raised in the said complaint. The only question discussed and decided was whether or not the respondent had declined or refused to allow his child to be vaccinated, and that being a pure question of fact, I declined to state a case, the application being, in my opinion, frivolous.”

Martin then presented a note under section 5 of the Act (quoted in the rubric) for an order upon the Sheriff-substitute to shew cause why a case should not be stated.

No. 6. The note set forth the nature of the complaint, and contained a number of averments regarding the evidence led at the trial. In particular, it was averred that it had been proved that the refusal to allow the child to be vaccinated had been made by the appellant's wife, on 10th November 1896, during his absence from home. The note then continued:—"The appellant prays for an order on the inferior Judge and the said Peter Beattie to shew cause why a case should not be stated in terms of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, which order ought to be granted for the following reasons:—

Jan. 27, 1897.
Martin v.
Beattie.

"(1) The refusal by the mother during the father's absence, and without his authority, of liberty to the vaccinator to vaccinate a child, cannot in law be held to be the refusal of the father within the meaning of section 18 of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108). The appellant never refused to allow his child to be vaccinated. He never got the opportunity to refuse."

Then followed several other reasons, some or all of which appeared to raise questions of law arising out of the facts stated in the note, but which it is unnecessary here to detail.

The note did not state that any of the questions raised by these reasons had been raised before or determined by the Sheriff-substitute, or that he had been asked to state any question of law.

Argued for the appellant;—The case raised questions of law. It had been held that the question, whether on the facts stated a person had committed a statutory offence, was one of law.¹ The note was therefore competent.

Argued for the respondent;—The certificate shewed that none of the questions of law which the appellant sought to raise had been raised before the Sheriff-substitute, or decided by him. In these circumstances, the Court would be slow to interfere with his discretion.²

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The statement contained in the note shews that various questions might have been raised and discussed which would be points of law susceptible of determination under the provisions about special cases under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

But when we look at the note which has been presented to the Court and intimated to the Sheriff-substitute, it is to be observed that the appellant does not say explicitly that those points were taken before the Sheriff-substitute or decided by him. On the contrary, it would rather appear, upon the narrative of the appellant, that now he thinks over the evidence and the conviction he conceives that there are good legal objections to it.

But then the Act of Parliament requires that there should be a decision of the Sheriff upon the questions raised if there is to be a case stated. Section 3 provides that "on an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst," and accordingly the Act contemplates, not that there shall be afterwards discovered some flaw in the Sheriff's determination, but that he shall have decided a point of law which may be reconsidered by the Supreme Court. The Sheriff-substitute says,—“The only question discussed and decided was whether or not the respondent had declined or refused to allow his child to be vaccinated, and that being a pure question of fact, I declined to state a case.”

¹ Campbell v. Jameson, Feb. 23, 1877, 4 R. (Just. Cases) 17, 3 Couper, 391.

² Ross v. M'Leod, Dec. 15, 1891, 19 R. (Just. Cases) 18, 3 White, 63.

No. 6.

Jan. 27, 1897.
Martin v.
Beattie.

Now, I read that as meaning that no such question of law as Mr Cullen says may be raised—whether the father, although not personally implicated in his wife's refusal, could be convicted by reason solely of her refusal—was in fact mooted before the Sheriff.

Accordingly, the provisions for a special case are not applicable to the conditions of the argument which we must take from the Sheriff-substitute. If he had stated that a question of the criminal liability of the father for his wife's refusal was raised and decided, I should be prepared to order a special case. But he does not say that any such question was raised. It is to be observed that any person aggrieved by a conviction pronounced upon wrong grounds has always the old remedies open to him, and what we are now considering is whether he has also the form of appeal contained in the Act of 1875. I am of opinion that he has not.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I find, neither in the statement of the case nor in the certificate of the Sheriff-substitute, anything that imports that the questions which Mr Cullen desires to raise here were raised before the Sheriff-substitute or decided by him, or that he was asked to state a case in order to raise these questions. The application to him was in general terms.

THE COURT refused the note.

DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

CHARLES GEMMELL, Complainer.—G. W. Burnet.

ROBERT WEIR AND ANOTHER (Procurators-Fiscal for the Justices of the Peace of Lanarkshire), Respondents.—Lees.

No. 7.

Jan. 28, 1897.
Gemmell v.
Weir.

*Conviction—Alternative charge and general conviction—Public-House—Breach of Certificate—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35).—*A publican holding a certificate in terms of Schedule A of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, was charged with a breach of his certificate “in so far as he did” during prohibited hours “permit and suffer drinking” in his premises by a person named, “and did sell and give out to him excisable liquors” during prohibited hours. He was convicted of the “contravention charged.”

He brought a suspension, pleading that the conviction ought to be suspended on the ground that it was a general conviction upon an alternative charge.

The Court repelled the plea, holding that the charge was not alternative, but was a charge of committing the same statutory offence in two ways.

Prentice v. Linton, Feb. 7, 1883, 5 Couper, 210, followed.

Murray v. M'Dougall, Feb. 7, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 5 Couper, 215, distinguished.

CHARLES GEMMELL, spirit-dealer, Strathaven, Lanarkshire, was charged before the Justices of Peace for Lanarkshire at Hamilton upon a complaint which set forth “That Charles Gemmell, spirit-dealer, residing at Strathaven, in the parish of Avondale, and county of Lanark, who holds a certificate for the sale of excisable liquors in the

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Ld. Moncreiff.
Lord Low.

No. 7.

Jan. 28, 1897.
Gemmell v.
Weir.

public-house known as the Green Rest, occupied by him, and situated in Main Street, Strathaven, did, in breach of the terms, provisions, and conditions of his said certificate, and contrary to the Acts 25 and 26 Victoria, chapter 35, section 2, and 50 and 51 Victoria, chapter 38, section 6—after ten of the clock on the night of 22d June 1896, and before eight of the clock on the morning of 23d June 1896—said hour of ten o'clock being that directed for closing by the licensing authority of the district in which said public-house is situated, acting under 'The Public Houses Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887,' permit and suffer drinking in said public-house by John Muir, tailor, Strathaven, and did sell and give out to him excisable liquors," &c., and prayed the Court to convict the accused of "the foresaid contravention."

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was, on 27th July 1896, convicted "of the contravention charged."

He brought a bill of suspension, in which he pleaded, inter alia;—“(2) The conviction being a general conviction which proceeds on a complaint which charges two separate offences, and failing to specify which of these is found to have been committed by the complainer, is illegal and unwarrantable, and ought to be suspended.”

Argued for the complainer;—The conviction was bad¹ because it did not specify whether the accused was found guilty of the offence of “permitting and suffering drinking” or “of selling and giving out liquor.” These offences were different.

Argued for the respondents;—The charge was not alternative. It was a charge of an offence which could be committed in different ways, which might be charged cumulatively.² In Murray v. M'Dougall,³ the different modes of contravening a certificate under the Public-Houses Acts were charged alternatively—“did keep open house or permit or suffer drinking”—while the conviction was general.

At advising,—

LORD MONCREIFF.—The complainer was charged with a breach of the terms of his certificate under the Public-Houses Acts in so far as he permitted and suffered drinking in the public-house kept by him, by a certain John Muir, tailor, Strathaven, and sold and gave out to him excisable liquors after 10 o'clock at night on the 22d June 1896, and before 8 o'clock in the morning of the following day.

The Justices of the Peace for the county of Lanark at Hamilton found the complainer guilty of the contravention charged, and decerned against him for a modified penalty of £2, with an alternative of imprisonment of ten days in default of payment within fourteen days of the conviction.

The only arguable ground of suspension is that contained in the second plea for the complainer, to the effect that two separate offences are charged, while the conviction is general and fails to specify which of the charges he is convicted of.

In the absence of authority I should at first impression have been disposed to think, looking to the structure of the certificate, that the offence with which the complainer was charged, and of which he was convicted, ¹ Murray v. M'Dougall, Feb. 7, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 5 Couper, 215; Muir v. Campbell, Nov. 21, 1888, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 20, 2 White, 97.

² Prentice v. Linton, Feb. 7, 1883, 5 Couper, 210; MacNaughton v. Maddever, Nov. 12, 1884, 5 Couper, 509.

³ Murray v. M'Dougall, vide supra, note 1.

was trading during prohibited hours, which offence might be committed in more than one way. I should have thought that the alternatives mentioned in that portion of the certificate were simply different modes in which the offence might be committed, and that even if they were libelled alternatively a charge might be so framed that a conviction of the contravention charged would be enough, without specifying in the conviction which particular mode of contravention was held proved. I think that examples are to be found in indictments before the High Court of thus stating alternatively the modes in which a crime or offence is said to have been committed; and a conviction of guilty as libelled would in such cases undoubtedly be sufficient—H. M. Advocate v. Watson.¹

No. 7.

Jan. 28, 1897.
Gemmell v. Weir.

But we have been referred to the case of Murray v. M'Dougall,² in which opinions were expressed to the contrary in an appeal before the High Court, and I at once admit that if the complaint in the present case were framed in the same manner as that in Murray v. M'Dougall,² we should be bound to follow that decision, which has never been overruled to my knowledge.

But all difficulty is removed by the fact that on the same day the same Judges sustained a conviction pronounced in circumstances the same as the present, and that decision is necessarily distinguishable from the case of Murray v. M'Dougall,² and rules this case. The case I refer to is the case of Prentice v. Linton.³

The difference between the two cases is simply this: In *Murray v. M'Dougall*² the different modes of contravening a certificate under the Public-Houses Acts were charged alternatively, "did keep open house or permit or suffer drinking," &c., while the conviction was general.

Again, in Prentice v. Linton,³ which was a prosecution under a different statute (but that is immaterial), the charge was cumulative, viz., that the accused kept a brothel and harboured prostitutes. A general conviction was sustained without hesitation.

Now, here the complaint charges the accused with breach of his certificate, committed by suffering John Muir to drink in the public-house kept by the accused, and (not "or") on the same occasion selling and giving out excisable liquors to the said John Muir. The complaint prays the Magistrate to convict the said John Gemmell of "the foresaid contravention." The Justices "convict the accused John Gemmell of the contravention charged."

Now, I read that conviction as equivalent to a verdict of "guilty as libelled," that is, of contravening the conditions of the certificate by suffering drinking in the licensed premises, and giving out liquors during prohibited hours. An offence under the statute would no doubt have been committed either by suffering drinking or by giving out liquor, but what is charged, and held proved, is doing both.

I am therefore of opinion that the second plea in law for the complainer is bad, and the other grounds of suspension being plainly untenable, the conviction should be sustained.

LORD LOW.—The complainer in this case is a spirit-dealer, and he was charged with a breach of the conditions of his certificate.

¹ Dec. 23, 1875, 3 Couper, 214. ² 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 5 Couper, 215.

³ Feb. 7, 1883, 5 Couper, 210.

No. 7. The complaint ran thus—"That Charles Gemmell . . . did, in
 Jan. 28, 1897. breach of the terms, provisions, and conditions of his said certificate,
 Gemmell v. . . . after ten of the clock on the night of 22d June 1896, and before Weir. eight of the clock on the morning of 23d June 1896, . . . permit and suffer drinking in said public-house by John Muir, tailor, Strathaven, and did sell and give out to him excisable liquors."

The Justices convicted the complainer "of the contravention charged," and it was contended for him that two offences were charged, and therefore a general conviction was bad.

The complainer's certificate was in terms of Schedule A of the Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862.

The certificate authorises the sale of victuals and excisable liquors on certain terms and conditions. The conditions are that the licensee shall not do certain things. Sometimes the thing which is prohibited can only be done in one way, sometimes it can be done in several ways. For example, one condition is that the licensee "do not use in selling the same" (i.e., victuals or liquors) "any weight or measure which is not of the legal imperial standard." That is an example of a condition which can only be contravened in one way. Again, the licensee is prohibited from selling excisable liquor to persons to whom it is expedient in the public interest that such liquors should not be sold. There are two classes of such persons, and therefore the condition is expressed thus—"And do not sell or supply excisable liquors to girls or boys apparently under fourteen years of age, or to persons who are in a state of intoxication." That is an example of a condition which can be contravened in two ways.

It is to the latter class of conditions that the condition which the complainer here was charged with contravening belonged. It is expressed thus—"And do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out any liquors, before eight of the clock in the morning, or after such hour of the night of any day not earlier than ten, and not later than eleven, as the licensing authority may direct."

Now, that is a condition that the licensee shall not do business within certain hours, and the condition may be contravened in three different ways. In this case the complainer was charged with having contravened the condition in two out of three possible ways, and the Justices held that the contravention had been proved. I am of opinion that there was no incompetency in such a conviction.

The case appears to me to be indistinguishable in principle from the case of Prentice v. Linton.¹ That was the case of a conviction under the 258th section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879. That section enacts that "every person who shall keep or manage any brothel, or who shall knowingly harbour prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution, or shall aid or assist or take part in the management of any brothel," shall be liable to a penalty or to imprisonment. The charge against the accused was that he "did keep and manage a brothel in High Street, Edinburgh, and did knowingly harbour in the said brothel, for the purpose of prostitution, the prostitutes after mentioned." The conviction found the complaint proved, and one penalty was imposed. Upon a bill of suspension it was argued that two offences were charged, and that therefore a general conviction was bad, but it was held that the conviction was competent.

¹ 5 Couper, 210.

No. 7.

Jan. 28, 1897.
Gommell v.
Weir.

The complainer relied upon the case of Murray v. M'Dougall.¹ That was a case in which the accused was charged with a contravention of the same condition of the certificate as we are dealing with in this case. The complaint charged the accused with being guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Public-Houses Acts, in so far as he did within the prohibited hours "keep open house, or permit or suffer drinking on the premises belonging thereto." The Justices found the accused guilty of the contravention charged, and the conviction was quashed on the ground that the charge being alternative, a general conviction was not competent.

The same view was taken in the precisely similar case of Duncan v. Laing.² The ground of judgment was that the charge as laid was plainly alternative. Keeping open house and permitting drinking are two different things. A man may keep open house and yet may not permit drinking, and vice versa, and the charge was that the accused had committed an offence by doing one or other of these things, not that he had contravened a condition of his certificate by doing both of them. The distinction appears to me to be one of substance, and accordingly I am of opinion that the present case is not ruled by Murray v. M'Dougall,¹ but falls within the principle applied in Prentice v. Linton.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in all that your Lordships have said, and think it should be noted at the outset that this offence has all along been treated as one contravention of the certificate. The complaint sets forth that it is one contravention which is charged, and the case went to trial on that footing without any objection being stated by the accused. I think the charge is that the accused contravened his certificate in two particulars, which, whether together or separately, constitute one offence. It was never intended that if a man was charged with these two acts as occurring at one time he should be visited with two penalties as for two separate contraventions; on the contrary, I think the intention of the statute was that either act should constitute a breach of the certificate, but that if the magistrate should find that a contravention had been committed in both particulars, that fact might be taken into consideration in fixing the amount of the penalty to be imposed.

I agree entirely with your Lordships that if the case of *Prentice v. Linton*³ was well decided, it is a precedent applicable to the present case, because there a general conviction on a complaint alleging two separate offences, each sufficient for a conviction, was sustained, although treated in the conviction as one contravention of the statute. As regards the case of Murray v. M'Dougall,¹ the verdict there was plainly void from uncertainty, because no one could tell from it what offence had been committed. The statement there was, "you either did this thing or that thing," and the

¹ 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42.

² Nov. 21, 1888, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 20.

³ 5 Couper, 210.

- No. 7. conviction was bad, because the accused could not be convicted of both things, they being stated alternatively, and no one could tell which he had been convicted of.
- Jan. 28, 1897. Gemmell v. Weir.

The conviction must be sustained.

THE COURT refused the bill.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

- No. 8. JOHN THOMAS CAMPBELL, Appellant.—Johnston—A. S. D. Thomson.
GEORGE NEILSON (Procurator-Fiscal in the Glasgow Police Court).
Feb. 6, 1897. Campbell v. Neilson.
—Respondent.—Shaw—Lees.

Public-House—Certificate—Transfer—Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 19.—Section 19 of the Act 9 Geo. IV. enacted,—“That if any person duly authorised to keep a common inn, alehouse, or victualling house . . . shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house and premises for which such certificate shall have been granted, it shall be lawful for two or more Justices of the Peace or Magistrates respectively as aforesaid, sitting publicly in their ordinary place of meeting, to grant to any new tenant or occupier of such house and premises upon such removal, a transfer of the certificate to keep such house and premises as a common inn, alehouse, or victualling house as before such removal, until the next general or district meeting to be held under the authority of this Act.”

A transfer of a certificate running from May 1896 to May 1897 was granted in August 1896 on condition that it “be in force only . . . until the next general meeting to be held for granting such certificates, and be duly presented for entry at the collector’s office of excise, Glasgow, within six days from this date, otherwise the same to be null and void to all intents and purposes.” This latter condition was not complied with, but the transferee carried on the business of publican. Thereafter the magistrates at the general meeting in October 1896 refused to renew the transfer certificate. The original holder then resumed possession of the premises, and was afterwards convicted of trafficking in excisable liquors without a certificate.

In an appeal the original holder contended that the transfer certificate being merely temporary and conditional, and the condition not having been purified, the original certificate remained in force.

Held that he had been rightly convicted, the transfer having absolutely divested him of all right of trafficking under the original certificate.

Miller v. Linton, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 37, 1 White, 583, commented on.

HIGH COURT. JOHN THOMAS CAMPBELL was charged in the City Police Court Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord Kinnear. Glasgow, at the instance of the Procurator-Fiscal, with having on 14th November 1896 trafficked in excisable liquors, in premises at No. 11 Back Wynd, Glasgow, occupied or possessed by him or by Bernard Campbell, 107 Ingram Street, Glasgow, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf, in terms of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35).

He pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined ten shillings.

He obtained a case. The facts stated were:—“(1) Upon 14th April 1896 the appellant obtained from the Magistrates of Glasgow, at their general half-yearly meeting for granting and renewing publicans’ certificates, a renewal of his then existing public-house certificate for said premises situated at No. 11 Back Wynd, Glasgow, said renewed certificate to be in force from 15th May 1896 until 15th May 1897.

“(2) Upon 11th August 1896 Bernard Campbell, the appellant’s father, by arrangement with the appellant, applied for a transfer of the

No. 8.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Campbell v.
Neilson.

certificate, till then in the name of the appellant, and produced with his application the said certificate indorsed for that purpose by the appellant, that being the form of consent in use to be accepted by the magistrates. Upon 19th August 1896 the said Bernard Campbell obtained from a full bench of the Magistrates of Glasgow, in virtue of the powers contained in sections 19 and 20 of the Act 9 George IV. cap. 58, a transfer of appellant's said certificate for the premises in Back Wynd aforesaid, which transfer certificate bears:— 'This certificate to be in force only until the third Tuesday of October next, being the next general meeting to be held for granting such certificates, and to be duly presented for entry at the collector's office of excise, Glasgow, within six days from this date, otherwise the same to be null and void to all intents and purposes.'

"(3) The said transfer certificate was uplifted by the said Bernard Campbell on 24th August 1896, and in virtue thereof, and as in possession of the said premises he sold excisable liquors thereat till 20th October following, when his transfer certificate expired. He did not, however, present the said transfer certificate for entry, nor was it entered at the collector's office of excise, Glasgow, within the above-mentioned period of six days; but upon the sixteenth day of the month of September 1896 the appellant by a minute on the back of his excise license requested the excise authorities to transfer the same to the said Bernard Campbell, to whom he thereby 'consigned' his whole right and interest, which transfer the supervisor and collector of excise on the same date entered and minuted on the back of the said license.

"(4) Upon 5th October 1896 the said Bernard Campbell applied to the Magistrates of Glasgow for a renewal of the transferred certificate, which renewal was refused by a full bench of the said magistrates at their general half-yearly meeting for granting publicans' certificates on 20th October 1896.

"(5) The appellant, founding upon the original renewal certificate, and claiming that he had been reinvested therein, after notice sent by him to the Chief Constable of Glasgow, reopened the premises at No. 11 Back Wynd, Glasgow, and upon 14th November 1896, being the date libelled, and in the premises for which the said certificate was granted, trafficked in and sold excisable liquors."

The following was the question of law:—"Was the appellant, in view of the facts stated, on 14th November 1896, the date libelled, the holder of a certificate for the sale of excisable liquors within the meaning of the Public-Houses Acts, at No. 11 Back Wynd, Glasgow?"

Argued for the appellant;—The transfer of the certificate was conditional upon the transferee's presenting it for entry at the excise office within six days. As this condition was never purified, the transfer became null and void. The result was that the appellant's original certificate, which had thus never been effectually transferred, revived, and he was quite entitled to traffic under it. His radical right could not be annulled by a transfer which was merely conditional and temporary.¹ In Miller's case,² where it was held that there was no revival of an original certificate, the transfer was not voided as here, but came into force, and moreover the original holder could not carry on the business, because the transferee had forfeited and put an end to the certificate.

¹ Hazell v. Middleton, June 21, 1881, 45 Justice of the Peace Reports, 540.

² Miller v. Linton, Feb. 10, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases), 37, 1 White, 583.

No. 8.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Campbell v.
Nelson.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant had resigned his certificate, and was absolutely divested of all right to use it.¹ The fact that the transferee had rendered the transfer null and void by his failure to comply with the condition of getting it could not revive in the appellant a right which was gone from him for ever.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—In my opinion the appellant was not at the date libelled in the complaint the holder of a certificate for the sale of excisable liquors.

The argument for the appellant begins with the proposition that the transfer of the certificate from him to his father became null and void so soon as six days had expired without the presentation of the transfer at the collector's office of excise. This, it is said, is a provision of nullity forming a statutory condition of the transfer which no actings of the excise officer could waive. Thus far I am disposed to agree with the appellant.

But it does not follow that when the right of the transferee came to an end, the right of the original holder revived. The decision in the case of Miller,² although it is not exactly in point, goes a long way against the theory of the appellant. There it was held that on the expiry of the period of the transfer and the refusal of a renewal by the Justices, there was no revival of the original certificate. But then, if the sound doctrine were that a certificate retains its original force, except in so far as the right of the transferee exists and prevails against it, the decision in *Miller*² must have been the opposite of what it was.

The true ground of judgment here, as in Miller,² is to be found in the terms of the section of the Home Drummond Act under which transfers are granted. The first case dealt with in that section is where the holder dies. Then comes the case (which we have before us) where the original certificate holder does not die but “removes from or yields up the possession” of the premises for which the certificate was granted. This, then, is the basis and condition upon which the magistrates transfer the certificate of a living man—that he has removed from or yielded up possession of the premises to which the certificate applied; and the transfer now before us bears this on its face. This being so, it is the transferee alone who can lawfully carry on business in the premises under the certificate. The transfer may become null and void, as here, or the certificate may not be renewed, as in Miller,² but nothing that can happen to the transfer or transferee will ever revive the right of a man who, ex hypothesi, has removed or yielded up possession of the premises to which the certificate relates. He can resume business only on a new certificate.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant in this case held a public-house certificate authorising him to sell liquors in a particular shop for a year from 15th May 1896. He, by arrangement with his father Bernard Campbell, agreed that the latter should take his place so far as the law allowed him under this certificate, and according to the usual form he applied to the Magistrates of Glasgow under the authority of a particular Act to have this certificate transferred to his father. Before considering this application the magistrates were satisfied of the appellant's consent to such transfer by the usual evidence, and they did in fact transfer this certificate to the father. The latter, whether rightly or wrongly, carried on the shop, and continued to sell liquor therein until the month of October 1896.

¹ Clift v. Portobello Pier Co., Feb. 10, 1877, 4 R. 462; Miller v. Linton, supra, p. 29, note 2.

² 15 R. (Just. Cases) 37, 1 White, 583.

No. 8.
Feb. 6, 1897.
Campbell v.
Neilson.

The first question is, what is the effect of the transfer, not by the holder of the certificate himself, but by the magistrates in terms of a statute to that effect, from the son to the father. I agree with your Lordship, and with the reasoning in *Miller's*¹ case, that the effect of that was to divest the original holder of the certificate of any right in it, and that took place from the time when the magistrates transferred the certificate. There could not be two holders of the certificate. The transfer was not for a limited time only. It was an out-and-out transfer, and thereafter the present appellant was divested of any right or title to the certificate.

But the transfer certificate bore, in the statutory form, that it must be presented at the collector's office of excise, Glasgow, within six days from the date of granting, and that otherwise it should be null and void. It is said that the effect of this was, that as Bernard Campbell, the transferee, had not applied to the excise in Glasgow for entry of his certificate within six days, the whole thing became null and void, and the whole proceeding was at an end. It may be that the effect is, that if a transferee, after having obtained a transfer from the magistrates, does not apply to have it entered within the six days, quoad him it puts an end to the proceeding. The matter is entirely within his own power. No doubt the condition is introduced for this purpose, that in the interests of the excise the transferee shall be compelled to come and get the licence without undue delay. But I do not think this has the effect of reinstating the original holder in his right to the certificate, in which, in my view, after it had once been transferred by the magistrates, he was divested of all right, title, or interest. The result of the contention made to us for the appellant would be that the father, not having applied for this certificate within the six days, although he carried on the traffic from this date, was all the time shebeening. But I think what I have said is the true view, namely, that the transfer granted by the magistrates to the transferee has the effect of divesting the original holder of all title and interest, and, that being so, nothing afterwards taking place can reinvest him with any right.

I am therefore of opinion that when the transferee was refused a licence the appellant had no right whatever to commence trafficking as if he had never transferred it.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I think the right of the original holder of the certificate is absolutely determined when he has removed from his premises and has placed the assignee of his business in a position to apply to the magistrates for a transfer of the certificate, which the magistrates have granted. After that it appears to me that no right remains vested in the original holder.

It is of no consequence, in my opinion, whether the transferee may or

¹ 15 R. (Just. Cases) 37, 1 White, 583.

No. 8.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Campbell v.
Neilson.

may not have obtained a transfer effectual to him by reason of his complying or failing to comply with the statutory conditions on which a transfer is granted. His breach of these conditions can never reinstate the transferor in a right which, according to the view of your Lordships in which I concur, has been absolutely determined.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 9.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Richardson v.
Maitland.

HUGH RICHARDSON, Respondent (Appellant).—Abel.
SIR JAMES RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND, Baronet, Complainer (Respondent).—Cooper.

Poaching—Game reserved to landlord—Verbal authority of tenant to kill rabbits—Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 47), sec. 1, subsec. 1—Day Trespass Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68).—The Ground Game Act, 1880, which by sec. 1 confers on the occupiers of land the right to kill ground game, by subsec. (1) imposes this limitation,—“The occupier shall kill and take ground game only by himself, or by persons duly authorised by him in writing.”

The tenant under a lease which reserved to the landlord the game, including the rabbits, hired A, who was not a servant on the farm, to kill rabbits, but did not grant written authority to A to do so. A having killed rabbits under this employment was convicted of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, 1832.

In an appeal A contended that at common law a tenant had right to employ a person to kill rabbits as vermin, and that a person in taking such employment was not bound to inquire into the terms of the lease.

Held that, as the tenant had no right to kill rabbits except under the Ground Game Act, and as A had no written authority, the conviction was valid.

Jack v. Nairne, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 20, 1 White, 350, and Calder v. Robertson, 6 R. (Just. Cases) 3, 4 Couper, 131, distinguished. Black v. Bradshaw, 3 R. (Just. Cases) 18, 3 Couper, 209, and Niven v. Renton, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 1 White, 578, commented on.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kinnear.

HUGH RICHARDSON, miner, Muir Cottage, Bannockburn, was charged, in the Sheriff Court at Stirling, upon a complaint at the instance of Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland, Bart., which set forth that the accused did, on 29th October 1896, in the daytime, commit a trespass, by entering or being upon the farm of Back o' Muir, on the estate of Sauchie, belonging to the complainer, without leave of the proprietor, in search or pursuit of game, or of conies, contrary to the Act 2 and 3 William IV. chapter 68, section 1.

The accused was convicted by the Sheriff-substitute (Buntine), who, at his request, stated a case for appeal to the High Court.

The case stated,—“The following facts were proved:—That on the day in question Hugh Richardson was found by David Strachan, gamekeeper, on the farm of Back o' Muir, of which Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland is proprietor, and Alexander Christie, farmer, is tenant, with a gun, and with the object and purpose of killing rabbits. It was further proved that the game on the farm, including the rabbits, were reserved to the landlord under the present lease of the farm, which is current till Martinmas 1898. That Richardson is a miner to trade, and resides at Muir Cottage, near the farm. That he is not a person coming within the description of the persons specified in section 1, subsection 1 (b) of the Ground Game Act, 1880.* That he had no written authority from Mr Christie to kill rabbits, but he had been instructed by him verbally to kill the rabbits on his farm, and that he had done so for the last ten years, and that Mr Christie had provided him with a gun for that purpose, and had paid him about £2 a year for doing so." No. 9.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Richardson v.
Maitland.

The question stated by the Sheriff-substitute was,—“Whether, upon the facts stated above, I was justified in holding that the verbal instructions of Mr Christie did not protect Hugh Richardson against a prosecution under the Day Poaching Act, and in convicting him of the contravention charged?”

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute had convicted him because he had no written authority entitling him to kill rabbits. But at common law this was not necessary, for a farmer had a common law right to kill rabbits as vermin, either by himself or by anyone whom he might authorise to do so.¹ This right had not been taken away, either by the Day Trespass Act or by the Ground Game Act. The proposition was sound both in the case of an ordinary lease² and where (as here) the rabbits were expressly reserved to the landlord.³ A person employed by a farmer to kill rabbits was not bound to look at the lease in order to satisfy himself that the rabbits were not reserved.²

Argued for the respondent;—The rabbits were expressly reserved by the lease to the landlord, and the farmer's only right depended upon the Ground Game Act, 1880. That distinguished the case from Jack v. Nairne.³ *Calder v. Robertson*⁴ was not in point, because the ratio of the decision was that a farm servant was justified in obeying his master's orders. Here the appellant was not a farm servant, and his only right to shoot rabbits was under the Ground Game Act, and depended on his having written authority to do so.⁵

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—In this case the appellant Hugh Richardson was convicted under the Day Trespass Act of having, on the 29th October 1896, committed a trespass by entering or being upon the respondent's farm of Back o' Muir, without his leave, in search or pursuit of game or conies.

* The Ground Game Act, 1880, sec. 1, enacts,—“Every occupier of land shall have as an incident to and inseparable from his occupation of the land the right to kill and take ground game thereon . . . Provided that the right conferred on the occupier by this section shall be subject to the following limitations:—(1) The occupier shall kill and take ground game only by himself, or by persons duly authorised by him in writing; (a) the occupier himself and one other person authorised in writing by such occupier shall be the only persons entitled under this Act to kill ground game with firearms; (b) no person shall be authorised by the occupier to kill or take ground game except members of his household resident on the land in his occupation, persons in his ordinary service on such land, and any one other person bona fide employed by him for reward in the taking and destruction of ground game.”

¹ Moncrieff v. Arnott, Feb. 13, 1828, 6 S. 530.

² Jack v. Nairne, Feb. 18, 1887, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 20, 1 White, 350.

³ Smellie v. Lockhart, June 1, 1844, 2 Broun, 194; Calder v. Robertson, Nov. 6, 1878, 6 R. (Just. Cases) 3, 4 Couper, 131.

⁴ Calder v. Robertson, supra, note 3.

⁵ Black v. Bradshaw, Dec. 16, 1875, 3 R. (Just. Cases) 18, 3 Couper, 209; Niven v. Renton, Feb. 10, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 1 White, 578.

No. 9. From the facts found by the Sheriff it appears that the appellant, on the occasion in question, did enter and was upon the farm in question in pursuit of rabbits. His defence was that he was duly authorised to do so by Mr Christie, the tenant and occupant of the farm.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Richardson v.
Maitland.

It appeared that the appellant had no written authority from Mr Christie to kill rabbits, but had been instructed by him verbally to do so. Thereupon the Sheriff held he was not a person coming within the description of the persons specified in section 1, subsection 1 (b), of the Ground Game Act, 1880, that therefore he was not duly authorised to shoot rabbits, and convicted him of the trespass charged.

That the appellant was not a person duly authorised to shoot ground game, i.e., hares and rabbits, under the Ground Game Act is sufficiently clear, but it was maintained to us that the fact that the appellant was on the ground with the permission of the tenant was sufficient to exempt him from liability to conviction for trespass under the Day Trespass Act.

In support of that proposition we were referred to the case of Jack v. Nairne.¹ In that case the tenant, who had the right of killing rabbits, instructed one of his farm servants to kill rabbits on his farm. He proceeded to do so, and was convicted for trespass. The Court quashed the conviction on the ground that the Ground Game Act did not interfere with the tenant's common law right of killing rabbits, and that a servant proceeding to kill rabbits on his verbal instructions could not be convicted of trespass.

In this case, however, it is found by the Sheriff that the game on the farm, including rabbits, is reserved to the landlord under the current lease. So that Mr Christie, the tenant, had no right to kill ground game on his farm other than that conferred by the Ground Game Act, and subject to the limitations therein contained, one of which is that he shall kill and take ground game only by himself or by persons duly authorised by him in writing, which the appellant was not.

In the case of *Calder v. Robertson*² it was held that the servant of a tenant farmer, who had shot rabbits on the farm by his master's instructions, was not guilty of a trespass in pursuit of game under the Day Trespass Act, although by the terms of the lease the rabbits were reserved to the landlord.

It will be observed, however, that that was the case of a farm servant who was in the ordinary service of the tenant, and who, the Court thought, was justified in obeying his orders without inquiry. I do not think that case rules the present case, in which, as the Sheriff has found, the appellant is a miner to trade, does not reside on the farm, and came upon it only for the purpose of killing rabbits. He was not obeying his master's instructions, and came there for hire.

In the case of Black v. Bradshaw,³ it was held that a person who resided with his sister on a farm of which she was tenant, and who assisted her in the management of it, without remuneration except his board, was guilty of trespass within the meaning of the Day Trespass Act in illegal pursuit of game. No doubt that was a case in which the person was in pursuit of game and not of rabbits merely, but it establishes the proposition that the permission or authority of the tenant to a person to be upon lands does not exempt him from liability to a conviction for trespass if he is there for an illegal object, as indeed had been decided in previous cases.

¹ 14 R. (Just. Cases) 20, 1 White, 350.

² 6 R. (Just. Cases) 3, 4 Couper, 131.

³ 3 R. (Just. Cases) 18, 3 Couper, 209.

No. 9.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Richardson v.
Maitland.

In the case of *Niven v. Renton*¹ an agricultural tenant had given permission in writing for a day's shooting over his farm to a person who was neither a member of his household, in his employment, nor shooting for remuneration. He was found shooting on the farm and convicted of trespass. Upon appeal the first question put to the Court was whether the appellant, not being one of the persons defined in subsection (b) of subsection (1) of section 1 of the Ground Game Act, could be authorised by the tenant to kill ground game. The Court answered the question in the negative.

The second question was whether the appellant, in the circumstances stated, committed a trespass within the meaning of the Day Trespass Act. The Court answered this question in the affirmative.

The result appears to me to be that since the passing of the Ground Game Act the tenant of a farm whose sole right to kill ground game—that is, hares and rabbits—is derived from that Act, cannot validly authorise anyone to kill such game otherwise than in the way and under the limitations specified in that Act, and that anyone found on land shooting such ground game without having been so validly authorised is liable to conviction for trespass. In this case the tenant Mr Christie's right to kill ground game was solely derived from the Act, and the appellant was not duly authorised by him to kill ground game in respect that he was not authorised in writing. It is true that the authority given was only to kill rabbits, but the Act makes no distinction between hares and rabbits—in the sense of the Act rabbits are as much ground game as hares. I am therefore of opinion that the appellant was liable to conviction for trespass, and was rightly convicted, and that the appeal should be refused.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

In the course of the argument a great many points were discussed, some of them depending on very fine distinctions, which do not appear to me to be raised by the case. It appears to me to be a very simple case indeed, and I think the Sheriff has disposed of it on right grounds.

The offence constituted by the statute is “being or trespassing upon lands without the leave of the proprietor in search or pursuit of game or conies,” and the facts constituting that offence are held by the Sheriff to have been proved, inasmuch as he finds that the appellant on a certain day was found on a certain farm belonging to Sir James Gibson Maitland, with a gun, and with the purpose of killing rabbits. The only defence maintained by the appellant is that he was there with the verbal authority of Mr Christie, who was tenant of the farm. Mr Christie's sole right to grant that authority is admitted to be the Ground Game Act, 1880. Now, this Act makes it a condition of granting a valid authority to kill ground game, including both hares and rabbits, that the authority should be in writing, and therefore the verbal authority of the tenant is obviously no defence at all. I agree with the Sheriff, and for the reasons which Lord Adam has stated I think that the appellant was rightly convicted.

¹ 15 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 1 White, 578.

No. 9.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Richardson v.
Maitland.

Taking this view of the case, I do not think it necessary to inquire what are the common law rights of an agricultural tenant where the right to kill rabbits has not been reserved to the landlord, because it is part of the case stated to us that the tenant here had no such common law right, inasmuch as the right to kill rabbits was reserved in the lease to the landlord. Nor do I think it necessary to consider how far a farm servant may be justified by his master's order in doing things which the master has no power at law to authorise. That question is not raised, since the appellant does not fall within the class of farm servants at all.

On the whole matter I agree in the conclusion reached by Lord Adam, and for the reasons which he has given.

The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

WISHART & SANDERSON, W.S.—KEITH R. MAITLAND, W.S.—Agents.

No. 10.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Cormack v.
Mackenzie.

DAVID CORMACK, Complainer.—A. S. D. Thomson.
JOHN ALEXANDER MACKENZIE (Burgh Prosecutor of Lockerbie), Respondent.—John Wilson.

Complaint—Relevancy—Clerical error in citation of section of statute—Penalty—Public-House—The Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), section 2, enacted,—“ . . . and the penalties and forfeitures provided by the recited Acts or either of them for breaches of or offences against the terms, provisions, and conditions of certificates, shall apply to breaches of or offences against the terms, provisions, and conditions of certificates granted under this Act.”

One of the recited Acts was the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 58 (Home Drummond Act), sec. 21 of which sets forth certain penalties.

A licensed grocer was convicted upon a complaint which set forth that the accused had been “guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, particularly the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 2 thereof, and the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 21 thereof, in so far as” he did on a certain day within his shop, and in breach of his certificate, sell whisky to a drunk man, “whereby the said accused is liable” in certain penalties specified, which were the penalties provided by the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, sec. 21. He brought a suspension, in which he alleged that the figure 1 in the reference to section 21 of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, had been added to the complaint after it was served upon him.

The Court refused the bill, holding that as the penalties were specifically set forth in the complaint it was unnecessary to refer to the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, and consequently that the error in the citation of that Act, assuming that there was an error, did not invalidate the conviction.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kinnear.

DAVID CORMACK, grocer, High Street, Lockerbie, was convicted upon a complaint, at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor of Lockerbie, setting forth,—“That David Cormack, grocer, residing in High Street, of the said burgh of Lockerbie, who holds a certificate for the sale of excisable liquors at High Street, Lockerbie aforesaid, has been guilty of an offence against the laws for the Regulation of Public-Houses in Scotland, particularly the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 2 thereof, and the Act 9 George IV. chapter 58, section 21 thereof—in so far as on Saturday, the 5th day of December 1896, between the hours of four and five o'clock afternoon, No. 10. he, the said David Cormack, did within his shop occupied by him in High Street aforesaid, and in respect of which he holds said certificate, and in breach of the conditions of said certificate, sell or supply a flask bottle containing two gills or thereby of whisky or other excisable liquor, and a sample bottle containing one glass or thereby of whisky or other excisable liquor, to" R. M., "while he, the said" R. M., "was in a state of intoxication, and such offence is the first offence, whereby the said accused is liable to a penalty of £5 sterling, with the expenses of conviction, to be ascertained upon conviction, and in default of payment within fourteen days next after conviction, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one calendar month; and further, to have his said certificate declared forfeited and void and null."

Feb. 6, 1897.
Cormack v.
Mackenzie.

Cormack brought a suspension, in which he averred, inter alia,—"The complainer has discovered since the conviction that the principal complaint is vitiated in essentialibus. The figure '1' of the section '21' of 9 George IV. chapter 58, has been, he avers, added since the complaint was served, and he believes also since the conviction and sentence were pronounced, and the addition, which is manifestly in a different hand from that by which the rest of the complaint has been written, is unauthenticated. He further avers that the principal complaint as thus altered is disconform to the copy complaint served upon him, the principal complaint having the words '9 George IV. chapter 58, section 21,' while the service copy has the words '9 George IV. chapter 58, section 2.'"

He pleaded;—1. The conviction and sentence complained of are null and void, and ought to be suspended in respect (1) the complaint is irrelevant and misleading; (2) the principal complaint is vitiated in essentialibus; and (3) the copy of the complaint served upon the complainer is disconform to the principal complaint.

Argued for the complainer;—1. The complaint was irrelevant without the figure 1 in the section, because there was no proper specification of the particular section of the Act of 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, which the complainer was said to have contravened.¹ 2. The service copy was not a copy of any existing complaint.²

Argued for the respondent;—1. The alteration was immaterial, because the section was not necessary to the complaint. The complaint stated specifically that the penalty was £5. 2. A mere clerical error in a complaint was not a ground of suspension, unless the accused could shew that he had suffered prejudice thereby.³

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—Apart from the alleged blunder in the citation of a section, this complaint is not well drawn. It is quite plain that selling whisky by a licensed grocer to a drunk man is a contravention of the 2d section of the Act of 1862, that being the enactment which subjects the sale of liquor by a grocer to the conditions specified in the relative schedule, and makes a violation of any of those conditions an offence. Instead, however, of simply libelling the offence as an offence against the Act of

¹ Buchanan v. Wilson, July 16, 1896, 23 R. (Just. Cases) 86.

² Stewart v. Lang, Nov. 22, 1894, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 9, 1 Adam, 493.

³ Armstrong v. Stevenson, Dec. 12, 1892, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 21, 3 White, 373; Dunsmore v. Threshie, Nov. 3, 1896, to be reported, infra.

No. 10.
—
Feb. 6, 1897.
Cormack v.
Mackenzie.

1862, the complaint goes on to describe it as an offence also against the Home Drummond Act. The only bearing which the Home Drummond Act has on the matter is that the Act of 1862 says that the new offences which it creates shall be visited with the same penalties as are set out in the Home Drummond Act. Of course this does not make the new offences contraventions of the Home Drummond Act (which had nothing to say to grocers), and it only became necessary to mention the Home Drummond Act in the complaint at all if in setting out the penalties for the offence charged the complainer had chosen to refer to that Act. He did not require to do so, for he has taken what is perhaps the better plan of saying, in so many words, what those penalties are.

The conclusion, therefore, which I come to is that the mention of the Home Drummond Act was unessential and unnecessary; and that even assuming as true the averments of the appellant as to the alteration made on the number of the section cited, the conviction is not thereby invalidated.

I am therefore for refusing the bill.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNENAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill.

JOHN FAIRMAN, S.S.C.—J. & A. HASTIE, Solicitors—Agents.

No. 11.
—
Feb. 6, 1897.
Jackson v.
Stevenson.

JOHN JACKSON, Appellant.—James Clark.
JAMES CHARLES STEVENSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Roxburghshire),
Respondent.—John Wilson.

Complaint—Penalty—Want of specification—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), and 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33).—A complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, set forth a contravention of two Acts of Parliament, and in the prayer craved the Court to adjudge accused "to suffer the penalties provided by the said Acts." The body of the complaint contained no reference to penalties.

Held that the complaint was irrelevant for want of specification.

Fishing—Water-bailiff—Police-constable—Right to search before apprehension—Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. cxlviii.), sec. 37.—Sec. 37 of the Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, enacts,—“The superintendent and water-bailiffs appointed as aforesaid shall, after being sworn into office, have and be entitled to exercise the powers and authorities of constables in regard to all matters connected with this Act, in the same manner as if offences against this Act were breaches of the peace.”

Opinions per curiam that water-bailiffs are not entitled to search a person whom they suspect to be guilty of illegal fishing unless they have previously apprehended him upon what they believe to be good grounds, or unless they have a warrant to search him.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kinnear.

JOHN JACKSON, millworker, Hawick, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh upon a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, and bearing to be brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.

The complaint set forth,—“That John Jackson, a millworker, residing in the burgh of Hawick, has contravened the 39th section of the Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, in so far as, upon the 28th November 1896, he did, on the right side of the Ale Water, about 500 yards below Ancrum House Dairy, in the parish of Ancrum and county of Roxburgh, resist and make forcible opposition to and assault George Cameron, sergeant of water-bailiffs, Nisbet Railway Crossing, and John Munro, water-bailiff, St Boswells, persons employed in the execution of said Act, and the Tweed Fisheries Amendment Act, 1859, by violently resisting them and throwing them down, and did also throw the said John Munro with great force into the water of Ale, whereby they were both hurt and injured in their persons." No. 11.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Jackson v.
Stevenson.

"May it therefore please your Lordship to grant warrant to cite the said John Jackson to appear before your Lordship to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to convict him of the aforesaid contravention, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Acts."

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, "in respect that the penalty was not specified therein, and also in respect that it did not set forth that the panel was committing an offence against the Tweed Acts at the time and place the alleged contravention took place."

The Sheriff-substitute (Speirs) repelled the objections, and after hearing evidence convicted the accused and fined him.

Jackson obtained a case.

The case stated,—“It was proved by two bailiffs, who were on a scaur thirty or forty feet above the river, that the accused, though fishing with rod and line, was apparently not doing so in a legal manner. So convinced were the bailiffs that the accused was ‘snig-gling,’ that they went to the river-side and wanted to search him. The accused objected, but after a considerable struggle assented. The fishing-line was short, and attached to the reel on the rod, there was no gut-line or hook on the line, some bullets, such as are used for weighting a line when foul fishing, were found in the pockets of the accused, also some fine wire (such as is used for fastening on hooks in foul fishing), and large undressed hooks, salmon size. I held that the bailiffs were sufficiently justified in supposing that the accused was fishing in an illegal manner before they searched him (although they did not actually see any hooks on the line), and consequently that the accused was bound to submit to being searched; not having done so, but having assaulted and resisted the bailiffs while (as I held) they were in the execution of their duty, I found him guilty.”

The following questions of law were stated :—“(1) Was the prosecutor bound to insert in the body of the complaint the penalties which had been incurred by the alleged contravention of the 39th section of the Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857? (2) Were the bailiffs, under the circumstances disclosed in the foregoing narrative, entitled to insist on searching the accused?”

Argued for the appellant ;—(1) The complaint was irrelevant. It contained no statement whatever of the penalty sought to be enforced. That was a defect in substance which vitiated the whole proceedings.¹ (2) The conviction was bad. It was a conviction of assaulting water-bailiffs in the discharge of their duty. But it appeared from the Sheriff-substitute's statement that they were acting outwith their

¹ Thomson v. Wardlaw, Jan. 23, 1865, 5 Irvine, 45; Blains v. Rankine, March 15, 1892, 19 R. (Just. Cases) 96, 3 White, 221; M'Leod v. Tarras, Oct. 24, 1892, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 6, 3 White, 339; M'Ewen v. Lord Abinger, Jan. 19, 1894, 21 R. (Just. Cases) 14, 1 Adam, 314.

No. 11.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Jackson v.
Stevenson.

duty, for they had searched the appellant without first apprehending him, and in order to find out whether the case was one upon which they could or could not arrest him.¹

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The penalty was sufficiently stated in the complaint, for it appeared in section 39 of the Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, of which the complaint set forth a contravention. (2) Under section 37 of the Act the water-bailiffs had the same powers as constables, and they were within their right in searching a suspected person.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This complaint bears to be under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but it departs in an important, and as I think an essential, particular from the statutory form of complaint. It contains no statement at all of the nature of the penalty sought to be enforced. The body of the complaint says not one word about penalty; the prayer of the complaint merely, in general terms, prays the Court to adjudge the accused “to suffer the penalties provided by the said Acts.”

While a departure from the statutory style of complaint may not be in all cases fatal, its effect must depend on the nature and quality of the deviation. Now, the matter of penalties is matter of substance, and I am not aware of any case in which such latitude has been tolerated as we have here. The complainer may either name the penalties, or he may refer by chapter and section to the enactment which sets them forth. But it will not do to libel two Acts of Parliament and then bid the accused read them through and find out what he is liable to. There is no reason at all for encouraging such lax practice.

My opinion is, therefore, that the conviction cannot stand.

This being so, it is not necessary to decide the further objection argued to us, but as a serious question is involved, it may be well that it should not pass unnoticed. The Sheriff's statement of the facts does not make it quite clear whether the appellant had been apprehended before the bailiffs searched his person, or only after. As I read the case they did not apprehend him, and had not resolved to apprehend him, until the result of their search confirmed their previous suspicions. If this were so, then I do not think that they were within their powers, and therefore I could not hold them to have been in the execution of the Acts when the appellant resisted them.

The right of the bailiffs, be it observed, is to exercise the powers and authorities of constables in the same manner as if the statutory offences were breaches of the peace. Now, a constable is entitled to arrest, without a warrant, any person seen by him committing a breach of the peace, and he may arrest on the direct information of eye-witnesses. Having arrested him, I make no doubt that the constable could search him. But it is a totally different matter to search a man in order to find evidence to determine whether you will apprehend him or not. If the search succeeds (such is the condition of the argument) you will apprehend him, but if the search does not succeed you will not apprehend him. Now, I have only to say that I know no authority for ascribing to constables the right to make such tentative searches, and they seem contrary to constitutional principle. If the constable requires to make such a search, it can only be because without it he is not justified in apprehending; and, without a warrant, to search a person not liable to apprehension seems palpably illegal. A constable or bailiff must make up his mind on what he sees (or hears on credible information) whether to arrest or not, and if he does arrest in good faith, the law will protect him, whether his opinion at the time of the guilt of the person arrested prove accurate or not. No. 11.

¹ Mauchline v. Stevenson, March 6, 1878, 5 R. (Just. Cases) 21, 4 Couper, 20.

Feb. 6, 1897.
Jackson v. Stevenson.

As I have said, the Sheriff's findings of fact do not raise this question with clearness; but as they rather point to a grave irregularity, it seems right that all concerned should be warned of the true limits of a water-bailiff's authority.

LORD ADAM.—The prosecution in this case is brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1864, and the prosecutor professes to make use of the forms of complaint contained in the schedule to that Act. I agree with what has been said in previous cases, that the forms are merely directory, and that any deviation from them does not necessarily lead to the quashing of the conviction,—that is, however, always provided that such deviation is not material. The question in this case is whether the deviation from the statutory form is material or not. In a recent case, where the conclusion was that the accused should suffer the pains of law, instead of certain penalties inflicted by the Act under which the complaint was brought, the deviation was held not to be material because it was held that pains of law included penalties. But in this case there is what I never remember to have seen before, an absence of any statement in point of fact that the party complained against had incurred any penalties or pains of law whatever. The thing is an entire blank. All that is said is “whereby they” i.e., the two persons mentioned, “were both hurt and injured in their persons.” My difficulty is that I do not see how a Judge can be asked to convict a person in a case where it is not averred that he has incurred either a statutory penalty or the pains of law at all. What the Judge can be asked to do is to convict the person complained against, and to find him liable in certain penalties which he is said to have incurred. But if he is not said to have incurred any penalty, the Judge cannot be asked to convict, and I think that the omission in this case is a material blot on the complaint.

I agree with your Lordship as to the merits, although it may not be necessary to dispose of the case on that point. I have had the greatest difficulty in finding out from the statement by the Sheriff whether the alleged search, or attempted search and consequent resistance, took place before or after the appellant was apprehended. It is quite clear from what the Sheriff says that he thinks that if the bailiffs had in fact apprehended the appellant, they had good grounds for doing so, but he does not say whether they had apprehended him or not. And I agree with your Lordship that it appears rather that the bailiffs searched the prisoner with the hope of finding evidence which could enable them to apprehend him, and that the search was not made after they had apprehended him, with a view to secure evidence,

No. 11. which they would have had power to do. This difficulty I have in the case, and I am glad that it is not necessary to decide on this point.
 Feb. 6, 1897.
 Jackson v.
 Stevenson.

I agree with your Lordship as to the rights and duties of bailiffs and constables in such circumstances. If they have sufficient evidence before their eyes, or from proper information, that a person is guilty of an offence, they may apprehend him. They are not entitled to search anyone before his apprehension. On the other hand, I agree that if it be necessary that the person who has been apprehended should be searched on the spot, a constable or bailiff is within his rights in doing so. Of course he does so at the risk of being made civilly responsible if he does it unlawfully.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, both as to the ground on which this conviction should be quashed, and also in the observations which have been made by your Lordships on the general question raised.

I have the same difficulty as your Lordships as to whether the Sheriff intended to find that the bailiffs had searched the appellant before apprehending him and without having sufficient grounds for apprehending him, or whether they searched him after they had apprehended him on what they thought sufficient grounds. I have no doubt that a bailiff or constable has no authority to search the person of a man whom there is no sufficient ground for apprehending and no warrant to search.

THE COURT answered the first question in the case in the affirmative, found it unnecessary to answer the remaining question, and sustained the appeal.

W. & J. L. OFFICER, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 12. ROBERT WEIR AND ANOTHER (Joint Procurators-Fiscal of Justice of Peace Court, Hamilton), Appellants.—Lees—McClure.
 Mar. 12, 1897.
 Weir v. Bryce.
 JAMES BRYCE, Respondent.—Johnston.

Public-House—Certificate—Confirmation—"New certificate"—Publicans Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 26), secs. 4 and 6.—The Publicans' Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876, sec. 4, defines "new certificate" to mean "a certificate granted by the competent authority for a licence for the sale of excisable liquors to any person in respect of any premises which are not certificated at the time of the application for such grant."

Sec. 6 enacts that "a grant of a new certificate . . . shall not be valid unless it shall be confirmed by a standing committee of Justices of the Peace for the county."

Held that a hotel certificate granted to a person who held a public-house certificate in respect of the same premises was a "new certificate" in the sense of the Act, and required confirmation in order to its validity.

HIGH COURT. ON 28th December 1896 James Bryce, spirit-dealer, Larkhall, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court at Hamilton on a complaint which set forth that the accused "who holds a public-house certificate for the sale of excisable liquors in the house or premises occupied by him in London Street, Larkhall," did in breach of his certificate, and in contravention of the Public-Houses Acts libelled, on Sunday, 15th November 1896, in his said premises, sell excisable liquor to a person named and designed.
 Lord Justice-Clerk.
 Lord Trayner.
 Lord Moncreiff.

The Justices acquitted the accused.

The Procurators-fiscal obtained a case. The following facts were stated:—At the half-yearly Licensing Court, held in April 1896, the Justices renewed Bryce's public-house certificate for the year from 15th May 1896 till 15th May 1897. At the half-yearly Licensing Court, held on 27th October 1896, he applied for a hotel licence, and the Justices, without formally recalling his existing public-house certificate, granted a hotel certificate in his favour for the same premises. After obtaining the hotel certificate, Bryce proceeded to act on it, without having applied for or obtained confirmation; and on the Sunday libelled he sold excisable liquors in the premises to the person mentioned in the complaint, who was then a bona fide traveller, and as such entitled to be supplied with excisable liquor by the holder of a hotel certificate in Larkhall.

No. 12.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Weir v. Bryce.

The following was the question of law:—"Whether the respondent was entitled to act upon the hotel certificate obtained by him in October 1896, the same not having been confirmed by the Licensing Committee of the district, in terms of section 4 of the Publicans' Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876?" *

Argued for the appellants;—The Justices ought to have convicted. The words in sec. 4 of the Act, "not certificated at the time of the application," meant not certificated in respect of a certificate of the same kind as that which had been applied for; and it was impossible to say that a hotel certificate was the same in kind as a public-house certificate; the former conferred much more extensive powers of supplying liquor. The question had been decided in this way in England upon the construction of a practically identical statute.¹ The full title of the Scots Act shewed that it was passed to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England.

Argued for the respondent;—The English case was not in point, in the first place because it arose upon the construction of the English Licensing Act of 1873 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 94), which in its terms differed materially from the Scots Act; and secondly, because it proceeded upon the radical distinction in English licensing law between a beer-house licence and a public-house licence, which proceeded from different authorities, and were regulated by different statutes. No such distinction existed, according to the Scotch statutes, between a public-house certificate and a hotel certificate. The expression "not certificated" occurring in a Scots public-house statute was unambiguous, and therefore was not open to construction. It was impossible to describe premises for which a public-house certificate had been granted as being "not certificated," without reading a qualification into the words for which there was no warrant. The appellants'

* The Publicans' Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 26)—the full title of which is "An Act to assimilate the law of Scotland relating to the granting of licences to sell intoxicating liquors to the law of England,"—enacts, sec. 4,—“A 'new certificate' means a certificate granted by the competent authority for a license for the sale of excisable liquors to any person in respect of any premises which are not certificated at the time of the application for such grant, but shall not apply to the rebuilding of certificated premises which have been destroyed by fire, tempest or other unforeseen and unavoidable calamity.”

Sec. 6 enacts that “a grant of a new certificate . . . shall not be valid unless it shall be confirmed by a standing committee of Justices of the Peace for the county (hereinafter in this Act called the county licensing committee).”

¹ Marwick v. Codlin, 1874, L. R., 9 Q. B. 509.

No. 12. construction led to this result, that where a public-house licence was granted in place of a hotel licence, confirmation was necessary ; which was surely a reductio ad absurdum.
 Mar. 12, 1897. Weir v. Bryce.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If I had any doubt in this case I should have asked for further argument. But I have no doubt how the case should be decided. Under the present state of our licensing laws anyone who applies for and obtains the renewal of a certificate already existing does not require to apply for confirmation, but anyone who applies for and obtains a new certificate must apply for its confirmation at the Confirmation Court, and unless it be confirmed he acts illegally in acting under it. Now, in this case the respondent held a public-house certificate which had still a certain period to run. He applied for and obtained a hotel licence at the October Court. He did not apply for confirmation of this licence, but proceeded to carry on business as under a hotel licence. The question is whether he acted legally in doing so. Now, I am unable to hold that he can do so merely because he already has a certificate, if he makes an application for a certificate of a different character entitling him to act in a manner which would be illegal under his former certificate. I am of opinion that such an application is an application for a new certificate. In the English case of Marwick v. Codlin,¹ the Chief Justice (Cockburn) said very distinctly that where a man who had a licence to sell wine and beer applied for a public-house licence, that was an application for a new certificate, even although it was an application for a certificate for premises already licensed. I can see no difference in principle between that case and this. A publican is entitled to sell excisable liquors on certain days and within certain hours, and that is all that he has any right to do. A hotelkeeper is in a totally different position. He is entitled to sell to certain persons, i.e., to lodgers and bona fide travellers, at any hour and on any day of the week. He is also entitled to keep rooms for lodgers, and to supply them with drink in their rooms at all hours and on all days. It seems to me that when the respondent applied for a certificate of such a character he applied for a new certificate. I am therefore of opinion that in this case the applicant, in applying for a hotel-keeper's certificate, applied for a new certificate, and that he had no right to act under it until it was confirmed.

I accordingly answer the question in this case in the negative.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 13. THOMAS AITCHISON, Complainer.—Guy.
 GEORGE NEILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of the Police Court, Glasgow), Respondent.—Lees—Deas.
 Mar. 12, 1897. Aitchison v. Neilson.
Conviction—General Statutory Charge under two subsections of same section—General Conviction—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict.

¹ L. R., 9 Q. B. 509.

cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 135.—The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 135, under the general heading, “offences against the rules of good conduct,” contains twenty-one subsections or articles, each specifying a particular offence or offences, the subsections or articles being arranged in groups according to the penalties specified in headings prefixed to the groups. The offences embraced in the section were of many varieties, including theft, swindling, disorderly conduct, assault, &c. Articles 5 and 6 under the heading, “To a penalty of £10, or alternatively, without penalty, to imprisonment for sixty days,” were as follow :—“(5) Every person who is riotous, disorderly, or indecent in his behaviour. (6) Every person who commits an assault upon any male child whose age does not, in the opinion of the magistrate, exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, or upon any constable on duty.”

No. 13.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Aitchison v.
Neilson.

A person was charged on a complaint setting forth that he did, contrary to the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 135 (article 5) thereof, conduct himself in a riotous and disorderly manner, by using threatening language towards two police-constables named ; further, the said accused did, time and place aforesaid, assault the said constables contrary to said Act and section (article 6) thereof, whereby the accused was liable to a penalty not exceeding £10, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days. The complaint prayed the magistrates to convict the accused “of the aforesaid contravention.”

The accused was convicted “of the contravention charged.”

Conviction suspended, in respect that it was a singular conviction upon a complaint charging two separate and distinct offences.

Gemmell v. Weir, Jan. 28, 1897, supra, p. 23, distinguished.

ON 23d February 1897 Thomas Aitchison, Kemp’s Land, Bishop-briggs, near Glasgow, was charged in the Police Court at Glasgow on a complaint setting forth that the accused “did, contrary to the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 135 (article 5) thereof, on 14th February 1897, in Springburn Road, Glasgow, conduct himself in a riotous and disorderly manner by cursing, swearing, and using threatening language to William M’Kay and Neil M’Lean, constables in the Glasgow Police, on duty, whereby the lieges were annoyed and disturbed : Further, the said Thomas Aitchison did, time and place aforesaid, assault the said William M’Kay and Neil M’Lean by kicking them and beating them with his fists, contrary to said Act and section above specified (article 6) thereof. Whereby the said accused is liable to a penalty not exceeding £10, and in default of payment to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months, or alternatively without penalty to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days,” with certain liabilities as to caution.*

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), under the general heading, “IX. Offences against the rules of good conduct,” sets forth, inter alia, sec. 135, which enacts,—“Every person who is guilty of any of the following acts or omissions within the city shall, in respect thereof, be liable to a penalty not exceeding the respective amounts, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding the respective periods hereinafter mentioned, videlicet :—

“To imprisonment for sixty days.

“(1) Every person who commits or attempts to commit theft. . . .”

Then came (2), which specified the unlawful appropriation of property and reset ; and (3), which specified chain-dropping and swindling.

“To a penalty of ten pounds, or alternatively, without penalty, to imprisonment for sixty days.

“(4)”

“(5) Every person who is riotous, disorderly, or indecent in his behaviour.

“(6) Every person who commits an assault upon any male child whose

No. 13.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Aitchison v.
 1897.

The prayer of the complaint craved the magistrates to convict the accused "of the aforesaid contravention, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Act."

Aitchison pleaded not guilty, but was convicted "of the contravention charged," and fined £5, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment.

Aitchison brought a suspension, pleading,—(1) The said warrant or sentence ought to be suspended, with expenses, in respect that while the complaint charges two separate offences, the prayer of the complaint prays for conviction of one only, without specifying which. (2) The said warrant or sentence ought to be suspended, with expenses, in respect that it convicts of only one contravention when two are charged, and does not specify to which contravention the conviction applies.

The respondent—the Procurator-fiscal—was called on to support the conviction. He argued that, on the authority of the undernoted cases,¹ both the complaint and the conviction were unobjectionable.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think that this conviction cannot be sustained. In the complaint two charges are made of two offences under different subsections of section 135 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. These are not only different subsections, but they deal with different offences, the species facti of which are distinct. That being the state of the complaint, the prayer is to convict the accused "of the aforesaid contravention." Such a prayer gives no indication as to which of the offences is the offence of which the magistrate is asked to convict; and I more than doubt if any conviction whatever could follow on such a prayer if not amended or the complaint restricted.

The conviction is just as faulty as the complaint. It convicts the complainer "of the contravention charged." But which contravention? for there are two. I think that conviction cannot stand, because from it it cannot be ascertained what offence the complainer was convicted of.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I think that both the complaint and the conviction are out of shape. If the 135th section of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866 is examined, it will be found to contain under the general heading of "Offences against the rules of good conduct," twenty-one subsections or articles containing a number of specified crimes and offences, to the commission of which certain graduated penalties are attached. Each group of offences is distinct and separate. The various articles are age does not in the opinion of the magistrate exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, or upon any constable on duty, or who commits an assault to the effusion of blood, or causing serious injury upon any male person exceeding the age of fourteen years, or who aids or incites any person to commit such assault.

"(7) . . .

"To a penalty of five pounds, or alternatively, without penalty, to imprisonment for thirty days.

"(8) Every person who alters or defaces the name or address . . . on any box or barrel . . . without the authority of the owner."

Then follow other articles, making 21 in all, classified as above, according to the penalties attached.

¹ Prentice v. Linton, Feb. 7, 1883, 5 Couper, 210; Gemmell v. Weir, Jan. 28, 1897, supra, p. 23.

not alternative modes of committing a statutory offence. For example, No. 13. the 1st article applies to theft or attempts to commit theft or other crimes of dishonesty; the 2d article to unlawful appropriation of property and resetting; the 3d to chain-dropping and swindling; the 5th to riotous, disorderly, or indecent behaviour; the 6th to certain assaults, and so forth.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Aitchison v.
Neilson.

What is charged in this complaint is (1) a contravention of article 5, and (2) (as a distinct and substantive charge) a contravention of article 6. For each offence a penalty of £10 or sixty days' imprisonment is awarded by the statute; but in the complaint the two offences are treated as one, and in the prayer the prosecutor asks the magistrates to convict the accused "of the aforesaid contravention." The conviction echoes the prayer, and convicts the accused "of the contravention charged." Now, as two distinct crimes were charged, the conviction should have stated whether the accused was convicted of both or of only one, and if so, of which.

The recent case of *Gemmell v. Weir*¹ is clearly distinguishable. The charge was one of breach of a publican's certificate. The certificate, framed in the statutory form, contained a series of cardinal prohibitions, the particular prohibition alleged to have been contravened being that striking at trading during prohibited hours. The charge was that the accused "did permit and suffer drinking in said public-house by John Muir, and did sell and give out to him excisable liquors" during prohibited hours. This was not a charge of two separate offences, but of two acts, by both or either of which that part of the certificate may be contravened. It was therefore no abuse of language to term the commission of both acts a "contravention." Here two distinct crimes are charged; and although no doubt the assault was closely connected with the riotous conduct, the question, as the complaint is framed, is the same as if the accused had, under a complaint charging him with theft under article 1, and assault under article 6, been convicted "of the contravention charged."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely agree with your Lordships. The two subsections relate to separate offences, not even of the same nature. It is suggested that because a number of offences are put into one section a general conviction on a charge alleging the contravention of two or more of them would be good. But it is plain that the only object for placing them together is that the penalty is the same, and that they are in reality separate sections. Suppose the question arose with any other two subsections. Take the one in question here (5) dealing with riotous, disorderly, or indecent behaviour, and subsection (8), dealing with the offence of altering or defacing the name or address on any barrel, box, bag, &c., not belonging to him, and without the authority of the owner, could it be suggested that if the complaint alleged a breach of these subsections, and a conviction "of the contravention charged" followed, that conviction would be good?

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

WYLIE & ROBERTSON, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ Supra, p. 23.

No. 14.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellants.—Deas.
ALEXANDER RAMSAY, Respondent.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Ramsay.

Railway—Trespass—Level Crossing—Caledonian Railway Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. clxxix.), sec. 37.—The Caledonian Railway Act, 1893, sec. 37, enacts certain penalties for trespass on the company's railways, lands, and property, subject to the proviso that no person should be subject to any penalty under this enactment unless the company proved, to the satisfaction of the Sheriff or Justices, that a public notice warning persons not to trespass had been affixed, inter alia, "at the level crossing (if any) nearest to the spot where such trespass is alleged to have been committed." Held that the term "level crossing" included private level crossings, and therefore that the company were barred from exacting a penalty for trespass under sec. 37, where the level crossing nearest to the spot where the trespass was alleged to have been committed was a private level crossing, and no notice had been affixed at that crossing.

Administration of Justice—Judge—Declinature—Waiver—Court of Justiciary.—A railway company appealed to the High Court of Justiciary against a judgment of a Sheriff acquitting a person of a contravention of one of the company's statutes. Two of the Judges proposed a declinature on the ground that they were shareholders in the company. Question, whether it was competent for the parties to waive the declinature by joint minute.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 7th October 1893 Alexander Ramsay, clothier, Lintrathen Gardens, West Clepington Road, Dundee, was charged, in the Sheriff Court at Dundee, on a complaint at the instance of the Caledonian Railway Company, setting forth that the accused "did trespass upon the railway belonging to the complainers, in the parish of Liff and Benvie and county of Forfar, at a point 1110 yards or thereby northwards from Lochee station, by being or passing upon the said railway, and not for the purpose of lawfully crossing the same at a level crossing thereof, contrary to the 37th section of the Caledonian Railway Act, 1893."

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) found the complaint not proven.

The Railway Company obtained a case. It appeared from the case that the alleged trespass consisted in walking along a clear beaten footpath by the side of the company's railway, and questions were stated in the case as to whether, in so walking, Ramsay had committed a trespass; but the question now reported was as to whether the company had complied with the proviso in section 37 of their Act of 1893, quoted below,* by having a notice affixed at the level crossing nearest to the locus of the alleged trespass. Upon that question the case stated,—“The witnesses for the railway company were

* The Caledonian Railway Company Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. clxxix.), sec. 37, after enacting penalties for trespass on the company's railways, lands, and properties, contains this proviso,—“Provided that no person shall be subject to any penalty under this enactment unless the company shall prove to the Sheriff or Justices before whom complaint is laid that they have painted or fixed upon boards, or printed, painted, or enamelled on iron or any other material, public notice warning persons not to trespass upon their railways, stations, works, lands, and property, and that one or more of such notices has been affixed at the station on their railway, and at the level crossing (if any) nearest to the spot where such trespass is alleged to have been committed.”

No. 14.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Ramsay.

two railway porters from Lochee station and a railway inspector residing in Perth. . . . The porters proved that two copies of a printed paper placard, copy of which was produced,* were regularly exposed to view at Lochee station (being the station nearest to the spot where the trespass was alleged to have been committed), and were always replaced whenever it was observed that they had been destroyed.

. . . It was further proved that there was a copy of said placard exhibited at Baldovon level crossing, about 1300 yards off, which is the level crossing second in nearness to the locus of the alleged trespass, but that at the actually nearest level crossing there was no placard exhibited. It was the opinion of the railway officials who gave evidence that a placard at the latter crossing is not required by the statute libelled, because this level crossing is for the exclusive use of the contiguous farm, and the farmer is said to be bound to keep the gates of the crossing locked except when they are open for the purposes of his farm. It was not proved, however, that they were locked regularly or on the afternoon of the alleged trespass."

The following was the question in law on the point now reported :—
"3. Whether the failure to publish the placard or other statutory notice at the nearest level crossing, however limited the use of that crossing, does not bar the prosecutors from pleading that they have fulfilled every condition necessary to entitle them to exact the penalty imposed by the statute?"

The appeal was first called on 26th January 1897 before the Lord Justice-General, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear, when Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear proposed a declinature on the ground that they were shareholders in the Caledonian Railway Company. Ramsay was not represented, and the case was continued for hearing by a differently constituted Bench, the Lord Justice-General observing that it was doubtful whether it would have been competent for the parties to waive the declinature by joint minute, according to the practice generally competent in the civil Courts.

The appeal was subsequently heard on 12th March before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Trayner, and Lord Moncreiff, Ramsay again being unrepresented.

After hearing the appellants,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not inclined, in a case where only one side is represented, to decide the abstract question as to what constitutes a trespass; and as I think the case can be determined upon another ground, I prefer so to dispose of it. Section 37 of the Caledonian Railway Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. clxxiv.), provides—(His Lordship quoted the proviso). Now, here at a level crossing nearest to the place in question no notice was affixed. It is said in answer that this was a private level crossing leading to and from a particular farm. Nevertheless, it was a level crossing. It is plain that certain people—those connected with the farm—were entitled to use it, and it is not certain that anybody might not use it. It therefore appears to me that the company has not fulfilled the statutory requirements.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree on the ground proposed by your Lordship.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I also agree with your Lordship. If the question

* The placard produced was a notice, "pursuant to the Caledonian Railway Act, 1893," warning persons not to trespass on the company's railways, &c.

No. 14. had arisen with the farmer or any of his servants, I think that the Railway Company would have had no answer, and I think that it cannot make any difference that the question arises with one of the public.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Ramsay.

THE COURT answered the third question in the affirmative, found it unnecessary to answer the other questions, and dismissed the appeal.

HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S., Agents.

No. 15.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Frew v.
Morris.

JOHN FREW, Appellant.—Constable.
JOHN MORRIS, Respondent.—John Wilson.

Complaint—Service—Time—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 10.—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, section 10, enacts, that in prosecutions on account of the sale of a perishable article in contravention of the principal Act of 1875, the summons to appear should be served on the person charged within a period not exceeding twenty-eight days “from the time of the purchase” of the article.

Certain milk was purchased by a sanitary inspector at about nine o'clock in the forenoon of 4th November. A complaint, alleging a contravention of the Act of 1875, in respect of such sale, was served on the seller at about half-past seven in the evening of 2d December, the twenty-eighth day from the day of the purchase.

Held that the day on which the purchase took place was not to be taken into computation in calculating the statutory period, and therefore that the complaint had been served timeously.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 11th December 1896 John Morris, dairyman, Whitequarries, Abercorn, Linlithgowshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow, on a complaint at the instance of John Frew, sanitary inspector of the county, setting forth that the accused had contravened section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, by selling milk to the complainant with 5 per cent of water added.

The accused objected to the complaint, on the ground that it had not been served within twenty-eight days from the time of the alleged offence, as required by section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879.*

The Sheriff-substitute (Melville) sustained the objection, and dismissed the complaint.

The prosecutor obtained a case. It appeared from the complaint that the prosecutor had, at about nine o'clock on the morning of 4th November 1896, on the public road opposite the shop in Philpstoun occupied by John Hog, grocer, purchased from the accused two pennies' worth of sweet milk, and that the complaint was served upon the accused at about half-past seven o'clock on the evening of 2d December 1896. No. 15.

* The Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), section 10, enacts,—“In all prosecutions under the principal Act [The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 63)], and notwithstanding the provisions of section 20 of the said Act, the summons to appear before the magistrates shall be served upon the person charged with violating the statute within a reasonable time, and in the case of a perishable article, not exceeding twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase from such person for test purposes of the food or drug for the sale of which in contravention of the provisions of the principal Act the seller is rendered liable to prosecution, and particulars of the offence or offences against the said Act of which the seller is accused, and also the name of the prosecutor, shall be stated on the summons. . . .”

Mar. 12, 1897.
Frew v.
Morris.

The question in law was,—“ Whether the complaint in question had been served in terms of the Act 42 and 43 Victoria, chapter 30, section 10, within twenty-eight days from 4th November 1896, the date of the alleged offence or contravention.”

Argued for the appellant;—The question was, whether the statutory period was to be computed de momento in momentum or de die in diem. If the latter method of computation applied the service of the complaint had been timeous, for the milk would be regarded as having been sold at the last moment of the 4th November. That was the general method of computation, and ought to be applied here.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The general rule might be as stated by the appellant, but exceptions were recognised.² The present case ought to be treated as an exception, in the first place, because a penal statute ought to be construed in favour of the accused; and secondly, because the terminus a quo was described in the statute as the “time of the purchase,” not the “date” of the purchase. “Time” meant the actual time, and not a presumed or constructive time.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case we have to consider is this,—On a certain day in November last the appellant purchased a sample of milk from the respondent, and on the twenty-eighth day thereafter this complaint was served. The question before us is, was that sufficient compliance with the terms of the statute founded on, which enacts that proceedings shall be taken “within twenty-eight days from the time” when the sample is bought. Now, it was conceded by the respondent's counsel, that if the word “time” had been “date” he would not have been able to maintain that the period allowed for instituting proceedings must be calculated de momento in momentum; but he contended that the use of the word “time” by the statute demanded the more exact calculation of the period allowed, and that the service must be made within twenty-eight days from the moment of the purchase of the sample. I cannot concur in that view. I think that in the ordinary sense of our criminal law the word “time” means the day on which the fact or offence occurred, and the rule of law applies, that in computing a period from the time or day of the occurrence of any event, the day of that occurrence is not to be counted. The running of the time is to be counted as from midnight of that day, and therefore any proceedings raised before midnight of the day when the statutory period expires are timeously instituted. Thus, in the *Rothsay*³ case, it was matter of decision that, where the statute specified two months from the date of the offence as the period within which proceedings might be taken, a case which was raised on the

¹ Lindsay v. Giles, Feb. 27, 1844, 6 D. 771, per Lord Cockburn at p. 818, 16 Scot. Jur. 357; Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothsay, June 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 708, 45 Scot. Jur. 440; M'Vean v. Jamieson, Jan. 8, 1896, 23 R. 25, 2 Adam, 69; In re Railway Sleepers Supply Co., 1885, L. R., 29 Chan. Div. 204; Bell Comm. (M'L. edn.) i. 759.

² Scott v. Rutherford, Dec. 7, 1839, 2 D. 206; Goudy on Bankruptcy (2d edn.), p. 82.

³ 11 Macph. 708.

No. 15. last day of the two months following the day of the occurrence was timeously instituted under that statute.
 Mar. 12, 1897.
 Frew v.
 Morris.

The same reasoning applies forcibly to the present case. The words of the statute are distinct—"within twenty-eight days." The complaint was served on the twenty-eighth day,—that is, within a period not exceeding twenty-eight days from the date of the purchase of the sample. I am therefore of opinion that, both on the principle laid down in previous decisions, and also giving effect to the wording of the statute, the Sheriff was wrong, and ought to have repelled the objection to the timeousness of the service.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Answer the question in the case in the affirmative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge: Remit to him to proceed, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses," &c.

THOMAS LIDDLE, S.S.C.—JAMES F. MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 16. JAMES COLLISON, Complainer.—Crabb Watt—J. A. T. Robertson.
 Mar. 12, 1897.
 Collison v.
 Mitchell. ALEXANDER MITCHELL (Interim Burgh Prosecutor, Musselburgh), Respondent.—Sym.

Procedure—Separation of trials—Oppression.—A father and daughter were charged, on a single complaint, with selling beer without a certificate. They moved for a separation of the trials. The magistrates refused the motion. The father, having been convicted, brought a suspension on the ground that the magistrates had acted oppressively in refusing to separate the trials. Suspension refused.

Procedure—Conduct of trial—Recall of witness.—After the evidence for the prosecution and for the defence in a Police Court prosecution had been concluded, and before parties had addressed the Court, the magistrates recalled one of the witnesses and put certain questions to him. Suspension on the ground that the magistrates had acted incompetently in thus examining the witness refused.

Procedure—Record of proceedings—Productions—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 16.—At the trial on a summary complaint the accused produced a bottle of beer, with a printed label on it, and put questions regarding the contents of the bottle to certain of the witnesses adduced by him. No mention of the bottle with label was made in the record of the proceedings. The accused having been convicted brought a suspension on the ground that a "production, namely, a bottle of beer," was omitted from the record. Suspension refused in respect that the bottle was not "documentary evidence" within the meaning of section 16 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

At the trial on a summary complaint, charging the keeping of beer for the purpose of illegally trafficking in it, one of the witnesses for the defence deposed that the beer labelled was his property, and took out of his pocket an invoice for beer in his favour from the brewers. He retained possession of the invoice, and no mention of it was made in the record of the proceedings. The accused was convicted. In a suspension on the ground that the invoice had not been noted on the record, held that, as the invoice had not been made a production, it was not necessary to note it on the record.

ON 11th December 1896, James Collison, labourer, 143 High Street, Fisherrow, Musselburgh, and his daughter Elizabeth Collison, were charged before the Magistrates of Musselburgh on two complaints, at the instance of the burgh prosecutor.

No. 16.
Mar. 12, 1897.
Collison v.
Mitchell.

The first complaint set forth two charges, each applicable to both the accused, of having trafficked in excisable liquors without a certificate, in the house 143 High Street, Fisherrow, by selling beer to persons named on Sundays, the 15th and the 22d November 1896 respectively, contrary to the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 17.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ed. Moncreiff.

The second complaint set forth a charge, applicable to both the accused, of having on 22d November 1896, in the house 143 High Street, Fisherrow, said house not being licensed for the sale of excisable liquors, kept excisable liquors exceeding one gallon, viz., a barrel containing eight and a half gallons of beer, for the purpose of being illegally trafficked in, contrary to the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 20.

The diets were on the motion of the agent for the accused adjourned to 15th December, when the accused pleaded not guilty.

At the adjourned diet the accused were represented by counsel, who moved the Magistrates to separate the trials of the accused under the first complaint, on the ground that justice could not be done unless the evidence of the one could be adduced in favour of the other. The Magistrates, after hearing counsel for the accused and the burgh prosecutor for the prosecution, refused the motion.

James Collison was convicted under both complaints and was fined £2, 10s. in respect of the convictions of each of the charges under the first complaint, and dismissed with an admonition in respect of the conviction under the second. The complaints against Elizabeth Collison were found not proven.

James Collison brought a suspension, in which he maintained that the conviction under the first complaint ought to be suspended on the ground that the Magistrates, in refusing the motion for the separation of the trials, had acted oppressively, and also on the ground of the following circumstances as appearing from the bill of suspension and answers thereto by the burgh prosecutor:—

After the case for the prosecution under the first complaint had been closed, and in the course of the defence, a bottle containing liquid, labelled with a label bearing the words "Excelsior Beer," and a name and address, was produced by Collison, and two of his witnesses deposed that it was the same beer which was drunk by them on 22d November. There was no mention of this bottle on the record of the proceedings, and in respect of this omission, Collison pleaded that the conviction ought to be suspended on the ground "that a material production, namely, a bottle of beer, labelled as aforesaid, was omitted from the record."*

At the conclusion of the evidence for the accused, and before the

* The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), section 16, enacts, that "it shall not be necessary in any proceeding under the authority of this Act to record or preserve a note of the evidence adduced, but the record shall set forth, in the form of the schedule (I) to this Act annexed, the respondent's plea, if any, the names of the witnesses, if any, examined upon oath or affirmation, with a note of any documentary evidence that may be put in."

No. 16.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Collison v.
Mitchell.

prosecutor or counsel for the defence had addressed the Court, the Magistrates recalled two of the witnesses for the prosecution, and asked them to taste the beer in the bottle above mentioned, and to state whether it was the same beer as that spoken to by them in their evidence as having been bought by them on 15th November libelled. Collison maintained that the conviction ought to be suspended, in respect that it was incompetent for the Court to lead evidence after the case for the prosecution and for the accused had been closed.

Collison also maintained that the conviction under the second complaint ought to be suspended on the following ground as stated by him:—When the trial on that complaint was proceeding he adduced a witness who deponed to the firkin of beer libelled being his (witness) property, and witness “produced and deponed to the invoice in his name for said beer from the brewers. . . . Said invoice is not noted in the record.” Collison pleaded that the second conviction ought to be suspended, in respect “a material production spoken to by a witness for the defence was omitted from the record.”

The respondent made the following averment with respect to the last mentioned ground of suspension:—“Admitted that” the witness in question “took out of his pocket an invoice for beer which he alleged had been sent by” a beer-dealer named, “and that that invoice is not mentioned in the minute of procedure. It was not . . . put in evidence, but was returned by the said” witness “to his pocket. The Magistrates were never asked to look at it.”

At the hearing the complainer cited the undernoted authorities.¹
The respondent was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case it does not appear to me that a reply is necessary.

The first ground on which suspension is asked for is that there was legal oppression on the part of the Magistrates in refusing to separate the trials of the two accused. Now, separation of trials is always a matter peculiarly for the discretion of the Judge trying the case. I do not say that there may not be cases in which the Court would interfere—cases, for example, in which the prosecutor, for the sole purpose of depriving the accused of the only evidence which would be available to them in their defence, has included a number of onlookers it may be in the complaint. In such a case the Court might, and should, interfere to prevent oppression. But in ordinary circumstances this Court will not interfere with the discretion of the Judge trying a case in which two persons are charged, where he has applied his mind to the question and has refused to separate the trials.

The next point founded on for the suspender is, that after the evidence for the defence was closed, the Magistrates on their own motion recalled certain witnesses for the prosecution. As stated in the case and answers, it appears that in the course of the evidence for the defence a certain bottle was produced by accused's agent, and two witnesses for the defence were asked to taste the liquid contained in it, and to state whether the liquid was similar to what they had purchased from the accused on a particular date. This having been done, and the proof for the defence closed, certain witnesses who had spoken to the purchase of the liquor libelled in the complaint were recalled by the Magistrates and asked by them to taste the liquid contained in this bottle and say if it was the same as the liquid spoken to by them in their evidence as having been bought by them on the occasion libelled. Now, all this was quite proper. The Judge was quite entitled to recall a witness and to ask him whatever questions might seem necessary to ascertain the facts of the case.

¹ Kerr v. Phyn, March 21, 1893, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 60, 3 White, 480; H. M. Advocate v. Wilkie, Oct. 25, 1886, 1 White, 242; M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, 21 Lt. (Just. Cases) 69, 1 Adam, 448.

No. 16.
Mar. 12, 1897.
Collison v.
Mitchell.

The last objection taken to this conviction is that a material production in evidence is not noted in the record of the proceedings at the trial. Now, the Summary Procedure Act does not make it necessary to note any "article" produced in evidence, but only any "documentary evidence." It might be that the label on the bottle partakes of the nature of documentary evidence, and should have been mentioned on record if what was to be put in was the label, but the objection is not so stated. The plea is that the bottle itself should have been noted, and this is not necessary under the statute.

That disposes of all the objections taken to the first conviction.

The second conviction is challenged on the ground that a material production spoken to by one of the witnesses for the defence is not noted on record. As I understand this objection, it is that a witness for the defence in the course of his evidence took out of his pocket an invoice or receipt which he said was a receipt for beer which he had bought, he being brought to prove that he was the owner of the beer found in the suspender's shop. This receipt was not put into process, and I understand that the witness retained it in his own possession. It was not necessary, and it was not proposed by anyone, to make the receipt a production in the case, and there was therefore no necessity to note it in the record. It is quite recognised that a witness may take something out of his pocket to explain his evidence and return it to his pocket without its being made a production in the case or being required to be noted. It cannot be made a production in the case without some action on the part of the party desiring to have it produced.

I am, therefore, of opinion that all the reasons stated for suspension fall to be repelled.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill.

WILLIAM GEDDES, Solicitor—MACFARLANE & RICHARDSON, Solicitors—Agents.

ROBERT WHYTE (Procurator-Fiscal, Forfar), Appellant.—

Sol.-Gen. Dickson—C. K. Mackenzie, A.-D.

JAMES THOMSON AND ANOTHER, Respondents.

No. 17.

June 8, 1897.
Whyte v.
Thomson.

Fishing—Beam-Trawling—High and Low-water Marks—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 6.—The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, prohibits beam-trawling "within three miles

No. 17. of low-water mark of any part of the coast of Scotland" (except within areas to be defined by the Fishery Board). Held that the prohibited area includes the space between high-water mark and low-water mark.

June 8, 1897.
Whyte v.
Thomson.

Appeal against Judgment acquitting accused—Reversal of Judgment.—In an appeal against a judgment of a Sheriff acquitting the accused on a complaint charging a contravention of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Court sustained the appeal and reversed the determination of the Sheriff, but refused to remit the case to him with their opinion.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 27th March 1897 James Thomson, labourer, 17 Shore Wynd, Montrose, and John Thomson, labourer, 5 Shore Wynd, Montrose, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Forfar, on a complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused "did, on 20th January 1897, within Montrose Bay, at a part thereof in the estuary of the River Southesk distant 200 yards or thereby in a westerly direction from the suspension bridge, Montrose, use the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling, contrary to section 6 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889."*

The Sheriff-substitute (Dudley Stuart) pronounced this judgment,—
"In respect of the evidence adduced, finds the complaint against the respondents James Thomson and John Thomson not proved: Therefore assoilzies and dismisses them simpliciter from the bar."

The procurator-fiscal obtained a case. The case set forth,—
"It was proved that between 9 o'clock and 11 o'clock P.M. on the date labelled the respondents fished in the said estuary from a small oar-boat by the method known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling, the nets and apparatus used being similar to those employed by large steam trawlers, but of a smaller size. The point at which the respondents were trawling is in the estuary of the river Southesk, about 60 or 70 yards above and to the west of the suspension bridge which unites Rossie Island and the town of Montrose. Before reaching this point the river flows through Montrose tidal basin, an area which is at high tide covered by sea water, and at low tide left uncovered save where the stream itself flows. From the suspension bridge it pursues its course through the harbour, and thereafter in a comparatively narrow channel, for a distance of nearly a mile till it reaches the sea.

"The appellant produced copy of a bye-law made by the Fishery Board for Scotland, dated 18th December 1888, confirmed by Her Majesty's Secretary for Scotland on 27th February 1889, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette on 1st March 1889, fixing limits on the east coast of Scotland ex adverso of Montrose Bay, within

* The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 6, enacts,—"(1) It shall not be lawful to use the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling within three miles of low-water mark of any part of the coast of Scotland, nor within the waters specified in the schedule hereto annexed, save only between such points on the coast or within such other defined areas as may from time to time be permitted by bye-laws of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and subject to any conditions or regulations made by those bye-laws. . . .

"(2) The Fishery Board may from time to time make, alter, and revoke bye-laws for the purposes of this section, but a bye-law shall not be of any validity until it is confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland.

"(3) Any person who uses any method of fishing in contravention of this enactment, or of any bye-law of the Fishery Board, shall be liable on conviction " to certain penalties.

which limits no person shall use any beam-trawl for taking sea No. 17.
fish.*

"The Sheriff-substitute found that the statute founded on in the complaint, and the bye-law produced, did not apply to beam-trawling in the estuary of the river Southesk where the respondents had used such method of fishing; and found the complaint not proved, and assoilzied the respondents."

June 8, 1897.
Whyte v.
Thomson.

The question of law was,—“Whether, on a sound construction of the said Herring Fishery Acts and the schedules annexed, and the bye-law of the Fishery Board above mentioned, the respondents were guilty of the contravention charged?”

The appellant was heard, but no appearance was made for the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very clear case. The bye-law which is founded on for the prosecution is a bye-law which prohibits beam-trawling within that part of the sea which is within a particular line described in the bye-law. Now, that line is to be ascertained in a particular way. A series of straight lines, each three miles long, are to be drawn from the low-water mark out into the sea, and a line along the seaward end of these lines forms the boundary line within which the bye-law is to apply. This line will thus follow the contour of the low-water mark, and it is for this reason alone that that mark is mentioned in the bye-law, but the bye-law itself applies to all parts of the sea within the line so ascertained. The suggestion that the bye-law should only apply to parts of the sea between the low-water mark and the three mile limit is not only contrary to common sense but also to the grammatical construction of the clause, which merely refers to the low-water mark for the purpose of ascertaining the points from which to measure outwards to the three mile limit. The line of the latter being so ascertained, the prohibition applies to every part of the sea within it.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

Counsel for the appellant moved the Court to remit the case to the Sheriff with their opinion, and referred to the interlocutor in Black v. Bradshaw.¹

The Court refused the motion.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“The Lords having heard counsel for the appellant, and in respect of no appearance for the respondents, answer the question in the case in the affirmative: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern.”

CROWN AGENT, Agent.

* The bye-law provided,—“I. This bye-law shall extend and apply to that part of the sea inside of a line beginning at a point three miles east (magnetic) of Red Head, in Forfarshire, and extending along the coast at a distance of three miles from low-water mark to a point three miles north (magnetic) of Kinnairdhead Lighthouse.

“II. Within the foresaid limits no person, unless in the service or by the orders of the Fishery Board for Scotland, shall at any time, from the date when this bye-law comes into force, use any beam-trawl for taking sea fish.”

¹ Dec. 16, 1875, 3 R. (Just. Cases) 18, 3 Couper, 209.

No. 18.

June 8, 1897.
Burns v.
Williamson.

WILLIAM BURNS, Appellant.—A. S. D. Thomson.

DAVID WILLIAMSON (Burgh Prosecutor, Kirkcaldy), Respondent.—
Sol.-Gen. Dickson—J. B. Young.

Procedure—Citation—Name of Prosecutor—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 10.—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, enacts that in all prosecutions under the principal Act of 1875 “the name of the prosecutor shall be stated in the summons” served on the accused to appear before the magistrate.

A summons cited a person to answer to a complaint “at the instance of the burgh prosecutor,” charging the person summoned with a contravention of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. The name of the prosecutor was not mentioned in the summons, which was in the form provided by Schedule vii. of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, but did not bear to proceed under that Act.

Held that the summons was ineffectual in respect that it did not state the name of the prosecutor.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) reserved on the question whether if the summons had borne to proceed under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, that would have been sufficient to override the express provision of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, sec. 10, requiring the name of the prosecutor to be stated in the summons.

Record—Noting of documents—Observations (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) on the necessity, in summary prosecutions, of noting in the record of the proceedings all documents which are made productions.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 19th March 1897 William Burns, grocer, 42 Dunnikier Road, Kirkcaldy, was charged in the Police Court, Kirkcaldy, on a complaint at the instance of “David Williamson, Burgh Prosecutor,” setting forth that the accused, “on 17th February 1897, within the grocer’s shop occupied by him at 42 Dunnikier Road, in the burgh of Kirkcaldy, did, to the prejudice of Francis Braid, inspector of nuisances for the said burgh, the purchaser thereof, sell to him, at the price of tenpence, one pound weight of butter which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by said purchaser, namely, butter, the article so sold being a material containing fat other than butter fat to an extent not under 85 per cent by weight of the total fat present, contrary to 38 and 39 Victoria, chapter 63, section 6 (the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875), and 42 and 43 Victoria, chapter 30, section 2 (the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879), whereby, under section 6 of the said Act first libelled, the said William Burns is liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, or otherwise to be adjudicated upon under sections 487, 488, 489, and 501 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.”

Before pleading to the complaint Burns objected to the summons to appear which had been served on him, in respect that it did not state the name of the prosecutor as required by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, section 10.*

The summons served on Burns was in the form contained in Schedule vii. of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (according to which the name of the prosecutor does not require to be set forth), and did not anywhere state the name of the prosecutor. It was in the following terms:—

“To William Burns, grocer, Dunnikier Road, Kirkcaldy. You are hereby summoned to appear personally before the magistrate officiating in the Police Court of the burgh of Kirkcaldy, upon the nineteenth day of March 1897, at half-past ten o'clock forenoon, to answer to a complaint at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, charging you with the following, viz.:—That on 17th February 1897, within the grocer's shop occupied by you at 42 Dunnikier Road, in the burgh of Kirkcaldy, you did," &c. (as in the complaint) "whereby, under said section 6 of the said Act first libelled, you are liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, or otherwise to be adjudicated upon under sections 487, 488, 489, and 501 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. This summons served by me on the 10th day of March 1897. David Chrystal, constable."

* The section is quoted in the report of Frew v. Morris, supra, at p. 50, note.

No. 18.

June 8, 1897.
Burns v.
Williamson.

Neither the complaint, which was according to the form of complaint in Schedule vii. of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, nor the summons, bore (either by way of heading or otherwise) to proceed under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, nor did either document make any reference to that Act other than the reference to sections 487, 488, 489, and 501. These sections deal with penalties only.

The Magistrate repelled the objection. Burns then pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined £2, 2s., with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The case stated questions regarding the validity of the conviction on the merits, which it is unnecessary here to detail. The case bore, inter alia, that "the margarine kit, margarine ticket, and margarine label of the appellant and other traders . . . and the report by the analyst, were made productions in the case." These documents were not referred to in the record of the proceedings in the inferior Court.

The following question of law was stated on the point now reported:—"3. Should the appellant's objection have been sustained that the summons served upon him did not state, or sufficiently state, the name of the prosecutor?"

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 432, was referred to at the hearing.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts brought in the Burgh Court of Kirkcaldy. I may state that there is at the end of the complaint a reference to certain sections of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. Now, I have read over those sections and find that they have nothing to do with procedure, but deal solely with the powers of the magistrate as regards the punishment which may be inflicted. In the ordinary case we should have had a note at the head of the complaint informing the accused of the statutes which were to regulate the procedure in the case against him. I say in the ordinary case, but it becomes much more important that there should be such a note when we come to deal with a prosecution for an offence under a statute in which it is expressly provided that the prosecutor shall be named, if the prosecutor intends to avail himself of another statutory form of procedure in which it is not essential that such name be given. In that case I am of opinion that the failure to give the accused due notice of that statute is fatal to the proceedings. If there had been such a reference to the Burgh Police Act of 1892 there would be the further question of how far the form of complaint given in the schedule to that Act would suffice to override the express provisions of the Food and Drugs Acts as to naming the prosecutor. As to that I express no opinion,

No. 18.
June 8, 1897.
Burns v.
Williamson.

but I have grave doubts whether, when an Act prescribes a particular solemnity in procedure for the prosecution of offences constituted by it, this may be disregarded because forms given in a general procedure statute seem to dispense with it. On the facts of this case it is not necessary to decide that question. Nor is it necessary to go into the merits, although at first glance they appear to disclose a very weak case for the prosecution.

There is, however, another point which has come up, and to which I should like to advert, as it is one to which we are constantly referring, and I do hope those responsible in the Courts below will in future pay attention to it. In summary cases it is prescribed by the Summary Procedure Act that where documents are produced in evidence these documents shall be noted on the record of the proceedings. That is a matter of the most elementary justice, in order that, where the case has afterwards to be dealt with either by a Court of review, or it may be by Her Majesty's minister, these documents shall be certified by the record as having formed part of the proceedings before the Court which tried the case. In the present case we learn from the statement of the Magistrate that certain items of documentary evidence were cited in the case, but on turning to the record itself we find that these are not noted, and that in itself would suffice for the overturning of this conviction. It has often been argued before us that such an omission is a mere matter of form, and not of substance, but we have always decided against this argument. It may be said that the proceedings here were not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which prescribe that such a note shall be kept. But I would point out that these statutes are relaxing statutes, and therefore prescribe the minimum of formality which is necessary in summary cases. No procedure in summary trials can legally be less formal than that prescribed by these statutes, because they are statutes for the purpose of dispensing with formalities, and they do prescribe that certain formalities must on this ground be fulfilled, thus indicating that justice requires their continuance. The principle of criminal procedure is written record of the proceedings. Any relaxation of that principle must be based on statute, or customary law established so as to be equivalent to statute. There is no such law dispensing with the documents produced being set forth in the record of the proceedings in summary cases.

On this ground, as well as on account of the omission of the prosecutor's name, I think we must sustain this appeal.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with your Lordships, and would just add, on the first point, that if it is intended to use forms of procedure different from those prescribed in the special statute creating the offence, notice of such intention should be given to the accused in the form of a note at the head of the complaint. In the present case we have no notice of the intention of the prosecutor to avail himself of the forms prescribed by the Burgh Police Act, 1892, the only mention of that statute in the complaint being a reference to certain clauses affecting the penalty to be inflicted.

THE COURT answered the third question in the case in the affirmative, and sustained the appeal.

W. & J. L. OFFICER, W.S.—J. A. STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES BLACK MORISON, Appellant.—Salvesen.
ARTHUR WHITE STUBBS, Respondent.—A. J. Young.

No. 19.

June 8, 1897.
Morison v. Stubbs.

Complaint—Relevancy—Statute—Repeal—Statute Law Revision Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 19).—A complaint libelled a contravention of section 26 of the Excise Licences Act of 1825, "as altered or amended by the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853." The 8th and 9th sections of the Act of 1853 were repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892.

Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it was founded on sections of a statute which had been repealed.

ON 11th March 1897 James Black Morison, grocer, 13 Finnart Street, Greenock, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court, Greenock, on a complaint at the instance of Arthur White Stubbs, officer of Inland Revenue, setting forth that the accused had "contravened the 26th section of the Excise Licences Act, 1825, as altered or amended by the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853," in so far as, being a retailer of spirits within the meaning of the said Acts, he had retailed spirits in his premises in Finnart Street without having a licence for these premises.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

Morison had other premises in Greenock, at No. 29 West Blackhall Street, for which he held a licence, and the question on the merits was whether he had contravened the Acts libelled by receiving orders for excisable liquors in his unlicensed premises which were executed from his licensed premises; but before pleading to the complaint, Morison objected to its relevancy, in respect the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853, had been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892.

The Justices repelled the objection. The accused then pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined two guineas.

He obtained a case. The case set forth facts and a question in law on the merits, and also this question "(1) Was the complaint relevant?"

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint charged a contravention of the 26th section of the Excise Licences Act, 1825, as amended by the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853; but as sections 8 and 9 of the latter Act had been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892, the complaint charged a statutory offence which had been repealed, and was therefore irrelevant.

Argued for the respondent;—Repeal by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892, was not an absolute repeal; where a repealed enactment was referred to in an enactment which was not repealed, the latter kept the former alive for the purpose of the reference. Here section 2 of the Act of 1853, which section was not itself repealed, referred to sections 8 and 9 of the same Act, which sections consequently were to some extent still in force.* In any view, sections 8 and 9

* The respondent founded on the following:—

The Statute Law Revision Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 1, inter alia, provides that "the repeal by this Act of any enactment or schedule shall not affect any enactment in which such enactment or schedule has been applied, incorporated, or referred to."

The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 67), sec. 2, provides that grocers may obtain certificates at the same rates as are chargeable for a certificate for a public-house.

Secs. 8 and 9, which are repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892,

No. 19. merely dealt with the rate of duty ; the substantive enactment founded on in the complaint—section 26 of the Act of 1825—was unrepealed.

June 8, 1897.
Morrison v.
Stubbs.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this is a plain case. The Act here founded upon is the Excise Licences Act, 1825, as altered or amended by sections 8 and 9 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853. These sections are repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892, and therefore the Act as amended, which is founded on, is no longer in existence. We are told that there is something in section 2 of the Act of 1853 which will save sections 8 and 9, because it is said that section 2 refers to sections 8 and 9, and so preserves them in force. I fail to see that sections 8 and 9 are referred to in section 2, and in any case section 2 is not referred to in the complaint. I am of opinion that the first question must be answered in the negative, and the determination of the Justices reversed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. The complaint libels a contravention of a specified section of the Excise Licences Act, 1825, as altered or amended by sections 8 and 9 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853. But sections 8 and 9 of the Act of 1853 have been repealed, and consequently the Excise Licences Act, 1825, as amended by these sections, no longer exists. There can be no contravention of a non-existing statute.

LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and reversed the determination of the Justices.

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

No. 20.

June 8, 1897.
Cockett v.
Beattie.

EDWARD COCKETT, Appellant.—Cullen.

PETER BEATTIE (Inspector of Poor of Barony Parish, Glasgow), Respondent.—Deas.

Public Health—Vaccination—Refusal to allow child to be vaccinated—Proof—Husband and Wife—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), sec. 18.—A father was convicted of a contravention of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 18, by having refused to allow his child to be vaccinated. He appealed. The case stated that the Parish Council having issued an order to their vaccinator to vaccinate the child, notice of the order was sent to the accused, with an intimation that the Act directed the vaccination to take place within a period specified ; that on a day within the period the vaccinator called at the house of the accused ; and that he was then told by the wife of the accused "that she was expecting him, but that her husband, who was not at home, had instructed her on no account to allow the child to be vaccinated."

The Court sustained the appeal, holding that it had not been proved that the accused had refused to allow his child to be vaccinated.

respectively set forth the rate of duty chargeable for licences for public-houses, and make provision for the collection of such duty by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Notwithstanding their repeal, secs. 8 and 9 are printed in "The Statutes : Second Revised Edition," published (1895) by authority, the following note to each of sections 8 and 9 being added in the authorised publication :—

"Ss. 8 and 9 are rep. 55 & 56 Vict. c. 19 (Statute Law Revision Act 1892) ; but the rates of duty are applicable to grocers' licences under a. 2."

On 17th March 1897, Edward Cockett, officer of Inland Revenue, No. 20.
60 New Cambridge Drive, Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, on a complaint at the instance of Peter Beattie, Inspector June 8, 1897. of Poor of Barony Parish, Glasgow, setting forth that the accused had contravened the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 18,* in so far as, after the statutory procedure libelled, he had "refused" to allow his child Constance Elaine Cockett to be vaccinated. Cockett v. Beattie.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined 15s.

He obtained a case.

The case stated that the Sheriff-substitute (Strachan) found it proved (2) that on 26th January 1897 the Parish Council of Barony Parish issued an order to the vaccinator, Dr Hay, directing him to vaccinate Cockett's child; (3) that on the same day a notice of such order was sent to Cockett, "which notice contained a memorandum to the effect, inter alia, that the Act directs the vaccinator to vaccinate every child named in the order at some time, not less than ten nor more than twenty days after the date of the said notice; (4) that Dr Hay having, on 6th February 1897, called at the house of the said Edward Cockett for the purpose of vaccinating the said child, Constance Elaine, he was told by Mrs Cockett, the wife of the said Edward Cockett, that she was expecting him, but that her husband, who was not at home, had instructed her on no account to allow the child to be vaccinated, and at the same time she admitted that the child was in perfect health."

It further appeared from the case that Cockett maintained that there was not legal evidence to warrant a conviction, inter alia, on the ground "that the refusal by the appellant's wife, during his absence, of liberty to vaccinate said child was not the refusal of the appellant."

The question of law stated by the Sheriff-substitute was,—“Whether I was warranted in the circumstances stated in convicting the said Edward Cockett of the said contravention.”

LORD TRAYNER.—It appears that what the appellant is charged with in the complaint before us is a refusal to allow his child to be vaccinated. The only thing in the case which appears to shew that he did refuse is in the fourth finding, in which it is set forth that the public vaccinator called and saw the appellant's wife, and that she stated that she had been instructed by her husband to refuse to allow vaccination. Now, I cannot take the statement of the appellant's wife, made outwith the presence of the appellant, as equivalent to the statement of the appellant himself. I do not

* The Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), sec. 18, enacts that on receipt from the registrar of a list of persons who have failed to transmit a certificate of vaccination in terms of the Act, the parochial board should issue an order to their vaccinator to vaccinate the persons named in the list, "and notice in writing of such order shall be given to such persons, or if children to their father or mother, or the persons having care of them; and in pursuance of such order the vaccinator shall vaccinate the persons named therein, or any of them, at any time not less than ten and not more than twenty days after the date of such notice . . . and if any such person, or the parent or person having the care of any such child shall refuse to allow such operation to be performed, he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment," &c.

No. 20.

June 8, 1897.
Cockett v.
Beattie.

know whether the appellant authorised or instructed his wife to make the statement which she made. I cannot sustain the conviction in the case unless it is proved that the appellant refused to allow his child to be vaccinated, and of that there is no proof. It is said that there may be a practical difficulty in the working of the Vaccination Act if we refuse to regard a statement by a wife as equivalent to a statement made by her husband. I am not greatly impressed by that. The answer of the husband, as the guardian of the child, is the answer which the statute requires, and though, if it were proved that he gave his wife instructions to give a positive refusal, that might be sufficient, yet the mere statement by her of what she says he said is not enough. I decide the case on the ground that it is not proved that Mr Cockett refused to allow his child to be vaccinated.

LORD MONCREIFF.—On the facts proved it is only too probable that the statement made by the appellant's wife as to the instructions given by her husband was true. But what we have to consider is whether there was legal evidence on which the Sheriff was entitled to convict. Now, the section alleged to be contravened is section 18 of the Vaccination Act; and looking to that section it is plain that in the circumstances of this case the person called upon to allow the vaccination of the child was the father. So the authorities seem to have thought, because it was the father to whom a statutory notice was sent. He was therefore the only person whose refusal would infer a contravention of the section. Now, the only evidence before us of his alleged refusal is the evidence of the vaccinator as to orders which the appellant's wife said her husband gave her. She was not, and could not competently be, adduced as a witness. I think that such evidence is not sufficient to warrant conviction to be followed by penal consequences. If the appellant had been asked if it was true that he had ordered his wife to refuse, and either admitted it or declined to answer, or even if notice had been given to him that the vaccinator would call on a certain day and hour, and asking that arrangements should then be made for vaccination, it might have been sufficient. But as the case stands the evidence fails.

I arrive at this conclusion with reluctance, because there is strong probability that the appellant instructed his wife not to permit vaccination; and, as far as we know, the child is still unvaccinated. But I agree with your Lordships that the conviction cannot stand.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely agree that there was not evidence here to warrant a conviction. The only thing I wish to add is, that I have a strong impression that the only evidence we have is not competent evidence at all. For what does it consist of? Solely of a statement of what the wife of the accused said, and I think that a statement of what the wife of the accused said is not competent, more particularly in a case in which she would not be a competent witness. Even if competent, it could never be sufficient to prove as matter of fact that the accused did refuse to have his child vaccinated.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN TAYLOR, Complainer.—Comrie Thomson—Findlay.
HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—
James Ferguson, A.-D.

No. 21.

June 8, 1897.*
Taylor v.
H. M. Advocate.

Fraudulent Bankruptcy—“Intent to defraud”—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 8.—It is unnecessary to set forth intent to defraud in an indictment charging a sequestered bankrupt with a contravention of the 13th section of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, by concealing his property.

Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Concealment of property—Indictment—Relevancy—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13.—An indictment under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, after setting forth that the accused had been sequestered, and that within four months next before the presentation of his petition for sequestration he had concealed his property, proceeded,—“and thus he did not, to the best of his knowledge and belief, fully and truly disclose the state of his affairs, in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and did not deliver up to his said trustee all his property, which he was required by law to deliver up, contrary to the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, section 13, subsection (a) 1, 2, and 3 thereof.”

It was objected that the statement that the bankrupt had concealed his property was not libelled as a substantive charge, but was introduced merely as explaining the mode in which he committed the offences of failing to disclose and failing to deliver his property to the trustee.

Held that this was a good charge of concealment of his property by the bankrupt under subsection 3 of section 13 of the Act.

Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Property and all documents in control of the bankrupt—Relevancy—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13, subsec. 2.—Held that in an indictment under subsections 1, 2, and 3 of section 13 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, it is unnecessary, in order to the relevancy of a charge under subsection 2, to set forth that the property which the bankrupt is alleged to have failed to deliver to the trustee in his sequestration was “in his custody or under his control.”

Question, whether the words “in his custody or under his control” refer only to “books, documents, papers, and writings relating to” the bankrupt's affairs, and not to “his property.”

Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Indictment—Specification—Locus—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13, subsecs. 1, 2, and 3.—A bankrupt was charged under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, with having concealed “in the stable in Charles Street Lane, Edinburgh, and in the dwelling-house at No. 5 Bristo Street, Edinburgh, then both occupied by Robert Forrest, cattle-dealer,” certain specified property, including a large number of articles.

Objection that the locus was indefinite and wanting in specification repelled.

ON 22d February 1897, John Taylor, auctioneer, Montague Street, Edinburgh, was charged at the instance of Her Majesty's Advocate upon an indictment charging him with “having carried on business in Lothian Street, Edinburgh, as an auctioneer and dealer in goods of various kinds, including clothing, furniture, pianos, plated goods and miscellaneous articles, which he was in the habit of purchasing from manufacturers and wholesale agents, and selling by auction and otherwise, and his estates having, on 24th July 1896, been sequestered,

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Low.

No. 21. under 'the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' on his own petition, by the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh, and Robert Greenwood Morton, accountant, Edinburgh, having been elected trustee on his sequestrated estates on 3d August 1896, and the trustee's election having been duly confirmed by act and warrant of the said Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles, on 5th August 1896, he did, on various occasions, between the 1st day of April 1896 and the said 24th day of July 1896, being within four months next before the presentation of his said petition for sequestration, conceal in the stable in Charles Street Lane, Edinburgh, and in the dwelling-house at No. 5 Bristo Street, Edinburgh, then both occupied by Robert Forrest, cattle-dealer, the various goods described in the first column of the schedule annexed to the said indictment, which had been purchased by him from the respective persons or firms named in the second column of said schedule, and which had been received by him from the said persons or firms respectively on or about the respective dates set forth in the third column of said schedule, and a quantity of other goods, consisting of chairs, chests of drawers, over-mantles, rolls of floorcloth and linoleum, carpets, shawls, dress stuffs, underclothing, portmanteaus, plated goods, jewellery, cutlery, and other articles, the quantities of each of which are to the prosecutor unknown, the whole goods above libelled being his property, or part of his stock in trade, and amounting in all to the value of £800 or thereby, and thus he did not, to the best of his knowledge and belief, fully and truly disclose the state of his affairs, in terms of 'The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' and did not deliver up to his said trustee all his property, which he was required by law to deliver up, contrary to 'The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880,' section 13, subsection (a) 1, 2, and 3 thereof."*

June 8, 1897.
Taylor v.
H. M. Advocate.

The Sheriff (Rutherford) repelled objections to relevancy.

The accused then pleaded not guilty. After a trial the jury returned the following verdict as recorded:—"The jury unanimously found the panel guilty as libelled."

* The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13, enacts:—"The debtor in a process of sequestration or cessio shall be deemed guilty of a crime and offence, and on conviction before the Court of Justiciary, or before the Sheriff and a jury, shall be liable to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or by the Sheriff without a jury, for any time not exceeding sixty days, with or without hard labour

"(a) In each of the cases following, unless he proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had no intent to defraud; that is to say—

"1. If he does not, to the best of his knowledge and belief, fully and truly disclose the state of his affairs in terms of The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), or the Cessio Acts, as the case may be.

"2. If he does not deliver up to the trustee all his property, and all books, documents, papers, and writings relating to his property or affairs which are in his custody or under his control, and which he is required by law to deliver up, or if he does not deal with and dispose of the same according to the directions of the trustee.

"3. If, after the presentation of the petition for sequestration or cessio, or within four months next before such presentation, he conceals any part of his property, or conceals, destroys, or mutilates, or is privy to the concealment, destruction, or mutilation of any book, document, paper, or writing relating to his property or affairs."

The accused was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment.

No. 21.

Taylor brought a bill of suspension, in which he pleaded;—1. The indictment against the complainer is irrelevant, in respect—(1) There is no allegation contained therein of any intention to defraud on the part of the accused. (2) The complainer was charged with offences under subsections 1 and 2, and was found guilty of concealment under subsection 3. (3) There is no allegation that the said property was in his custody or under his control. (4) That the locus is indefinite and wanting in specification. June 8, 1897.
Taylor v.
H. M. Advocate.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) Intent to defraud was of the essence of the crime charged, and the prosecutor should have set it forth.¹ (2) The accused had been charged only with a contravention of the 1st and 2d subsections of the 13th section of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, and yet he had been convicted of concealment of his property under the 3d subsection. (3) The charge under subsection 2 was irrelevant. There was no averment that the property not delivered up was under the bankrupt's control or in his custody. This was essential, otherwise a man might be tried on a charge of failing to deliver up property over which he had no control. (4) The locus was wanting in specification. The accused was entitled to know whether he was charged with concealing the property in the stable or in the dwelling-house. He could not conceal the same goods in the two places.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) *Small v. Hart*¹ was no longer of authority. Since the passing of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887,² the words "with intent to defraud" were to be implied.³ (2) The indictment distinctly charged the accused with concealment, and then by the words "and thus" imported that concealment as the modus of the two further contraventions. (3) It was unnecessary to libel that the property in question was "in the control" of the accused. It must have been in his control if he concealed it. Further, the words in subsection 2, "which are in his custody or control," applied only to books and documents, and not to property. (4) The objection to the locus as being wanting in specification came too late, as it was not stated at the first diet.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first objection in this case is that there is no allegation of any intent to defraud on the part of the accused. Now, I should have no doubt or difficulty in holding that under the section in question it is not necessary to aver an intent to defraud, it not being necessary to prove any such intent, because the section says that if the accused does certain things he shall be held guilty of an offence unless he proves that he had no intent to defraud. But even if I were wrong on that point, all doubt is removed by section 8 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, whereby it is provided that words like falsely and fraudulently shall be implied in every case where under the former practice their insertion would have been necessary.

The second objection is that while the accused was found guilty of concealment under subsection 3, the form of the indictment excludes conceal-

¹ Small v. Hart, March 12, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 1 White, 80.

² Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 8.

³ Howman v. Mackie, Feb. 2, 1891, 18 R. (Just. Cases) 30, 2 White, 617.

No. 21.
June 8, 1897.
Taylor v.
H. M. Advocate.

ment as a substantive accusation, and alleges it only as a narrative from which the other two charges may be inferred, i.e., failing to disclose the state of his affairs, and not delivering up his property. I think this objection also is bad, and that the accused is charged quite distinctly with concealment of his property. I should, however, remark that I think prosecutors would do well in cases of this kind where concealment is charged, not to go into the offences covered by the first two subsections, as, if a man is found guilty of concealing his property, it is clear that he must have failed to disclose the state of his affairs, and not delivered up his property to the trustee.

Again, it is said that it is not averred that the property concealed was in the custody or under the control of the bankrupt. On this I have two observations to make. First, I think that such an averment is implied in a charge of concealment of property, and further, that I am satisfied that the words "in his custody or under his control" in subsection 2 of section 13 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, refer to the latter part of the clause, and not to the former,—that is, they refer to documents or papers, and not to property. A man has presumably the control of his own property, but there may be many papers relating to his property or affairs which are not under his own control, and the Act therefore limits the call to those which are in his custody or under his control.

The fourth objection is that the locus is indefinite and wanting in specification. Now, the averment is one of concealment of property in two places, and I do not think it is essential that the particular things concealed in each place should be specified. The objection is not that there is no statement of locus, or that the statement of locus is misleading, but merely to want of specification. If the accused suffered any prejudice from this want, objection should have been taken at the first diet. It is no doubt competent in this Court to set aside a conviction on the ground of an objection to the statement of the locus, but the objection must be of a substantial character. I am of opinion that this objection, relating only to sufficiency of specification, not having been taken in the Court below, cannot now be sustained.

LORD ADAM.—The first objection to the conviction here is that there was no averment of intent to defraud in the indictment, and it is supported on the authority of the case of Small v. Hart.¹ If matters had remained in the same condition as they were when that case was decided, I should have had some difficulty in refusing to give effect to the argument. But in the meanwhile the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, was passed, and accordingly the case of *Howman v. Mackie*² was decided, in which Lord M'Laren, who was one of the Judges who were in the majority in the case of Small,¹ points out that the arguments formerly of avail were no longer applicable, because under section 8 of the Act the missing averment was to be inferred from the statement of facts. I think, therefore, that we must follow the case of *Howman*² and repel this objection.

¹ 13 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 1 White, 80.

² 18 R. (Just. Cases) 30, 2 White, 617.

The next objection urges that whereas the conviction is of concealment of property there is no relevant charge of that crime. I think that is not so; and that it is distinctly charged. Mr Thomson urged that the concluding clause of the indictment, beginning "and thus," excluded the charge contained in the prior part, but that is too stringent a view to take of these words.

No. 21.

June 8, 1897.
Taylor v.
H. M. Advocate.

With regard to the objection to the statement of the locus, I agree that when this indictment sets forth in a cumulative manner the articles that were alleged to have been concealed in these two places, it was not necessary to specify in which place each article was concealed.

The remaining objection is that it is not averred that the property in question was "in the custody or under the control" of the bankrupt. I do not think it was necessary to use these words where from the whole facts stated it appeared as a necessary inference that the property was under his control. But I am also disposed to agree with your Lordship that these words in subsection 2 refer to the documents and papers which the bankrupt is called upon to deliver up, and not to his property, but I reserve my opinion on that point.

LORD LOW.—Upon the first point, as to whether it was necessary in the indictment to allege that the concealment was with intent to defraud, I agree with Lord Adam that it is sufficient to say that these words are necessarily implied under the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887, and that it is unnecessary to express any opinion on the case of Small v. Hart,¹ which occurred prior to the passing of that Act.

In regard to the objection to the relevancy of the indictment, that there is no good charge of a contravention of all the three subsections of section 13 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, I agree entirely with what has been said.

It is distinctly and specifically averred that the bankrupt concealed his goods, and by doing so committed an infringement of the first, second, and third subsections of section 13. It is a good indictment, although I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk that it might have been simpler and sufficient if the prosecutor had libelled an infringement only of the 3d subsection. It is clear that there may be cases of offences under the first two subsections without there being any offence under the third, because a bankrupt might fail to disclose the state of his affairs and to deliver up his property to the trustee without concealing his property—the concealment referred to in the third subsection obviously meaning a positive act—the actual hiding away of property. But then, on the other hand, it follows that if a man has been guilty of concealing his property he must also have failed to disclose the state of his affairs and to deliver up his property to his trustee.

With regard to the question of locus, I have nothing to add. With regard to the objection that it should have been stated that the goods in question were under the bankrupt's control or in his custody, I agree that even assuming that it is necessary they should be under his control it is not

¹ 13 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 1 White, 80.

No. 21.

June 5, 1897.
Taylor v.
H. M. Advocate.

necessary to use the precise words if on the narrative of the indictment it is clear that the goods were under his control; and here it is clear, because it is narrated how he got the goods and concealed them in certain places. I should prefer not to express any opinion as to whether the words "in his custody or under his control," as used in subsection 2 of section 13, apply to "property" or not. The bankrupt may have property which is not in his custody or under his control, and I do not see how it would be an offence not to deliver such property to the trustee. The question, however, does not arise sharply, and it is safer not to express an opinion upon it. On the whole matter, I agree that the objections to this conviction have all failed.

THE COURT refused the bill.

PATRICK & JAMES, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—AGENTS.

No. 22.

June 8, 1897.*
Sime v.
Linton.

DAVID SIME, Complainer.—Cook.

GEORGE LINTON, Respondent.—Baxter—Boyd.

Suspension—Process—Irregularity in procedure—Visit by Magistrate to locus—Remit to Sheriff.—A person was charged in the Police Court with having wilfully and maliciously scratched and defaced a door of a dwelling-house in a particular street. After evidence had been led and counsel for the parties heard, the magistrate adjourned the diet. The accused having been subsequently convicted brought a bill of suspension, averring that, between the adjournment and the conviction, the magistrate had made an independent examination of the door in question. The Court having remitted to the Sheriff to inquire into the facts, the Sheriff reported that the magistrate had at the close of the trial made up his mind to convict, but had not determined upon the sentence, and that the alleged examination by him of the door was accidental and casual.

Held that there was no sufficient irregularity to justify a suspension of the conviction.

Suspension—Sentence—Oppression.—A person having been convicted in the Police Court of having wilfully and maliciously scratched and defaced a door of a dwelling-house in a street, was sentenced by the magistrate to pay a fine of £10, with an alternative of sixty days' imprisonment.

In a suspension the Court refused to set aside the sentence as oppressive.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Low.

ON 16th October 1896 David Sime, dairyman, Haymarket Terrace, Edinburgh, was charged in the Police Court, Edinburgh, at the instance of the Police Court Prosecutor, upon a complaint which set forth that he had wilfully and maliciously scratched and defaced doors in dwelling-houses in nine streets in the city, the ninth charge relating to the door of the dwelling-house, No. 14 Manor Place, occupied by James Boyd Fleming.

On 27th October the Magistrate (Bailie Gulland) found the charge last libelled proved, and sentenced the accused to a fine of £10, with the alternative of sixty days' imprisonment.

Sime brought a bill of suspension, in which, after averments of irregularities in the procedure of the trial which are not now reported, he averred as follows:—(Stat. 5) "Further, between the close of the trial and Tuesday, 27th October, upon which date the panel was convicted by the sentence now brought under suspension, the said presiding Magistrate paid a visit to some or all of the doors referred to in the charge, and in particular to the door of the house No. 14 Manor Place, referred to in the last charge, for the purpose of satisfying himself, in view of the conflicting evidence, by an examination of the door, as to the number, position, and character of the marks in question. This he did outwith the presence of the accused, and without the sanction of anyone representing him. Influenced by what he then saw, he, upon 27th October 1896, pronounced the sentence now brought under suspension.”

No. 22.
June 8, 1897.
Sime v. Linton.

He pleaded ;—The proceedings of the Magistrate condescended on being incompetent, irregular, illegal, and oppressive, the complainer is entitled to suspension of the conviction and sentence libelled.

On 27th January 1897 the High Court remitted to the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles to inquire into the facts and to report, with power to the Sheriff to take evidence thereanent.

The report of the Sheriff (Rutherford) was as follows :—“ I have to report, as the result of the inquiry, that on Friday, the 23d of October 1896, the case Linton v. Sime was tried in the Edinburgh City Police Court before Bailie Gulland.

“ After witnesses had been examined upon both sides, and after hearing the prosecutor and counsel for the accused (Sime), the Magistrate held a short consultation with Mr Weston, the clerk of the Police Court, to whom he stated that he had made up his mind, in respect of the evidence adduced, to convict Sime upon the last (ninth) charge in the complaint, and that he proposed to sentence him to imprisonment without giving him the option of a fine. To this Mr Weston demurred, on the ground that it was unusual to sentence persons who had not been previously convicted to imprisonment without the option of a fine, and he suggested that the Bailie should take time to consider the sentence to be pronounced. This conversation does not appear to have been overheard by anyone present, and there can be no doubt that it was carried on in an undertone.

“ Bailie Gulland then announced to the parties that he would continue the diet until Monday, the 26th of October, a date which was, however, altered to the 27th in order to suit the convenience of Sime's counsel. As this was the last case upon the charge sheet, most of those who were present immediately afterwards left the Court. . . .

“ On the afternoon of the same day Bailie Gulland had occasion to make a call in Torphichen Street, and after transacting his business there he walked along Maitland Street to the corner of Manor Place looking for a tram-car. As he did not see a car when he got to the corner of Manor Place, he walked up to Nos. 14 and 22 and took a cursory glance at the doors of these houses, being two of the doors mentioned in the complaint Linton v. Sime. He did not, however, make any minute examination of these doors or of the marks upon them, and in two or three minutes returned to the corner of the street, where he caught a car.

“ On the 27th of October 1896 the conviction and sentence was pronounced which is now under review of your Lordships.”

Argued for the complainer ;—In making an independent investigation into the marks upon the door in question, the Magistrate had committed a gross irregularity. He was bound, like a juryman, to decide the case upon the evidence given upon oath at the trial.¹ The ¹ Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal and Firebrick Co., Limited, March 2, 1888, 15 R. 494; Hattie v. Leitch, July 3, 1889, 16 R. 1128.

No. 22. delay in pronouncing sentence shewed that he had not made up his mind prior to the independent visit.

June 8, 1897.
Sime v.
Linton.

Argued for the respondent ;—The present case was entirely different from those relied on by the complainer. The Sheriff had reported that the visit was entirely accidental and casual, and that the delay in pronouncing sentence was due to the Magistrate not having made up his mind what the sentence was to be.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is most essential that the procedure in all criminal cases should be conducted with regularity, and, indeed, punctilious regularity, and if any irregularity is disclosed in the conduct of such proceedings it must necessarily have the strongest effect against any conviction which may have been pronounced in such a case. But still all such questions are necessarily to some extent questions of degree. There are cases in the books in which it was perfectly clear that a magistrate had had his mind influenced, or had placed himself in circumstances in which his mind might be influenced, by evidence extraneous to the evidence legally before him in the case. In such cases it is the duty of this Court, acting as a Court of review or as the Supreme Court of justice with the power of setting aside convictions improperly pronounced, to set aside the conviction pronounced. If I were of opinion that the circumstances of this case amounted to what I have just indicated, I should certainly be for quashing this conviction, and it was upon the ground that such a matter, when distinctly averred, must be inquired into and dealt with as a matter of fact before its legal effect could be considered, that an inquiry was ordered by this Court. Now, we must take the report we have received from the Sheriff, whom we appointed to inquire, as conclusive upon the matters of fact.

The point taken by the suspender is, that the Magistrate, after the case was closed, went and looked at the doors which the accused is said to have injured. That visit of Bailie Gulland to these doors in Manor Place, according to the Sheriff's report, was of the most accidental and casual description. I do not think that it differs in any practical way from what would have happened if Bailie Gulland had been making a call in Manor Place that afternoon, and had when passing, in a moment of curiosity, gone up the steps and taken a look at the door he had heard so much about. He was, in point of fact, at the corner of Manor Place waiting for a tram-car, and not seeing a car coming he went up Manor Place and looked at the two doors. The Sheriff does not report that that had any influence on the Bailie's mind. On the contrary, the report of the Sheriff shews that that was not so. The Sheriff reports that it was proved as a fact before him that the Bailie had already made up his mind that there must be a conviction, and that the only question he thought it necessary to take time to consider was one raised after consultation with the Clerk of Court as to whether he should pronounce a sentence of imprisonment without the option of a fine. The effect of the Bailie's subsequent deliberation was that he pronounced what we must hold as the very much lighter sentence, particularly to a man in the suspender's position, because necessarily it would have been a much more serious matter for the accused, both as regards his business and his reputation, that he should be treated before the Police Court as a man so offending that, although the offence was one for which the option of a fine was competent, his case was so bad that he must be sentenced to imprisonment without giving him that option. In the event here he got that option, and so got what was in reality the lighter sentence as the result of the Bailie's deliberation on the question. No. 22.

June 8, 1897.
Sime v. Linton.

It was further said that the sentence pronounced was oppressive because it was the highest sentence of fine and alternative imprisonment that could have been pronounced. No doubt the sentence was severe, but that is a matter into which we cannot enter. The accused was not a common labourer. He was a dairyman in Haymarket Terrace, carrying on a business of his own, and the Magistrate may have thought that an offence of the character charged committed by a man in that position ought to be severely dealt with, both as a proper punishment and as a deterrent to others. On the whole case I am of opinion that no sufficient grounds have been presented to us to justify our quashing this conviction, and that it therefore must be sustained.

LORD ADAM and LORD LOW concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill.

DAVID MURRAY, Solicitor—THOMAS HUNTER, W.S.—Agents.

CHARLES DUNSMORE, Complainer.—Steele. No. 23.
JOHN MORTON THRESHIE (Procurator-Fiscal of Justice of Peace Court, Glasgow), Respondent.—Clyde—Horne. June 8, 1897.*
Dunsmore v. Threshie.

Citation—Error in service copy of complaint—Timeous Objection.—On 8th October 1896 a person was charged on a summary complaint setting forth that he had committed an offence on 23d September 1896. The copy of the complaint which had been served on the accused set forth that the offence had been committed on 23d October 1896. After he had pleaded not guilty, and part of the evidence for the prosecution had been led, the accused objected to the competency of the proceedings, in respect of the error in the service copy. The accused was convicted. He brought a suspension.

The Court refused the suspension, holding that after the accused had pleaded to the charge, and the leading of the evidence had been commenced, it was too late to object to the service copy of the complaint.

Procedure—Adjournment.—On 8th October, after part of the evidence for the prosecution on a summary complaint had been led, the presiding Justices adjourned the diet till 12th October in order to consider an objection by the accused to the competency of the proceedings. At the adjourned diet the accused was convicted. He brought a suspension, pleading that it was incompetent for the Justices to adjourn the diet. Suspension refused.

ON 8th October 1896 Charles Dunsmore junior, spirit-merchant, Graham Street, Airdrie, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint setting forth that he had committed an assault on 23d September 1896. HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Moncreiff.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

Dunsmore pleaded not guilty. After part of the evidence for the prosecution had been led Dunsmore objected to the validity of the proceedings, on the ground that (as was the fact) in the service copy

No. 23. of the complaint, the date of the assault charged was set forth as "23d October 1896" instead of 23d September 1896. The Justices adjourned the diet to 12th October in order to consider the objection. On 12th October further evidence was led, and thereafter the Justices found Dunsmore guilty, and fined him three guineas.

June 8, 1897.
Dunsmore v.
Threshie.

Dunsmore brought a suspension, pleading,—The sentence complained of should be suspended, as craved, in respect that (a) the pretended copy of said complaint served upon the complainer was not a copy thereof, but differed therefrom in material particulars; (b) that the Justices failed to dispose of said objection at once, but adjourned the diet, to the complainer's hurt and prejudice.

The facts above narrated were admitted by the parties at the hearing.

The authorities given below were cited for Dunsmore.¹

The respondent, the Procurator-fiscal, was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The objection to the procedure here is that while there was a copy of the complaint served upon the accused, there was a discrepancy between the copy and the principal complaint. That discrepancy arose from the fact that a clerk had, per incuriam, entered the date of the alleged offence in the copy as October 23d instead of September 23d, an error which could not prejudice the accused in any respect. Now, it is said that this clerical error being discovered by the accused after the trial had been begun without objection, he is entitled to an acquittal, for it comes to this, that if the objection is to be held good after the trial has commenced, he must be acquitted finally, having tholed an assize. There is nothing more certain than this, that if such an objection were taken in the High Court or in the Sheriff Court after the jury has been sworn, it would not be listened to, and I see no ground for holding that it would be more competent in a summary Court after evidence had been led. There are only two views on which such an objection can be looked at—either the accused never noticed the discrepancy, and so could have suffered no damage from it, not having been misled, or if he did discover it, he had purposely concealed it in order to secure an acquittal by stating it after the trial had commenced. Taking either view, it would be entirely contrary to public justice to hold that a suspension should be granted because, through the fault of a clerk, there was an accidental discrepancy between the complaint and the service copy. It is laid down by Hume that such an objection must be pleaded before trial. He says (ii. 249)—“Now, with regard to all those matters which must be set forth in gremio of the libel, such as the instance, the panel's name, the denomination of the crime, the several articles of the charge, the particular things stolen, the date and tenour of the forged writing, and the like, it seems to be sufficiently plain that the panel must not let pass the opportunity which is given him, eo intuitu, to object in limine of the process when the libel is read to him at the bar. If on this occasion, when called upon by the Court to listen and to plead to the charge, he takes no notice of any variation of his copy of the libel from the record, he virtually acknowledges it as an accurate, at least a sufficient copy, and such a one on which he has no objection to be tried." I think these short sentences very clearly express the justice of the matter. If the accused discovers the error in time, he can state it, and obtain a remedy for any prejudice which he has suffered by delay being granted and the correct procedure followed. I am clearly of opinion that such an objection must be stated as a preliminary objection to the trial proceeding, and cannot be brought forward after the prosecutor and the accused have joined issue by evidence being led.

¹ On the first question—Stewart v. Lang, Nov. 22, 1894, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 9, 1 Adam, 493; Cook v. Vaughan, 1838, 7 L. J. Ex. 219; Spice v. Bacon, 1877, L. R., 2 Ex. Div. 463. On the second question—Laird v. Anderson, Nov. 2, 1895, 23 R. (Just. Cases) 14, 2 Adam, 18.

No. 23.
June 8, 1897.
Dunsmore v.
Threshie.

In this case there is no record of the objection having been taken at all. But it appears that on such a matter being mooted during the trial, the Justices adjourned the trial in order to have time for consideration. I think they acted quite properly in doing so. It is absurd to say that they had no power to adjourn—to say that a party may raise a new plea in law in the middle of a case, and that the Court may not adjourn to consider it. I am certain that Lord Trayner meant nothing of that kind in the passage quoted from his opinion in Laird v. Anderson.¹ That was a case where an Act required a citation on six days' induciae, and a citation of only three was given, and Lord Trayner held that that defect could not be cured by an adjournment of the Court for three days. Nothing that I have said at all militates against the soundness of his Lordship's judgment, to which, I think, I gave my concurrence at the time.

I was rather staggered at the hearing of the statement, which I find to be correct, that section 33 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887,* is not made applicable to summary procedure. But I now see the reason is that section 33 of the Act of 1887 was not intended to make any new law as to objection to the citation. It was only intended that on a new procedure being instituted by which every case, both in the Supreme and in the Sheriff Court, should come before the Sheriff at the first diet, it should not be competent to state an objection to the citation for the first time at the second diet, and to make it imperative that it should be stated before the Sheriff at the first diet. It is therefore quite proper that section 33 should not be made applicable to summary procedure, because such cases stand in the same position as all criminal cases did before the passing of the Act, and that was, as I hold, that an objection such as is stated in this case must be made before the charge goes to proof.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with your Lordship on both points. The first point is of most importance. The established practice in the High

¹ 23 R. (Just. Cases) 14.

* 50 and 51 Vict. c. 35, sec. 33.—“No objection by a person accused to the validity of the citation against him on the ground of any discrepancy between the record copy of the indictment and the copy served on him, or on account of any error or deficiency in such service copy or in the notice of citation, shall be competent unless the same be stated to the Sheriff at the first diet before the accused person is called upon to plead, and no such discrepancy, error, or deficiency shall entitle such accused person to object to plead to such indictment unless the Sheriff shall be satisfied that the same tended substantially to mislead and prejudice such accused person.”

No. 23. Court of Justiciary is that all objections to citation, and in particular to the copy of the libel served on the accused, must be stated before the case goes to trial on the merits. The reasons for this are clearly stated by Hume (ii. 249-250). The same rule is recognised and enacted in regard to procedure by double diets in High Court cases by the Act of 1887. By the 33d section of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, it is provided that no objection by a person accused to the validity of the citation against him on the ground of any discrepancy between the record copy of the indictment and the copy served upon him shall be competent unless the same be stated to the Sheriff at the first diet before the accused is called upon to plead, and no such discrepancy shall entitle the accused person to object to plead to the indictment, unless the Sheriff shall be satisfied that the same tended substantially to mislead or prejudice him. The rule in the Police Courts is the same. I have no reason to think that there is any difference in summary cases in the Sheriff Court. In such cases it is not even necessary that there should be citation and service of a copy of the complaint. Though when the Sheriff orders citation a copy must be served, in other cases the accused is apprehended and tried without receiving a copy of the complaint. I do not wish to say anything to encourage the view that when a copy is served it should not be a correct one, but any objection to it must be stated in limine.

Apart from this, we cannot grant relief on account of a technical error, unless we are satisfied that substantial prejudice has been caused to the accused. In this case I do not see any possibility that the accused could have suffered prejudice by the discrepancy. So far from that, it appears that he did not even discover it until the trial was well advanced. On those grounds I am of opinion that the bill of suspension should be refused.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur, and agree with the observations which your Lordships have made. The only substantial objection is the first, that in the service copy of the complaint the date of the offence was stated by a clerical error as 23d October instead of 23d September. Now, I have heard no authority for the proposition that a conviction should be set aside as bad because of a discrepancy between the principal and service copies of the complaint, in a case where it is not said that the discrepancy did mislead the accused or cause him any injustice. Indeed, it seems to me that the case of *Armstrong v. Stevenson*¹ is an authority to the contrary, because there was in that case an omission in the service copy; it was not an exact copy of the complaint; yet the Court held that as the accused had answered the citation, and had suffered no prejudice, the omission was no reason for setting aside the conviction. Here it is clear that the accused suffered no prejudice, as he did not even notice the discrepancy until the trial had begun.

Further, by section 5 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, it is made competent at any stage of the proceedings to amend the principal copy of the complaint in any way not involving a variation in the character of the offence. And I cannot comprehend how a mistake which would not have been fatal had it appeared in the principal, can be fatal when it appears in the copy. But in any view I agree with your Lordships that this objection came too late, and that the conviction must be sustained.

¹ Dec. 12, 1892, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 21, 3 White, 373.

No. 23.

June 8, 1897.
Dunsmore v.
Threspie.

THE COURT refused the bill.

T. C. SMITH, S.S.C.—J. & A. HASTIE, Solicitors—Agents.

ALEXANDER EMSLIE, Appellant.—T. B. Morison.

No. 24.

WILLIAM BROMFIELD PATERSON, Respondent.—Jameson—Dewar.

June 12, 1897.

Statutory Offence—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 3—Unregistered Person—“American Dentistry”—“Dental Office.”—The Dentists Act, 1878, sec. 3, enacts that after 1st August 1879 “a person shall not be entitled to take or use the name or title of ‘dentist,’ either alone or in combination with any other word or words, or of ‘dental practitioner,’ or any other name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is a person specially qualified to practise dentistry, unless he is registered under this Act,” and renders the person so using any such name, title, &c. liable to a penalty on summary conviction.

Emslie v.
Paterson.

A. Emslie, a person who was not registered under the Act, placed on his door a brass plate with the inscription “American Dentistry. A. Emslie”; also another plate, with the inscription “Dental Office.”

Held (quashing a conviction) that in putting the plates on his door Emslie had not committed an offence under the Act, in respect that the inscriptions did not imply that he was registered under the Act, or that he was a person specially qualified to practise dentistry.

Complaint—Instance—Private Prosecutor—Statutory title to prosecute.—Where a private person has by public statute a title to prosecute summary complaints for statutory offences it is not necessary to set forth in the complaint the statute giving the person his title to prosecute.

ON 4th March 1897 Alexander Emslie was charged in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh on a complaint at the instance of “William Bromfield Paterson, of No. 64 Brook Street, London, F.R.C.S.E. and L.D.S., Honorary Secretary of the British Dental Association, with concurrence of Robert Laidlaw Stuart, Procurator-fiscal of Court, for the public interest,” which complaint set forth “that Alexander Emslie, residing or carrying on business at No. 1 Rankeillor Street, Edinburgh, has contravened the 3d section of ‘The Dentists Act, 1878,’* in so far as not being a person registered under

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Moncreiff.

* The Dentists Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 33), proceeds on the preamble,—“Whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the registration of persons specially qualified to practise as dentists in the United Kingdom, and that the law relating to persons practising as dentists be otherwise amended.”

Sec. 3 enacts,—“From and after the first day of August 1879 a person shall not be entitled to take or use the name or title of ‘dentist,’ either alone or in combination with any other word or words, or of ‘dental practitioner,’ or any other name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is a person specially qualified to practise dentistry, unless he is registered under this Act.

“Any person who, after the first day of August 1879, not being registered under this Act, takes or uses any such name, and the addition or description as aforesaid, shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine

No. 24.

June 12, 1897.
Emslie v.
Paterson.

the said Act, and not being a legally qualified medical practitioner, he has taken or used a name, title, addition, or description implying that he is a person specially qualified to practise dentistry, by one or more or all of the following methods, viz. :—(First) by displaying, or causing to be displayed, since the month of October 1896, a signboard and brass plate on the outside of the premises occupied by him at No. 1 Rankeillor Street aforesaid, with the words ‘American Dentistry. A. Emslie’ thereon; (second) by having, during said period, a brass plate affixed to the door of said premises with the words ‘Dental Office’ thereon; (third) by using, on or about the 5th day of November last, a business card or advertisement having the words ‘American Dentistry. Persons desirous of having dental work done will do well to call at our office, and save at least 50 per cent. A. Emslie, Manager,’ printed thereon; and (fourth) by exhibiting, or causing to be exhibited, on or about the said date, a diploma, purporting to be granted by ‘The Dental Society of New York, authorised by the State Legislature, and to confer on Alexander Emslie the degree of “Master in Dental Surgery,” whereby the said Alexander Emslie is liable,” &c.

The accused objected (1) to the competency of the complaint in respect that the prosecutor had not set forth a sufficient title to prosecute, and also (2) to the relevancy of all the charges in the complaint.

The Sheriff-substitute (Orphoot) repelled the objection to title, sustained the objection to the relevancy of the third and fourth charges, and quoad ultra repelled the objections to the relevancy.

The ground on which the Sheriff-substitute proceeded in sustaining the objection to the relevancy of the third and fourth charges was that the locus of these charges was not sufficiently specified.

The accused then pleaded not guilty, but was convicted of the contravention charged by the methods first and second specified, and was fined three guineas.

He obtained a case. In the case the facts averred under the first and second charges were set forth as proved.

The following questions of law were, inter alia, stated :—“(1) Whether the respondent has set forth a sufficient title to prosecute? (2) Whether the complaint is relevant?”

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The complaint was bad in respect that it did not set forth the complainer’s title to prosecute. Under the Dentists Act, 1878, sec. 4, no private person was entitled to prosecute unless with the consent of the General Medical Council. The Medical Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 26, repealed that part of the Dentists Act, and gave private persons a title to prosecute; but the Medical Act was not set forth in the complaint, and consequently the instance was bad. [Jameson, for the respondent.—The point is settled by the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 4.] Private persons were prima facie not entitled to prosecute, and consequently their title, if they had one, ought to be set forth in the complaint. The concurrence of the procurator-fiscal did not remedy the instance, if it was per not exceeding £20; provided that nothing in this section shall apply to legally qualified medical practitioners.”

Sec. 5 enacts that after 1st August 1879 “a person shall not be entitled to recover any fee or charge, in any Court, for the performance of any dental operation, or for any dental attendance or advice, unless he is registered under this Act or is a legally qualified medical practitioner.”

as null. (2) The complaint, in so far as concerned the first and second charges, which alone were now in question, was irrelevant. The Dentists Act, 1878, did not prohibit unregistered persons from practising dentistry; it only prohibited them from using a title implying that they were registered or specially qualified, and from charging fees. Cases under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, such as Bremridge v. Hume,¹ were thus in marked contrast, for the purpose of that Act was to prohibit the retail sale of poisons by unqualified persons absolutely. Similarly, in the Veterinary Surgeons Act, 1881, which was under consideration in The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons v. Robinson,² the statutory prohibition was against an unregistered person using a title implying that he was "a practitioner of veterinary surgery," or that he was specially qualified; here the corresponding statutory words were that he was "registered under this Act," or that he was specially qualified. In short, the purpose of the Dentists Act, as shewn by its preamble, was to make provision for the registration of persons specially qualified in dentistry, not to prohibit the practice of dentistry by other persons. Now, the brass plates here with the inscriptions "American Dentistry. A. Emslie," and "Dental Office," did not in the slightest degree suggest registration under the Dental Act, therefore that branch of the Act was out of the case. Then did these inscriptions imply special qualifications to practise dentistry? They did not. At the utmost they merely intimated that the house was a place where dental operations were carried on. They said nothing about the personal qualifications of "A. Emslie,"—not even that he was a dental practitioner.

Argued for the respondent;—The first question was as to the title. [LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—You need not go into that.] Then as to the relevancy of the complaint. The Dentists Act, 1878, was one of those Acts which had been passed for the purpose of enabling the public to distinguish between qualified and unqualified practitioners in particular professions or trades, and the principles of construction applied in *Bremridge v. Hume*¹ and the case of the *Veterinary College*² to such Acts ought to be applied here. The question was whether the appellant had by his acting held himself out as qualified to practise dentistry. The descriptions here libelled were special descriptions of persons professing to practise dentistry. It was true that "Dental Office," and perhaps also "American Dentistry," were descriptions applicable to places rather than to persons; but the *Veterinary College*² case was a complete answer to the argument founded by the appellant on that circumstance, for there the words used by the accused were "Veterinary Forge," and that description was held to be struck at by the Veterinary Surgeons Act, 1881, the language of which was, mutatis mutandis, practically identical with the present Act. "American" dentistry certainly implied special qualifications—the qualifications of an American dentist.

At advising,—

LORD MONCREIFF.—The Sheriff-substitute held that the complaint was irrelevant as regards the third and fourth methods therein described, but sustained the relevancy quoad ultra, and convicted the appellant of the con-

No. 24.

June 12, 1897.
Emslie v.
Paterson.

¹ Bremridge v. Hume, Nov. 2, 1895, 23 R. (Just. Cases), 9, 2 Adam, 24.

² The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons v. Robinson, L. R. [1892], 1 Q. B. 557.

No. 24.

June 12, 1897.
Emslie v.
Paterson.

travention charged by the methods first and second specified. In my opinion the complaint is also irrelevant in regard to the first and second methods as well as the third and fourth.

The charge is based on the 3d section of the Dentists Act of 1878. The Act does not prohibit the practice of dentistry or recovery of fees in respect thereof if the patient will pay, but it imposes penalties upon any person who, without being registered under the Act assumes the title of dentist or any other title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under the Act, or that he is specially qualified to practise dentistry.

The question in this case is whether the method first and second mentioned in the complaint are, in the sense of the 3d section, a description implying that the appellant is a person specially qualified to practise dentistry.

I agree that the description contemplated by the statute is a description personal to the individual ejusdem generis with the preceding words, and indicating his special qualifications for the work by training and practice. The terms of the statute are not satisfied by notices exhibited outside a building, which simply state that dentistry is practised therein. The sign-board and plate mentioned in the complaint bear the inscriptions, "American Dentistry, A. Emslie," and "Dental Office." They do no more than notify that dentistry is carried on within; they contain no profession of the qualifications of the practitioner, and the plate does not even assert that the appellant is the operator. I think the case would have been precisely the same if the notice had been "Teeth drawn here," which I fancy would not have inspired much confidence in sufferers coming to the place.

I therefore think that, although possibly a relevant case might have been made against the appellant if the complaint had been carefully framed and based on the diploma, the remnant of the complaint upon which the Sheriff convicted is irrelevant, and that the appeal should be sustained.

LORD TRAYNER.—In the complaint (out of which this appeal arises) the appellant is charged with a contravention of the Dentists Act, 1878, in so far as not being a person registered under said Act, and not being a legally qualified medical practitioner, he has, by one or more of the four methods specified by the complainer, taken or used a name, title, addition, or description implying that he is a person specially qualified to practise dentistry. The Sheriff-substitute has held that with regard to the third and fourth of the methods specified there are no relevant averments, and on a consideration of the evidence led before him has convicted the appellant of the offence charged as having been committed in the methods first and second specified. No objection is stated by the complainer to the decision of the Sheriff-substitute on the relevancy of the methods third and fourth; we are therefore only now concerned with the complaint and conviction in so far as they proceed upon the first and second methods. I am of opinion with regard to them that they are not relevant to infer a contravention of the statute libelled, and that the conviction should be set aside.

It is to be observed that the statute in question nowhere provides that it shall be unlawful for anyone to practise dentistry unless he be a medical practitioner or specially qualified for such practice. It may fairly enough

No. 24.

June 12, 1897.
Emslie v.
Paterson.

be said that the statute contemplates that such persons will practise dentistry, for in their discouragement it provides that they shall not be entitled to exact fees for any dental operation performed by them. What the statute does prohibit is any person taking or using the name of "dentist" or "dental practitioner," or "any name, title, addition, or description" implying that he is registered under the Act or specially qualified to practise dentistry. Now, the appellant does not call himself a "dentist" or "dental practitioner." So far it is clear there has been no contravention of the statute on his part. He has exhibited a signboard or brass plate on his premises with the words thereon, "American Dentistry, A. Emslie," and another on the door of his premises bearing the words "Dental Office." These words (I take the two inscriptions together) may no doubt be read as meaning that dental operations are performed in these premises, and performed by the appellant, but they contain nothing to imply that the appellant is registered under the Act or that he is specially qualified to perform these operations. What the statute provided against is anyone using a name or designation which is descriptive of a registered or qualified practitioner, who is not in fact entitled to the designation which the assumed name or description implies. Here the appellant has assumed no title whatever. He does not call himself a dentist, dental practitioner, dental surgeon, or licentiate in dental surgery. If he did so he would contravene the statute. But he has added nothing to his own name (which I think is the thing the statute prohibits) by way of title, addition, or description implying that he is registered as a dentist, or that he possesses or claims to have any special qualification for the performance of dental operations. Neither "American Dentistry" nor "Dental Office" can be said to be a name which the appellant has assumed, and neither is a title, addition, or description added to his name implying special qualification for dentistry.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree in the opinions of your Lordships. I will confess that at first I was inclined to take a different view, and if this Act had been broadly directed against the legality of any person not registered practising or professing to practise dentistry I should have had no hesitation in holding that what was alleged and proved here was a contravention. But that is not what the Act bears. As regards that part of the Act on which the prosecutor founds in this case, it strikes only at the holding forth of himself by any person as "specially qualified" to practise dentistry. It does not strike at the practice of dentistry. It recognises that others than persons "specially qualified" may be in the practice of dentistry, and it affects them only to the extent of depriving them of any legal right to sue for remuneration for work done. The question therefore is, whether what is set forth in the two charges which were sent to trial constituted the taking or using of a name, title, addition, or description implying that the appellant was a person specially qualified to practise dentistry. What he did was to place the words "American Dentistry" on his premises, to place his name in juxtaposition to these words, and further that on the premises occupied by him he had the words "Dental Office."

I cannot find in these words anything which implies "special" qualification. If the appellant can without any breach of the criminal law extract

No. 24. teeth and put in false teeth, or the like, I can see nothing in the statute forbidding him from announcing that he does so, which is just announcing that he practises dentistry. The Act strikes at his asserting that he has "special" qualification for doing so, and whatever that may mean, I am unable to hold that the use of the words "American Dentistry" in connection with his name, or calling his place of business a "Dental Office," can be held to be taking or using a name or title, addition, or description implying that he has a "special" qualification, as distinguished from an assertion that he is qualified.

June 12, 1897.
Emslie v.
Paterson.

THE COURT answered the second question in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

DOUGLAS & MILLER, W.S.—STUART & STUART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 25. WILLIAM DICKIE, Complainer.—Munro.
HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—
Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Chisholm, A.-D.

July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.
H. M. Advocate.

Rape—Proof—Evidence of woman's unchastity.—In a trial for rape or assault with intent to ravish, while it is competent on due notice being given, to attack the woman's character for chastity by putting questions to herself, or to prove her general bad repute at the time of the alleged offence, or to prove that she had recently yielded her person voluntarily to the accused, it is not in general competent to prove individual acts of unchastity on her part with other men.

Question, whether it is competent to prove individual acts of unchastity on the part of the woman with other men when such acts are so closely connected with the crime charged as to form part of the res gestæ.

H. M. Advocate v. Allan, 1 Broun, 500; H. M. Advocate v. Reid, 4 Irv. 124, followed.

H. M. Advocate v. Blair, 2 Broun, 167, considered.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Low.

WILLIAM DICKIE, brickworker, St Leonard Street, Lanark, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Lanark, on an indictment setting forth that on 27th March 1897, at a place libelled, he did attempt to ravish A B, a woman named and designed, or otherwise, time and place libelled, did indecently assault the said A B.

Prior to the trial the accused gave notice in the following terms:—"The accused hereby gives notice that it is his intention on the trial of the said indictment . . . to impeach the chastity of the said" A B, "and to prove that she is a person of loose and immoral character, and that she has been on terms of improper familiarity with various men; that in particular in the months of June, July, or August 1895," C D, a man named and designed, "had connection with her at" a place specified; "that in the summer and autumn of 1896 the said" A B "was on terms of undue intimacy with" E F, another man named and designed, "and that the said" E F "had carnal connection with her during said period in a field" specified; "that during the years 1896 and 1897 the said" A B "was improperly familiar in her father's house" with G H, another man named and designed.

At the trial, on 7th May 1897, the agent for the accused asked a witness adduced by the accused the following question:—"Did you see" A B "in the act of connection with" C D "at the back of her house in June, July, or August 1895?"

The Procurator-fiscal objected to the question, and the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) sustained the objection. No. 25.

The Sheriff-substitute also refused to permit the agent for the accused to examine another witness, adduced by the accused, as to any particular act of connection between A B and E F. July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.
H. M. Advocate.

The jury by a majority found the accused guilty of indecent assault, and the Sheriff-substitute sentenced him to thirty days' imprisonment.

He brought a suspension against the Lord Advocate and the Procurator-fiscal, pleading;—The sentence complained of should be suspended and liberation granted, with expenses, as craved, in respect that (1) The Sheriff-substitute rejected competent evidence on behalf of the complainer—(a) by refusing to permit the first mentioned witness to answer the question whether she had seen the said A B in the act of connection with C D; (b) by preventing the second mentioned witness from answering any questions regarding the improper intimacy of the said A B with E F. (2) The said evidence being competent and valuable, in respect that it affected (a) the character, and (b) the credibility of the principal witness for the Crown, the said A B, the Sheriff-substitute refused to admit it. (3) The refusal of the Sheriff to admit the said evidence was oppressive.¹

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The right to attack the character of a witness, and to bring evidence in support of the attack, is one which has always been carefully kept within very limited bounds. There are two reasons why this should be so. First, it is the duty of a Court to protect witnesses from attacks which they cannot be prepared to meet, and which they can claim no right to meet, by leading evidence to rebut them. And second, such inquiries, if entered upon, would necessarily interfere with the conduct of judicial proceedings by introducing collateral issues, which would be most inconvenient and embarrassing, and might often protract proceedings and obscure the true issue which was being tried. Accordingly, in the ordinary case, while it is competent to ask a witness whether he has been convicted of a crime,—if he denies it the fact cannot be vouched except by an extract conviction,—it is not competent to enter upon an inquiry into his general antecedents and to try to prove that he has committed a crime. It is only competent to inquire into matters directly connected with the subject of the trial then proceeding.

In the case of injuries to women, some specialties have been introduced for obvious reasons. Where a woman maintains that she has been indecently attacked, it is competent, upon notice being given, to attack her character for chastity, and to put questions to her involving the accusation of unchastity. And in such cases it has been held competent for the accused to prove ¹ Authorities cited by the parties.—H. M. Advocate v. Swords, May 1769, cited in Burnet's Criminal Law, p. 592; H. M. Advocate v. Wilson, July 15, 1813, cited in Hume on Crimes, notes, p. 304; H. M. Advocate v. Macfarlane, April 26, 1834, 6 Scot. Jur. 321; H. M. Advocate v. Stephens, April 20, 1839, 2 Swin. 348; H. M. Advocate v. Allan, Dec. 27, 1842, 1 Broun, 500; H. M. Advocate v. Blair, May 4, 1844, 2 Broun, 167; H. M. Advocate v. Dignan, Jan. 23, 1854, 1 Irv. 357; H. M. Advocate v. Reid, Dec. 9, 1861, 4 Irv. 124; H. M. Advocate v. Forsyth, April 27, 1866, 5 Irv. 249; Alison, Criminal Law, i. 215, 216, ii. 530, 630; Dickson on Evidence, 2d edit. sec. 29.

No. 25.

July 15, 1897.
 Dickie v.
 H. M. Advocate.

that the witness voluntarily yielded to his embraces a short time before the alleged criminal attack. That such proof should be allowed is only consistent with the clearest grounds of justice, for in considering the question whether an attempt at intercourse be criminal, and to what extent criminal, it is plainly a relevant matter of inquiry on what terms the parties were immediately before the time of the alleged crime. Further, it seems a relevant subject of inquiry whether the woman was at the time a person of reputed bad moral character, as bearing upon her credibility when alleging that she has been subjected to criminal violence by one desiring to have intercourse with her. Such evidence may seriously affect the inferences to be drawn from her conduct at the time. But such evidence is something very different from evidence of individual acts of unchastity with other men at varying intervals of time. I am not aware that such evidence has ever been allowed, and indeed it could only be allowed upon the footing that a female who yields her person to one man will presumably do so to any man—a proposition which is quite untenable. A woman may not be virtuous, but it would be a most unwarrantable assumption that she could not therefore resist, and resist to the uttermost, an attempt to have connection with her by any man who might choose to endeavour to obtain possession of her person, and to whom she might have no intention to yield. Every woman is entitled to protection from attack upon her person. Even a prostitute may be held to be ravished if the proof establishes a rape, although she may admit that she is a prostitute.

Accordingly, it does not seem to me that the relaxation of the ordinary rules of evidence in such cases should be carried any further than it has been in former cases, and that while it is competent to prove a general bad repute at the time of the offence, or to prove that the woman said to have been attacked had yielded her person recently to the same man, it is not competent to prove individual acts of unchastity with other men at other times. Whether proof of such unchastity might be allowed if it occurred just before and practically on the same occasion I do not say. Such a case might be held as falling within the doctrine of the competency of proof of all matters forming parts of the res gestæ. Such facts might have an important bearing on that branch of evidence in such cases which relates to the appearance of the private parts when examined. But where the time is entirely different I am of opinion that the sound and safe rule is that applied to all other cases, viz, that the credibility of witnesses may not be attacked by raising proof on collateral issues as to their previous history, except where they are tainted with crime, conviction of which can be proved by extract record of a Court of justice, or where there is evidence of general repute immediately before the time of the alleged offence which may affect credibility.

I refrain from entering into any examination of the cases, as one of your Lordships is, I understand, prepared to do so, and content myself with saying that according to my reading of the decisions their trend is in the direction of the opinion I have indicated.

LORD ADAM.—There is no doubt that it is not a relevant defence to a charge of rape that the person alleged to be injured was unchaste, however bad her character may be in that respect. Neither, as I understand, is it competent to lead evidence to impeach her general character as regards credibility. But cases such as this are exceptional in this respect, that although unchastity is not a relevant defence to the charge, yet nevertheless it is competent, upon due notice given to the prosecutor, to lead evidence to impeach the chastity of the person alleged to be injured.

No. 25.

July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.
 H. M. Advocate.

The difficulty is to determine the limits within which such evidence must be confined.

There is not much authority on the subject, but the first case to which I think it necessary to refer is that of Allan,¹ which was a case on Circuit. In that case the injured party had denied in the course of her examination that she had had connection with a man Campbell about a year previously. In defence Campbell was called as a witness, and it was proposed to ask him whether he had had connection with her. The question was objected to, and the objection sustained. Lord Moncreiff in giving judgment said,—“No doubt the character of the woman said to have been injured is most material in a case of rape. It is competent, I have not the least doubt, to impeach her character generally, but here it is proposed to prove a specific act, and that is not competent”; and Lord Meadowbank said,—“I myself entertain no doubt that in refusing to receive the evidence tendered we pronounce a decision in conformity with the law.”

That appears to be a decision directly in point on the present case, but its authority is somewhat shaken by the subsequent case of Blair.²

In that case, which was also on Circuit, Blair was charged with the crime of rape. He gave in special defences impeaching the chastity of the girl alleged to have been injured, and stating that she was a common prostitute, and had shortly before surrendered her person to him for money. It was proposed to prove this in defence, which was objected to. In giving judgment the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) said,—“Looking to the terms of the special defences which have been lodged, I have no doubt that the proof objected to is competent. The alleged connection was with the panel himself, which makes this case entirely different from that referred to (*Allan*¹). I may state, however, that after a careful consideration of the authorities I would be prepared, if necessary, to admit proof of particular acts of carnal connection between the injured party and other men as bearing most materially upon the guilt or innocence of the accused on a charge of rape, provided special notice had been given to the public prosecutor that such proof was proposed.”

Lord Wood, on the ground that the alleged connection was with the panel himself, concurred in repelling the objection, but gave no opinion on the more general point.

The matter came up again for consideration in the case of Reid and Others,³ which was a High Court case.

In that case it was proposed, in defence, to establish the unchaste character of the injured party at a past period, the exact date of which could not be precisely stated. This was objected to, and the objection sustained. In

¹ Dec. 27, 1842, 1 Broun, 500. ² May 4, 1844, 2 Broun, 167

³ Dec. 9, 1861, 4 Irvine, 124.

No. 25.

July 15, 1897.
 Dickie v.
 H. M. Advocate.

giving judgment Lord Neaves said,—“ I think, in the first place, that it is clearly competent to impeach the character of the principal witness in a rape, to allege and to prove her bad character at the time when the injury results. If it is alleged that this character was acquired at an earlier period, still it is necessary that it be established by something like continuous evidence up to the time of the alleged offence. This is of great importance to the witness, because it may be easy for her to contradict proof of bad conduct at a particular time and place. She may prove, for example, that she was not there, but in another part of the country at the time. But the proof here offered seems to me to be inadmissible. I think there is no real pertinency in it, and that it would be most dangerous. To attempt to lead evidence as to a course of conduct many years back—perhaps in another country—would be quite irrelevant—at least unless under very special circumstances, and with the most distinct and special notice as to the party, the place, and the time. Now, here it is attempted to prove not bad reputation but latent acts of individual unchastity, at a great distance of time. I can imagine nothing more unfair, nothing more dangerous. Here the inquiry is, whether these panels had forcible connection with the witness. If in the trial of such a case the woman may be made to answer twenty different questions as to whether on twenty different occasions she had connections with as many different men, we might sit to the end of our lives investigating such cases. I conceive that such a course would be contrary to the principles of justice and of judicial inquiry. In the present case no specific notice has been given of such an inquiry, and even if there had, I should regard such an inquiry into the whole latent life of a witness as a cruel and grievous evil.

“ As to the other point which has been raised, I think the question irrelevant, and the line of inquiry proposed incompetent. I adhere generally to the views of Lord Moncreiff, expressed in one of the cases that have been quoted to us. The only instances I can imagine where such a proof would be admissible would be where the alleged occurrences were so closely connected with the crime charged as to form in fact part of the res gestæ, as where, for example, as happened in one case, the woman alleged to have been ravished had connection with another man on the night of the alleged occurrence.”

The Lord Justice-Clerk (the late Lord President), in his opinion, p. 129, says,—“ I am entirely of the same opinion, and were it not that the questions are of considerable importance I should have contented myself with expressing my concurrence in general terms. It seems to me that under the first branch we have to consider two questions. Is the panel in such a case to be allowed, without notice, or even with notice, to prove specific acts of unchastity, and are we to admit evidence of general bad repute without any limit as to time? I have always entertained a strong opinion in conformity with that of Lord Moncreiff. It is for the panels to shew that at the time when the offence is said to have been committed the woman was of loose and immoral character, not as matter of defence, but as bearing very materially on the effect of the evidence on the minds of the jury. The law has done wisely in making an exception in the case of rape from the general rule, that you cannot raise up a collateral issue and allow a proof of a wit-ness's character and repute. But to extend this to particular instances of unchaste conduct would be most unfair to the witness, especially without very pointed and distinct notice, and even with such notice.

No. 25.

July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.
H. M. Advocate.

"But, second, what is here sought to be proved is general evidence of reputation or character, not more recent than many years ago, which is all we could gather from the statement of the prisoner's counsel. The Court are not in possession of any more specific information as to date. Now, I object to this line of examination, very much on the same grounds as I object to proof of individual acts, because if a woman is in possession of a fair and honourable reputation at the time of the alleged offence, it would be in the highest degree unjust and inexpedient to inquire into her character at some former time. She may have been indiscreet, or even unchaste, in her conduct at some period of her life, but if she is not so now, I do not think the inquiry relevant. I hold it to be indispensable that the character sought to be proved should be the character existing at the time when the rape is said to have been committed.

"Another point has been raised, not indeed of the same importance, and as to it I have no difficulty. The proof attempted of particular circumstances and incidents in this woman's life, merely for the purpose of contradicting the statements made by her on cross-examination, seems to me to have no pertinency or relevancy at all. I hold it to be established law that such proof is inadmissible, and the laws of all countries agree in disallowing it."

I concur entirely in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Neaves there expressed.

The result then appears to me to be that it is competent to lead evidence to impeach the chastity of the party alleged to be injured, provided always that due notice thereof be given, but that such evidence must be confined to evidence of general character and repute in that respect existing at the time of the alleged crime. That it is not competent to prove specific acts of connection with other men, unless such acts are so closely connected with the crime charged as to form, as Lord Neaves puts it, part of the res gestæ, by which I understand him to mean that they would or might furnish evidence tending to account for the physical condition and appearance of the woman. That it is competent to prove previous connection with the panel himself. In that case, however, it appears to me that the evidence is relevant to the question of consent or non-consent, because it is more or less probable that a woman who had been already intimate with a man would not offer a very strenuous resistance to his having again connection with her, while there is no presumption or probability that a woman who may have allowed a particular man to have connection with her, would allow another man, it may be a perfect stranger, to have connection with her.

I am of opinion therefore that the evidence tendered in this case was rightly rejected.

Had I been of a different opinion on the general question, I should still have been of opinion that the decision was right both in respect of the remoteness of the alleged acts and of the latitude of time proposed to be taken.

I am therefore of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

No. 25. giving judgment Lord Neaves said,—“ I think, in the first place, that it is clearly competent to impeach the character of the principal witness in a rape, to allege and to prove her bad character at the time when the injury results. If it is alleged that this character was acquired at an earlier period, still it is necessary that it be established by something like continuous evidence up to the time of the alleged offence. This is of great importance to the witness, because it may be easy for her to contradict proof of bad conduct at a particular time and place. She may prove, for example, that she was not there, but in another part of the country at the time. But the proof here offered seems to me to be inadmissible. I think there is no real pertinency in it, and that it would be most dangerous. To attempt to lead evidence as to a course of conduct many years back—perhaps in another country—would be quite irrelevant—at least unless under very special circumstances, and with the most distinct and special notice as to the party, the place, and the time. Now, here it is attempted to prove not bad reputation but latent acts of individual unchastity, at a great distance of time. I can imagine nothing more unfair, nothing more dangerous. Here the inquiry is, whether these panels had forcible connection with the witness. If in the trial of such a case the woman may be made to answer twenty different questions as to whether on twenty different occasions she had connections with as many different men, we might sit to the end of our lives investigating such cases. I conceive that such a course would be contrary to the principles of justice and of judicial inquiry. In the present case no specific notice has been given of such an inquiry, and even if there had, I should regard such an inquiry into the whole latent life of a witness as a cruel and grievous evil.

“ As to the other point which has been raised, I think the question irrelevant, and the line of inquiry proposed incompetent. I adhere generally to the views of Lord Moncreiff, expressed in one of the cases that have been quoted to us. The only instances I can imagine where such a proof would be admissible would be where the alleged occurrences were so closely connected with the crime charged as to form in fact part of the res gestæ, as where, for example, as happened in one case, the woman alleged to have been ravished had connection with another man on the night of the alleged occurrence.”

The Lord Justice-Clerk (the late Lord President), in his opinion, p. 129, says,—“ I am entirely of the same opinion, and were it not that the questions are of considerable importance I should have contented myself with expressing my concurrence in general terms. It seems to me that under the first branch we have to consider two questions. Is the panel in such a case to be allowed, without notice, or even with notice, to prove specific acts of unchastity, and are we to admit evidence of general bad repute without any limit as to time? I have always entertained a strong opinion in conformity with that of Lord Moncreiff. It is for the panels to shew that at the time when the offence is said to have been committed the woman was of loose and immoral character, not as matter of defence, but as bearing very materially on the effect of the evidence on the minds of the jury. The law has done wisely in making an exception in the case of rape from the general rule, that you cannot raise up a collateral issue and allow a proof of a wit-

July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.
H. M. Advocate.

ness's character and repute. But to extend this to particular instances of unchaste conduct would be most unfair to the witness, especially without very pointed and distinct notice, and even with such notice.

No. 25.

July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.

H. M. Advocate.

"But, second, what is here sought to be proved is general evidence of reputation or character, not more recent than many years ago, which is all we could gather from the statement of the prisoner's counsel. The Court are not in possession of any more specific information as to date. Now, I object to this line of examination, very much on the same grounds as I object to proof of individual acts, because if a woman is in possession of a fair and honourable reputation at the time of the alleged offence, it would be in the highest degree unjust and inexpedient to inquire into her character at some former time. She may have been indiscreet, or even unchaste, in her conduct at some period of her life, but if she is not so now, I do not think the inquiry relevant. I hold it to be indispensable that the character sought to be proved should be the character existing at the time when the rape is said to have been committed.

"Another point has been raised, not indeed of the same importance, and as to it I have no difficulty. The proof attempted of particular circumstances and incidents in this woman's life, merely for the purpose of contradicting the statements made by her on cross-examination, seems to me to have no pertinency or relevancy at all. I hold it to be established law that such proof is inadmissible, and the laws of all countries agree in disallowing it."

I concur entirely in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Neaves there expressed.

The result then appears to me to be that it is competent to lead evidence to impeach the chastity of the party alleged to be injured, provided always that due notice thereof be given, but that such evidence must be confined to evidence of general character and repute in that respect existing at the time of the alleged crime. That it is not competent to prove specific acts of connection with other men, unless such acts are so closely connected with the crime charged as to form, as Lord Neaves puts it, part of the res gestæ, by which I understand him to mean that they would or might furnish evidence tending to account for the physical condition and appearance of the woman. That it is competent to prove previous connection with the panel himself. In that case, however, it appears to me that the evidence is relevant to the question of consent or non-consent, because it is more or less probable that a woman who had been already intimate with a man would not offer a very strenuous resistance to his having again connection with her, while there is no presumption or probability that a woman who may have allowed a particular man to have connection with her, would allow another man, it may be a perfect stranger, to have connection with her.

I am of opinion therefore that the evidence tendered in this case was rightly rejected.

Had I been of a different opinion on the general question, I should still have been of opinion that the decision was right both in respect of the remoteness of the alleged acts and of the latitude of time proposed to be taken.

I am therefore of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

No. 25. LORD LOW.—Having had the advantage of reading over the opinion delivered by your Lordship in the chair, it is only necessary to state that I concur not only in the result arrived at by your Lordships, but also on the grounds on which that decision is founded. I also concur with Lord Adam in his summary of the result of the authorities on this branch of law and the conclusion they lead to.

THE COURT refused the bill.

J. D. HAY STEWART, W.S.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 26. WILLIAM CRAIG, Complainer.—Abel.
 ANDREW TARRAS (Burgh Prosecutor, Fraserburgh), Respondent.—
A. S. D. Thomson.

July 15, 1897.
 Dickie v.
 H. M. Advocate.
 Craig v.
 Tarras.

Suspension—Statutory exclusion of review—No written record of adjournment—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 495.—The hearing of a complaint under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, was, on the motion of the accused, adjourned to 28th June 1897, but there was no written record of the adjournment. On 28th June the accused pleaded not guilty without stating any objection to the absence of a written record of the adjournment. The accused having been convicted brought a suspension pleading that the whole proceedings subsequent to the original diet were vitiated in respect that there was no written record of the adjournment.

Held that the absence of a written record of the adjournment was a fundamental nullity which vitiated the whole proceedings, and that the conviction was not protected from review by section 495 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.
 Lord Kin-
 cairney.
 Lord Stormonth-
 Darling.

ON 28th June 1897 William Craig senior, holder of a grocer's certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors at his premises in Broad Street, Fraserburgh, was convicted in the Police Court there on a complaint under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, charging him with a contravention of the Public-Houses Acts.

He brought a bill of suspension, in which he stated :—(Stat. 2) The complaint was served upon the complainer on 10th June 1897, and he was summoned to appear on the 18th June following. (Stat. 3) "An adjournment of said diet to the 28th June was granted on the application of the complainer's law-agent; but no minute adjourning the diet was written out or signed." (Stat. 4) "The complainer was unable, by reason of illness, personally to attend the said adjourned diet on 28th June 1897. His law-agent, who appeared on his behalf, and tendered a medical certificate as to the complainer's absence, took objection to the relevancy of the complaint, but the objection was repelled. The complainer's law-agent thereafter tendered a plea of not guilty, and the case accordingly proceeded to trial," and the complainer was convicted.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The whole proceedings subsequent to the date of the original diet being in any event vitiated, in respect that there is no written minute of adjournment of said diet, the conviction should be set aside.

Argued for the complainer ;—The want of a written record of the adjournment was fatal to the conviction.¹

Argued for the respondent ;—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,

¹ Macarthur v. Campbell, March 18, 1896, 23 R. (Just. Cases) 81, 2 Adam, 151.

ness's character and repute. But to extend this to particular instances of unchaste conduct would be most unfair to the witness, especially without very pointed and distinct notice, and even with such notice.

No. 25.
July 15, 1897.
Dickie v.
H. M. Advocate.

"But, second, what is here sought to be proved is general evidence of reputation or character, not more recent than many years ago, which is all we could gather from the statement of the prisoner's counsel. The Court are not in possession of any more specific information as to date. Now, I object to this line of examination, very much on the same grounds as I object to proof of individual acts, because if a woman is in possession of a fair and honourable reputation at the time of the alleged offence, it would be in the highest degree unjust and inexpedient to inquire into her character at some former time. She may have been indiscreet, or even unchaste, in her conduct at some period of her life, but if she is not so now, I do not think the inquiry relevant. I hold it to be indispensable that the character sought to be proved should be the character existing at the time when the rape is said to have been committed.

"Another point has been raised, not indeed of the same importance, and as to it I have no difficulty. The proof attempted of particular circumstances and incidents in this woman's life, merely for the purpose of contradicting the statements made by her on cross-examination, seems to me to have no pertinency or relevancy at all. I hold it to be established law that such proof is inadmissible, and the laws of all countries agree in disallowing it."

I concur entirely in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Neaves there expressed.

The result then appears to me to be that it is competent to lead evidence to impeach the chastity of the party alleged to be injured, provided always that due notice thereof be given, but that such evidence must be confined to evidence of general character and repute in that respect existing at the time of the alleged crime. That it is not competent to prove specific acts of connection with other men, unless such acts are so closely connected with the crime charged as to form, as Lord Neaves puts it, part of the res gestæ, by which I understand him to mean that they would or might furnish evidence tending to account for the physical condition and appearance of the woman. That it is competent to prove previous connection with the panel himself. In that case, however, it appears to me that the evidence is relevant to the question of consent or non-consent, because it is more or less probable that a woman who had been already intimate with a man would not offer a very strenuous resistance to his having again connection with her, while there is no presumption or probability that a woman who may have allowed a particular man to have connection with her, would allow another man, it may be a perfect stranger, to have connection with her.

I am of opinion therefore that the evidence tendered in this case was rightly rejected.

Had I been of a different opinion on the general question, I should still have been of opinion that the decision was right both in respect of the remoteness of the alleged acts and of the latitude of time proposed to be taken.

I am therefore of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

No. 26. LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I agree. I think the case of *Macarthur v. Campbell*¹ is quite conclusive.

July 16, 1897.
Craig v.
Tarras.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

THE COURT passed the bill, and suspended the conviction and sentence complained of.

WM. CROFT GRAY, Solicitor—W. & J. L. OFFICER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 27.

JAMES WHITE, Appellant.—Abel.

ROBERT MAXWELL MAIN, Respondent.—Cook.

July 16, 1897.
White v.
Main.

Complaint—Civil or Criminal—Dogs Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. c. 56), sec. 2.—The Dogs Act, 1871, sec. 2, enacts,—“Any Court of summary jurisdiction may take cognisance of a complaint that a dog is dangerous and not kept under proper control, and if it appears to the Court having cognisance of such complaint that such dog is dangerous, the Court may make an order in a summary way directing the dog to be kept by the owner under proper control or destroyed, and any person failing to comply with such order shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings for every day during which he fails to comply with such order.”

A person was charged with “an offence” under the Dogs Act, 1871, as being the owner of a dog which was dangerous and not kept under proper control, and an order was craved directing him to keep it under proper control. The magistrate convicted the owner of the offence charged, and pronounced the order craved, “under a penalty not exceeding 20s. for every day during which he fails to comply with this order.”

Conviction quashed, on the ground that the procedure for obtaining an order was civil and not criminal, and that no offence could be committed until the order had been disobeyed.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Kin-
cairney.
LdStormonth-
Darling.

ON 6th March 1897 James White senior, market-gardener, East Linton, was served with a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court, Haddington, and was cited “to appear personally to answer thereto in the Justice of Peace Court-room in the county buildings at Haddington, upon the 16th day of March 1897, at eleven o'clock forenoon, with certification.”

The complaint was in the following terms:—

“Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.

“Unto the Honourable Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Haddington

“The complaint of Robert Maxwell Main, solicitor in Haddington, Procurator-fiscal of Court, “Humbly sheweth

“That James White senior, market-gardener, East Linton, has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Dogs Act, 1871, section 2,* in so far as he is the owner of a dog (a cross-bred Bedlington) which is dangerous and not kept under proper control. That the said dog, on the 11th day of February 1897, did, on the road or street leading through the village of East Linton, and at a part thereof near to the house occupied by William Cowe, butcher there, attack Helen Hope, niece of and residing with Margaret Hope, spinster, East Linton, by springing upon her and knocking her to the ground, and while on the ground by again springing upon her and biting her on the right hand, and did drag from her arms a Dandie Dinmont terrier which she was then carrying, and severely bite and worry said terrier, whereby the said James White senior is liable, as the owner of said dog, to have an order made by Court of summary jurisdiction directing that said dog be kept under proper control or destroyed, under a penalty not exceeding 20s. for every day during which such order is not complied with.

¹ 23 R. (Just. Cases) 81, 2 Adam, 151.

* Quoted in rubric.

"May it therefore please your Honours to grant warrant to cite said James White senior, to appear before you to answer to this complaint, and thereafter, if it shall appear to your Honours that said dog is dangerous, to make an order directing the dog to be kept by the owner under proper control or destroyed, under the penalty provided in said Act.

"According to Justice."

The record of procedure bore that on 16th March 1897 in presence of six Justices of the county of Haddington "appeared James White senior, complained against, and the complaint being read over to him he answers that he is not guilty."

The record further bore that four witnesses named were examined "in support of the complaint" and two "in exculpation."

The Justices pronounced the following deliverance:—"Haddington, 16th March 1897.—The Justices, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict the said James White senior of the offence charged, in respect the dog libelled, on the date libelled, at the place libelled, did bite the woman Helen Hope libelled, once on the hand, and direct the dog libelled to be kept by the owner under proper control, and that under a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings for every day during which he fails to comply with this order—all in terms of the Dogs Act, 1871."

White obtained a case.

The case set forth the complaint and the procedure, and also that the facts averred were held to be proved, and further stated that no objection had been taken to the competency or relevancy of the complaint.

The following question of law was, inter alia, stated,—“1. Whether the appellant was, in the circumstances stated, guilty of a contravention of, or of an offence within the meaning of, the Dogs Act, 1871, section 2?”

Argued for the appellant;—The statute did not authorise a conviction in the first instance; it was only after an order had been pronounced and had been disobeyed that proceedings of a criminal character for the recovery of a penalty became competent.

Argued for the respondent;—It was not incompetent under the statute to pronounce a conviction.¹ Even if it was, the mistake was a purely technical one, and the appellant had suffered no prejudice. As therefore he had taken no objection to the complaint in the Court below it was too late to raise the question now.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case, although the fact that the appellant was found guilty of an offence may not be a very serious one, looking to the character of the alleged offence, yet the question is a general one, and we must deal with it as such. Where a statute provides that a person may be summoned before a Court of summary jurisdiction to say why that Court should not pronounce a judgment requiring him to do something prescribed by the statute, are the proceedings under such a statute criminal in their

No. 27.

July 16, 1897.
White v.
Main.

¹ Henderson v. Mackenzie, March 18, 1876, 3 R. 623.

² Macdougall v. MacLulich, Feb. 18, 1887, 14 R. (Just. Cases), 17, 1 White, 328.

No. 27. character, at least at that stage, and is a criminal complaint the appropriate method of initiating such proceedings?
 July 16, 1897. White v. Main.

Now, here we are asked the question, "Whether the appellant was . . . guilty of a contravention of, or of an offence within the meaning of the Dogs Act, 1871, section 2?" Now, section 2 there referred to consists of two parts. The first part relates to a complaint to be brought before a Judge of summary jurisdiction, averring that a dog is dangerous, and asking that its owner be ordered to keep the dog under proper control or destroy it. Then the second part of the section provides a penalty which may be pronounced against the owner should he fail to implement the order pronounced under the first part of the section. The first part does not involve any offence at all. The statute proceeds upon the footing that if a dog has been proved to the satisfaction of a magistrate to be dangerous, the magistrate may pronounce an order requiring the owner of that dog to keep it under proper control or destroy it. So far there is nothing of the nature of an offence at all. It is merely a matter of civil administration. I do not appreciate the difficulty suggested about the form of proceedings to be adopted. The complainer has merely to say that A B has a dog which is dangerous, and which is not kept under proper control, and end with a prayer that an order may be pronounced that A B should either keep that dog under proper control or destroy it. Until such an order had been pronounced and had been disregarded, the appellant was not in a position to be dealt with under the penalty clause of the statute. He had committed no offence at all. If that be so, we are in a position to answer the first question put to us in this case in the negative. The circumstances set forth are, that the dog belonging to the appellant did certain things, and from that it was evident that the dog was dangerous and was not kept under proper control. That being so, the complainer was no doubt entitled to ask that an order be pronounced requiring the appellant to keep his dog under control or destroy it, but there is so far no offence committed, and to convict him of an offence was to do what was outside the prayer, and was therefore incompetent.

LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I agree. I think the Act is purely preventive, and is intended to ensure that the owner of a dog which is or becomes dangerous shall take due precautions against its doing any injury. If the Court finds that a dog is dangerous an order may be pronounced requiring its owner to keep it under proper control. The prayer of the complaint is right enough, but I suppose the narrative, which recites that an offence had been committed, misled the magistrates. If the narrative of the complaint had been confined to the facts, and if the magistrates had confined their judgment to affirming these facts and pronouncing an order on the owner, they would have acted quite competently under the statute, but they have convicted the appellant of an offence when there was no offence at all. The offence does not arise till the order is disobeyed.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—PURVES & AITKEN, W.S.—Agents.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

1896-97.

WINTER SESSION.

ALEXANDER DRYBURGH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Balfour—Macfarlane.

No. 1.

A. & A. S. GORDON, Defenders (Reclaimers).—W. Campbell—Clyde. Oct. 15, 1896.
Dryburgh v. Gordon.

Sale—Sale of heritage—Objection to title—Inhibitions—Obligation to clear record.—In an action by a purchaser of heritage for implement of an obligation by the seller's agents to produce searches shewing a clear record, the defenders tendered searches which disclosed two inhibitions used against the seller prior to the date of the disposition by him. The defenders alleged that the inhibitions were invalid.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that whether the inhibitions were or were not valid, the defenders were bound to implement their obligation to clear the record by having them discharged.

Opinion (by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that an inhibition may affect a heritable right in the person of one who does not hold it by feudalised title.

ON 26th September 1895 Alexander Dryburgh, grocer, Edinburgh, made an offer to William Shaw to purchase certain premises in Edinburgh belonging to him. The offer was accepted. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

By disposition, dated 6th and 7th December, and recorded 10th December 1895, the subjects were conveyed to the purchaser. The disposition bore:—"I, William Shaw, . . . proprietor of the several subjects hereinafter disposed, with consent and concurrence of Alexander Gordon, S.S.C., Edinburgh, and I, the said Alexander Gordon, for all right, title, and interest, competent to me in the said subjects, in virtue of (first) disposition by the said William Shaw in my favour, dated and recorded . . . 28th February 1895, and (second) disposition by the said William Shaw in my favour, dated and recorded . . . 25th July 1895, and we, the said William Shaw and Alexander Gordon, both, with joint consent and assent, in consideration of the sum of £979, 13s. 9d. sterling, instantly paid to me, the said William Shaw, by Alexander Dryburgh . . . as the price thereof, of which sum I, the said William Shaw, hereby acknowledge the receipt, and discharge the said Alexander Dryburgh, do hereby . . . sell and dispose to the said Alexander Dryburgh and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably" the subjects.

The deed contained the following clause of warrandice:—"And I, the said William Shaw, grant warrandice; and I, the said Alexander Gordon, grant warrandice from my own facts and deeds only."

ON 7th December 1895 Messrs A. & A. S. Gordon granted to the purchaser the following letter:—"Dear Sir,—With reference to the

No. 1. settlement of the purchase of the above, the price whereof has been received to-day, we undertake— . . . 6. To produce searches shewing a clear record as at 10th December 1895.”

Oct. 15, 1896.
Dryburgh v.
Gordon.

Founding on this letter, Dryburgh raised the present action against Messrs Gordon, concluding to have the defenders ordained to exhibit to the pursuer searches for incumbrances shewing that the subjects sold were free from all inhibitions and all other burdens.

The pursuer averred that the defenders had failed to implement their obligation,—“the searches they have exhibited having disclosed two inhibitions against the said William Shaw, raised on 13th and executed on 15th, and both recorded in the General Register of Inhibitions on 22d May 1895, discharges whereof the defenders refuse or delay to procure, whereby the present action has become necessary.”

The defenders stated that Mr Alexander Gordon, one of the partners of their firm, had made advances to Shaw to enable him to complete his buildings, and had obtained from him an absolute disposition, which was recorded on 28th February 1895, and that this disposition was not qualified by any back-letter. The disposition, which was produced, bore to be granted “for certain good and onerous causes and considerations not exceeding in all the sum of £600.”

The defenders admitted “that the searches referred to disclose two inhibitions, both recorded on 22d May 1895, long after the date of recording the first disposition in favour of said Alexander Gordon. Denied that the defenders have failed to implement their obligation.”

On 10th June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Finds (1) that by letter addressed by the defenders to the pursuer, dated 7th December 1895, the defenders undertook to deliver to the pursuer searches shewing a clear record in reference to the subjects conveyed by the disposition in favour of the pursuer, dated 6th and 7th December 1895, No. 8 of process; (2) that the searches furnished by the defenders disclosed the inhibitions against William Shaw, granter of said disposition, set forth on the record; (3) that, in respect of said inhibitions, the said obligation contained in said letter has not been implemented; (4) that the defenders are bound to disencumber the title to the said subjects of said inhibitions.” *

* “OPINION.— . . . The question is, whether the obligation expressed in the letter to produce searches shewing a clear record has been implemented; or whether the two inhibitions shewed that the record was not clear, and were incumbrances which the defenders were bound to remove.

“On considering the case, I formed an opinion in favour of the pursuer; but it appeared to me that the letter was not sufficiently stamped. That defect has been rectified, and, having reconsidered the cause, I retain the opinion that the pursuer is in the right, and that the defenders' obligation has not been fully implemented.

“The letters of inhibition are in the form of the Schedule QQ in the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, and they purport to prohibit Shaw, inter alia, from ‘disposing his lands or heritages.’ Of course the prohibition is in general terms, and mentions no lands. Before 1868 letters of inhibition affected not only lands belonging to the person inhibited at the date of recording the letters, but also lands subsequently acquired by him (Stair, iv. 50, 17; Ersk. ii. 11, 10). But it is provided by the 157th section of the Act of 1868 that no inhibition shall affect acquirenda except in the cases mentioned in the section.

“By the disposition to the pursuer, Shaw does the precise thing which the letters prohibit. Prima facie, the disposition is in breach of the letters

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The inhibitions were not effectual. At their date there were no lands and heritages left belonging to Shaw. If the record was clear at the date of his divestiture it could not after that date be burdened quoad him. A clear record at this date fulfilled the obligation of the defenders. The disposition of 28th February 1895 conveyed to Gordon the feudal right to the lands and only left in Shaw a personal right to the reversion of the subjects when he had settled Gordon's claims against him. But an inhibition could not affect a personal right.¹ Inhibition could only cover feudalised subjects.² Perhaps Stair's general rule had been qualified,³ still three requirements remained as essential (1) the right affected must be real; (2) it must be capable of infestment; and (3) infestment must have followed.

No. 1.
Oct. 15, 1896.
Dryburgh v.
Gordon.

and reducible ex capite inhibitionis. Section 157 does not affect the question, and need not be considered, because there is no suggestion that the subjects have been acquired by Shaw since the inhibitions were recorded. He had the same right to the lands then as at the date of the disposition.

"The defenders' answer is that the inhibitions do not affect the lands, because at both dates Gordon, and not Shaw, was proprietor in virtue of the disposition to Gordon, dated 28th February, and so prior to the inhibitions recorded on 22d May. I am, however, of opinion that it is competently ascertained that at these dates Shaw, and not Gordon, was the true proprietor. It is true that the disposition of 28th February by Shaw to Gordon is ex facie absolute. It bears to be granted 'for certain good and onerous causes and considerations not exceeding in all the sum of £600.' It does not bear expressly that any sum was paid; but yet it is ex facie absolute.

"But the disposition in favour of the pursuer granted by Shaw as well as by Gordon proves, I think, incontestibly that the disposition by Shaw to Gordon was only in security, and left the radical right in Shaw. The disposition to the pursuer has the effect of a registered back-letter on the previous disposition by Shaw to Gordon. It bears that the price was paid to Shaw, that it was Shaw who undertook absolute warrandice, and (which appears conclusive) it expressly describes Shaw as the proprietor, and that I take to be the language of Gordon as well as of Shaw. But the defenders say that at all events the feudal title was in Gordon, and that what was left in Shaw was only a personal right to have the subjects reconveyed. That is no doubt true, and is fully borne out by the case of the Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, 10th December 1886, 14 R. (H. L.) 1, quoted by the defenders. I do not doubt that Gordon could have given a good title, and I do not say whether a disposition by Gordon could have been objected to on account of letters of inhibition against Shaw. But I am not concerned with a disposition by Gordon, but with a disposition by Shaw, as principal granter, he having the radical right but not the feudal title. The defenders quoted no authority to the effect that the operation of an inhibition depends on sasine or registration; or that an inhibition does not affect such a radical right in lands as was in the person of Shaw. It has, it is true, been doubted whether an inhibition will affect a heritable bond which has never been feudalised.—Dirleton's Doubts, p. 100, and, Stewart's Answers, p. 163. But it has been decided that if a heritable bond has been feudalised, and then assigned, further transferences of it will be struck at by an inhibition, although the right of the inhibited disponent be only personal.—Low, 6th December 1814, F. C. That is to say, that an inhibition may affect an heritable right in the person of one who does not ¹ Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, Dec. 10, 1886, 14 R. (H. L.) 1; 2 Bell's Comm. (7th ed.) 135.

² Stair, iv. 50, 2.

³ Low v. Wedgwood, 6 Dec. 1814, F. C.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1896.
Dryburgh v.
Gordon.

Argued for the pursuer;—Shaw, who granted the disposition, described himself as proprietor of the subjects, and he received and discharged the price. He was truly the owner, and the Lord Ordinary had taken the correct view of his position. The obligation of the defenders was to shew a clear record to 10th December 1895. The inhibitions of May 1895 precluded fulfilment of their obligation, and must be removed. While they stood they offered a practical basis for declining to accept the title. The Lord Ordinary was right in regarding the inhibitions as valid, but whether they were or not, it was the duty of the defenders to clear them off, and to deliver to him a marketable title.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defenders, by letter dated 7th December 1895, which had reference to a purchase of property from Mr Shaw, a client, gave an undertaking to the pursuer to produce searches shewing a clear record as at 10th December. That undertaking was given in regard to a disposition to the pursuer by Mr Shaw, who is described in the deed as owner of the property, and to whom the price was to be paid.

In these circumstances, when the search was made it was found that there were on the record two undischarged inhibitions applying to the property, and dated prior to the disposition. Whether these inhibitions are ineffectual is a question which cannot be decided in this action. The only question before us is whether a search shewing a clear record has or has not been made. All I say is, that standing the disposition by Mr Shaw and the undertaking by the defenders, and standing these undischarged inhibitions, the defenders' obligation has not been carried out.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. When I first read the papers in the case I was of opinion that we could not decide anything on the validity of the inhibitions, the inhibitors not being here, and it not being incumbent on the pursuers to call them. The action is founded on a letter hold it by feudalised title. I do not think that I require to decide whether, assuming the radical right to be in Shaw, that right is affected by the letters of inhibition. I lean to the opinion that it is. But it is enough if the point be fairly open to serious question. I think that it is; and on that account I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to object that a search which discloses such inhibitions does not shew a clear record.

“Further, I regard the defenders' letter as corroborative of the obligation of Shaw as seller. It adds the obligation of the defenders to his; and it appears to me that the obligation of the defenders may be measured by Shaw's obligation. Now, that was the ordinary obligation of a seller to disencumber the subjects. On that point Professor Menzies observes,—‘If there are inhibitions undischarged, discharges must be insisted for, unless the party inhibited has been afterwards sequestrated; the sequestration terminates the effect of inhibition in relation to third parties, for it is under it that inhibition must be made effectual.’—Menzies' Lectures, 3d ed. p. 836. That, it is true, was written before 1868, but, as I have remarked, the provision in the Act of 1868 does not seem to affect the case. It can hardly be doubted that before 1868 a purchaser could not be compelled to take a title from a seller under inhibition, nor to do so now, unless it appeared that the seller had acquired the lands since the date of the inhibition, and so was in a position to plead the 157th section of the Act of 1868.

“On the whole I am of opinion that, so long as the letters of inhibition are not taken out of the way, the obligation of the defenders has not been implemented.”

of obligation by the defenders to the pursuer to produce searches shewing a clear record as at 10th December 1895 in regard to a property purchased by the pursuer from Mr Shaw. The disposition bears that Shaw is the proprietor, and that the conveyance is made in consideration of a sum paid to him. In the disposition the Messrs Gordon are made consenting parties and co-disponers. That could not do any harm, but the purchase was made from Shaw as proprietor through Messrs Gordon as his agents, and the purchase money was paid to Shaw. In these circumstances it was natural, at least quite intelligible, that a letter should be taken from the Messrs Gordon binding them to shew a clear record as at 10th December 1895. That undertaking was clearly as regards Mr Shaw, who bears on the face of the disposition to be the proprietor and disponent. The search shewed that the record was not clear, that two inhibitions existed dated in May 1895. Now it is said, and on intelligible grounds, that the inhibitions are of no use, because Mr Shaw in February divested himself from a conveyancing point of view of the property by making a disposition of it in favour of Messrs Gordon. It is said that Mr Shaw having divested himself of the property in February, the inhibitions in May were inoperative. But the purchaser has no concern with the relations between Mr Shaw and Messrs Gordon. I give no opinion as to whether the inhibitions, if they were fully investigated, would be found to be operative or not. All I decide is that it is for Messrs Gordon to clear the record. If the inhibitions are easily proved to be worthless, it will be an easy matter to clear the record; if the question as to the validity of the inhibitions is a more serious matter,—and I cannot regard it as other than serious when I find that the Lord Ordinary has decided that the inhibitions are of value,—still the obligation to clear the record exists. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the only result we can arrive at is to affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary without entering into any of the questions raised in his judgment with regard to the validity of the inhibitions.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1896.
Dryburgh v.
Gordon.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The action is brought to enforce the obligation contained in the letter of 7th December 1895 in which the defenders undertook to produce searches showing a clear record as at 10th December 1895. That meant a clear record not merely in the property register but also in the register of personal diligence. The search produced discloses two inhibitions. I am of opinion that whether these inhibitions are valid or invalid, the pursuer is entitled to have the record cleared of them, and that the defenders are bound to clear the record of these inhibitions before their obligation can be held to be fulfilled.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I concur. I think it is unnecessary to decide as to the validity of the inhibition. My judgment proceeds on the letter of obligation. What the title requires is a clear record as to Shaw as at 10th December. By the disposition itself a personal search is required as against Shaw, who, on the face of the disposition, appears as the proprietor, and to whom the price was paid. The defenders cannot be held to have fulfilled their obligations till the record is cleared of these inhibitions.

THE COURT adhered.

MACRAE, FLETT, & BENNIE, W.S.—A. & A. S. GORDON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2. JAMES CRAIG, Complainer (Reclaiming).—Lees—A. S. D. Thomson.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

THE REVEREND DAVID NASMYTH HOGG, Respondent.—D.-F. Asher—Clyde.

Judicial Factor—Process—Expenses—Decree against defender “as judicial factor”—Personal liability.—A judicial factor upon the estate of a person deceased defended an action brought against him “as judicial factor” by a creditor of the deceased. An interlocutor was subsequently pronounced ordaining the defender “as judicial factor” to make payment to the pursuer of £159, and finding the defender “as judicial factor” liable in expenses to the pursuer.

Held (by a majority of seven Judges, Lord Young, Lord Adam, Lord M'Laren, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Moncreiff, diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner) that the interlocutor could not be construed as imposing on the defender personal liability for expenses.

Question, whether a judicial factor who litigates unsuccessfully is as a general rule personally liable for expenses to the successful party.

Opinions (affirmative) per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord M'Laren, Lord Trayner, and Lord Moncreiff.

Opinions (negative) per Lord Young, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear.

Gordon v. Campbell, 1842, 1 Bell's App. 428, and Ferguson v. Murray, December 20, 1863, 16 D. 260, commented on.

2D DIVISION,
with three consulted Judges.
Lord Low.

ON 13th December 1892 James Craig, chartered accountant, Edinburgh, was appointed judicial factor on the estates of the deceased Archibald Rodan Hogg, solicitor, Edinburgh. The principal asset of the estates consisted of a claim for repayment of £2026, 8s. 9d. of cash advances made to a Mr John Baird, builder, Edinburgh, secured over the reversion of certain heritable subjects.

On 21st April 1893 the Reverend David Nasmyth Hogg of Auchtermuchty raised an action of accounting against Mr Craig as “judicial factor foresaid,” calling for exhibition and production of an account of the whole intromissions of Archibald Rodan Hogg as executor of his deceased brother Dr Robert Hogg, or as vititious intromitter, and craving that Mr Craig, as judicial factor foresaid, should be decreed to make payment to the pursuer as one of the next of kin of Dr Hogg of the sum of £1000, or such other sum as might appear to be the balance due to him, and in the event of Mr Craig failing to produce an account, craving for decree against him “as judicial factor foresaid,” of the sum of £1000, which should in that case be held to be the balance due as aforesaid.

Mr Craig lodged defences, and upon 1st March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor decerning and ordaining the defender, “as judicial factor of Archibald Rodan Hogg, to make payment to the pursuer of £159, 6s. 8d., with interest: . . . Finds the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, liable in expenses to the pursuer.”*

* “OPINION.—There has been some discussion in regard to the terms in which the finding for expenses to which the pursuer is entitled should be made. The action is directed against Mr Craig only in the capacity of judicial factor upon the late Mr Rodan Hogg's estate, and it is not disputed that decree for the principal sum falls to be given against him as judicial factor. He contends, however, that the pursuer should only be found entitled to expenses ‘out of the estate’ or ‘only as an ordinary creditor.’ I do not know of any authority for so limiting a finding or decree for expenses. When the pursuer in an action against a judicial factor is found entitled to

An interlocutor was subsequently pronounced giving decree for No. 2.
£179, 6s. 11d., the taxed amount of expenses.

Mr Craig failed to pay the principal sum or the expenses.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

The pursuer thereupon extracted the interlocutors, and on 28th May 1895 charged Mr Craig "to make payment of the sum of £179, 6s. 11d., being the taxed amount of the pursuer's account of expenses, and the sum of 19s. 8d., being the dues of extract."

Mr Craig presented a note of suspension of the charge. He averred,—(Stat. 5) " . . . The deceased A. R. Hogg at his death had, among other assets, a sum of £2026, 8s. 9d. owing to him, secured, subject to prior bonds, over certain heritable properties in Edinburgh which had belonged to a Mr Baird. The judicial factor has endeavoured to realise these properties, so as to yield a surplus to the factory estate, but so far without success. It is the failure to realise this outstanding asset which prevents the creditors being settled with. The complainer never concealed the circumstances of the factory estate from the respondent, who, before he raised the said action, was well aware thereof, or at all events he could have ascertained the real position of the factory estate without the slightest difficulty."

The respondent answered,—(Ans. 5) "Explained that throughout the litigation in which the said expenses were incurred the complainer was aware (1) that the factory estate, after paying preferable debts, would not exceed in value the sum of £250; (2) that the unsecured debts of the deceased amounted to £3000 or thereby; (3) that the respondent's claim was for a ranking, and that the dividend payable to the respondent could not exceed £10 or thereby. Although fully aware of these facts, the suspender carefully concealed them from the respondent throughout the litigation. He was frequently called upon but always refused to give the respondent any information as to the estate of the deceased. . . . In the circumstances it was improper for the complainer to embark in a litigation involving expenses on both sides of nearly £400, he well knowing that the sum at stake was only about £10, and his doing so was wilfully reckless, or at least reckless."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) In respect the decree founded upon does not warrant personal diligence against the complainer, he is entitled to suspension. (2) The complainer being liable only as judicial factor, the charge, in so far as directed against him personally, ought to be suspended. (3) The complainer, as judicial factor, having been called upon to defend the estate under his administration, and litigated in bona fide, the respondent is not entitled to compel him to pay out of his own funds the expenses found due.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The charge complained of being authorised by the said decree as the warrant thereof, the note should be refused. (3) The suspender, having been all along aware that the estate under his charge was insolvent and unable to pay the expenses, the ordinary and proper decree, when it is not intended to make the factor personally liable, is simply against him in the capacity in which he is sued. Mr Craig's object is of course to avoid the risk of being compelled in any circumstances to pay the expenses, or any part of them, out of his own funds. I do not think that that is a matter which I can deal with at present beyond expressing my opinion that Mr Craig was without doubt justified in defending the action."

No. 2. pursuer anything but a nominal dividend on his claim, and having insisted in the defence of said action in the knowledge of said facts which, though frequently called on to disclose the extent and circumstances of the estate under his charge, he concealed from the respondent, was not litigating in bona fide, and is personally liable to the respondent for the expenses of such litigation.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

On 10th January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the prayer of the note of suspension.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The question is, whether a judicial factor who has no factorial funds is liable for the expenses of a litigation which have been awarded against him only as judicial factor?

"The general rule, which received its latest recognition in the case of White v. Steel, 21 R. 649, is, that a person put to the expense of vindicating his rights, is entitled to recover that expense from the party by whose opposition it was incurred.

"That rule has been applied in the case of testamentary trustees, of a trustee in bankruptcy, and of a liquidator appointed by the Court under the Companies Acts, and the question is, whether it also applies in the case of a judicial factor or curator bonis?

"There are, I think, only two cases in which the liability of a judicial factor or curator bonis, who has no estate in his hands, for expenses, has been considered, namely, Forbes v. Morrison, 7 D. 853, and Ferguson v. Murray, 16 D. 260.

"In the former case Peter Morrison brought an action of reduction of certain deeds which he had granted on the ground that they had been obtained from him by the fraud of the defenders. After issues had been adjusted for the trial of the cause Morrison became insane, and Forbes having been appointed his curator bonis sisted himself as a party to the action, and carried on the litigation, which ended in a verdict for the defenders. In consequence of the verdict the Court assoilzied the defenders and found 'the pursuer liable to the defenders in the expenses incurred by them in this action.'

"Forbes made payment of the expenses to the extent of the funds of his ward, but a balance remained unpaid and the defenders threatened personal diligence. Forbes accordingly brought a suspension, and the Court held that he was not liable for the balance of the expenses.

"The Lord Ordinary (Cunninghame) seems to have been of opinion that where expenses have been awarded against a curator bonis only in his curatorial capacity, he is in no case liable beyond the amount of the estate in his hands.

"The First Division affirmed Lord Cunninghame's interlocutor, but they appear to me to have proceeded entirely upon the special circumstances of the case. The action had been commenced by the ward before the curator's appointment; if the ward had not become insane, the defenders would have had no security for the expenses beyond his estate; and there was no ground for treating the appointment of a curator bonis as giving the defenders additional security, or a cautioner for the expenses.

"The learned Judges, however, recognised that there might be cases in which a curator bonis would be personally liable for expenses, Lord Mackenzie instancing the case of a curator who knew that there were no funds out of which expenses could be paid.

"In the case of Ferguson v. Murray, a judicial factor who had unsuccessfully defended an action brought against him in that capacity was found by the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor dated 14th June 1853, 'liable in expenses since the date of lodging the defences.' Upon the enrolment of the case for approval of the Auditor's report and decree, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor,—' Finds that the defender Murray has not by the defences maintained by him in this cause, or by his general conduct in

The complainer reclaimed, and after hearing parties the Court appointed the case to be argued before them and three Judges of the First Division.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

Argued for the complainer;—The general rule that the unsuccessful party must pay the expenses of an action rendered necessary by his opposition to a just claim¹ did not apply. (1) The complainer was called merely as judicial factor, and a judicial factor was not personally liable for expenses if he had no factorial estate in his hands with which to pay them.² This proposition was founded upon considerations of reason and justice. A judicial factor differed from a testamentary trustee or a trustee in bankruptcy (in which cases it was admitted there was personal liability for expenses), in this respect, that he lacked the power they possessed of consulting those who were interested in the estate either as beneficiaries or creditors. There were, moreover, special circumstances in the present case which rendered the general rule as to expenses inapplicable. The judicial factor had acted reasonably, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, in defending the action.³ He was a defender, not a pur-

the litigation, subjected himself personally liable in expenses: Approves the Auditor's report upon the pursuer's account of expenses; and in terms thereof decerns in his favour for the sum of £34, 4s. 8d. sterling.'

"Upon a reclaiming note, the First Division pronounced the following interlocutor:—'In respect that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of date the 14th June 1853, in so far as it finds the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses since the date of lodging the defences, did not subject the defender in said expenses personally or at all otherwise than as concluded for in the summons, that is to say, in his judicial capacity as judicial factor or curator bonis, and so as to have effect primarily against the curatorial estate, the defender being individually answerable only to make such estate forthcoming, or failing thereof, to supply any deficiency prima instantia from his own funds, he having always relief against the estate: Find that the interlocutor now submitted to review, if intended to go further than said is, was both incompetent and erroneous, and if not intended to go further was unnecessary.'

"That interlocutor is not very happily expressed, but as I read it, it means that if a decree for expenses has been pronounced against a person as judicial factor, and he has no factorial estate in his hands, he must pay the expenses out of his own pocket and take his chance of operating his relief against any estate which he may afterwards recover. If that is a sound construction of the interlocutor, then it was practically a judgment upon the question which I am now considering.

"Even if the case of Ferguson is not to be regarded as an authority upon the question, I do not think that there is any sufficient ground for holding that a judicial factor is in no case subject to the general rule, that a person who causes expense to another in establishing a right is liable for the expense.

"A judicial factor, although he is an officer of the Court, does not, except in cases requiring special powers, act under the direct authority of ¹ White v. Steel, March 10, 1894, 21 R. 649.

² Ferguson v. Murray, Dec. 20, 1853, 16 D. 260, 26 Scot. Jur. 116; Forbes v. Morrison, June 10, 1845, 7 D. 853, 17 Scot. Jur. 443; Drummond (Carse's Factor) v. Carse's Executors, Jan. 27, 1881, 8 R. 449; Young v. Nith Commissioners, July 6, 1876, 3 R. 991, and June 10, 1880, 7 R. 891.

³ Law v. Humphrey, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1192, per Lord President (Ingles), 1194.

No. 2. *suer.*¹ The action was raised after the death of his principal. The estate, though valueless now, might some day improve, and the whole sum ultimately be recovered. A large sum had been sought in the action, and a small one obtained. But (2) in any view, while the conclusions of the summons might have been framed against the complainer either (1) personally or (2) qua judicial factor, or (3) qua judicial factor and personally, the summons had been limited to a conclusion against him "qua judicial factor." The Lord Ordinary had accordingly pronounced decree against him in these terms, and must be held to have decided in the original process whether in the circumstances the complainer should or should not be held personally liable. Now, properly construed, the decree imported that the complainer's liability was limited to the amount of the factorial estate in his hands.² The words were distinct and intelligible words of limitation, restricting the decree to one against him in his representative capacity. Where it was intended that in the event of the factory estate proving insufficient the factor should be personally liable to the Court. He can make contracts in reference to the factorial estate, and he is personally liable to perform such contracts, and in suing or defending actions he acts on his own responsibility, and it is he, and not any party whom he represents, who is the litigant.

"No doubt there may be (as in the case of Forbes v. Morrison) special circumstances which render the general rule as to liability for expenses inapplicable. But here I do not think that there are any such special circumstances. The respondent made a claim, which proved to be well founded, to a substantial extent, against the factorial estate, but the expense which he incurred in establishing that claim was entirely caused by the complainer's opposition. The complainer, upon the other hand, had no funds whatever to meet the claim if it was established, or to pay expenses if his defence should be unsuccessful. In these circumstances I think that the complainer must pay the expenses just as trustees or an official liquidator would be compelled to do under similar circumstances, because, to use the words of Lord M'Laren,³ 'expenses are not awarded as in the nature of penalty, but as compensation to the successful party for the cost to which he has been put in establishing a right which his opponents ought to have known to be well founded.'

"The complainer argued that to refuse the note would be to find him personally liable in expenses, and that it was incompetent to do so except in the action in which expenses were awarded. I do not regard the question raised here as properly one of personal liability. When a trustee or other person litigating in a representative capacity is found liable personally in expenses, that means that he is liable without any right of relief against the trust-estate or the person whom he represents. Here the complainer was not found personally liable in expenses, and his right of relief against any estate which he may recover remains entire. For the reasons, however, which I have stated, I do not think that the fact that there is no factorial estate is a good answer to the respondent's claim for the expenses to which he has been put, by reason of the complainer's opposition, in establishing his rights."

¹ Lawrie v. Pearson, Nov. 9, 1888, 16 R. 62.

² Gordon v. Campbell, June 13, 1842, 1 Bell's App. 428, approved in Muir v. City of Glasgow Bank, April 7, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 21, per Lord Chancellor (Cairns), p. 26; Dickson v. Bonar's Trustees, Nov. 20, 1829, 8 S. 99, 2 Scot. Jur. 40; Kirkland v. Gibson, Dec. 20, 1831, 10 S. 168; Kirkland v. Crichton, Feb. 3, 1842, 4 D. 613, 14 Scot. Jur. 239; Forbes v. Morrison, June 10, 1845, 7 D. 853; M'Laren on Wills and Succession, 3d ed. pp. 1242-3.

³ M'Laren on Wills, 3d ed. 1245.

make good the deficiency, it should be expressly stated in the decree.¹ No. 2.
*Gordon's case*² was subsequent in date to the cases of Gibson v. Pearson,³ and Scott v. Patison,⁴ relied upon by the respondent.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

Argued for the respondent;—The general rule enunciated in *White v. Steel*⁵ had been given effect to in the case of testamentary trustees⁶ sued as such, and they were bound to pay the expenses whether they held trust funds in their hands or not. It also applied to a trustee in bankruptcy⁷ in reference to an action concerning the sequestrated estate, and it had been held that it was not a relevant answer to a charge for expenses for him to say that he had no funds belonging to the estate.⁸ The rule also applied to a liquidator appointed by the Court under the Companies Acts.⁹ There was no reason why it should not be given effect to in the case of a judicial factor who had litigated unsuccessfully, and had no factorial estate in his hands. The distinction, as regarded liability for expenses, between a judicial factor and a trustee in bankruptcy, alleged to consist in the latter's power to consult the creditors interested in the estate, did not exist; for a judicial factor could equally do this, and he was moreover paid for his services. The fact that the complainer was called and defended the action as judicial factor instead of electing to pursue the action, made no difference in his liability for expenses. The case of *Ferguson v. Murray*¹⁰ relied on by the complainer was really an authority for the respondent. The judgment might be somewhat obscurely expressed, but it had been construed by Lord Low in the present case and by Lord Kincairney in the case of *White v. Steel*¹¹ as importing personal liability by the judicial factor for the expenses decerned against him as such. The case of *Forbes v. Morrison*¹² was decided to a large extent on specialties. (2) The Lord Ordinary in pronouncing the decree for expenses against the complainer "as judicial factor" could not have intended to limit the complainer's liability for them to the extent of the factorial funds in his hands, because he had expressly refused to limit his interlocutor so as to find the pursuer entitled to expenses "only out of the estate." But further, the decree as it stood did not exclude personal diligence against him. The words "qua judicial factor" were words descriptive of the character in which the complainer was sued, and they did not limit his obligation to pay the expenses in an action which he had chosen to defend.¹³

¹ Kay v. Wilson's Trustees, March 6, 1850, 12 D. 845, 22 Scot. Jur. 363; Davidson's Trustee v. Carr, June 21, 1850, 12 D. 1069, 22 Scot. Jur. 469.

² Gordon v. Campbell, June 13, 1842, 1 Bell's App. 428.

³ Gibson v. Pearson, May 25, 1833, 11 S. 656, 5 Scot. Jur. 387.

⁴ Scott v. Patison, Dec. 21, 1826, 5 S. 172.

⁵ White v. Steel, 21 R. 649; Kirkpatrick v. Irvine or Douglas, Jan. 18, 1848, 10 D. 367, per Lord Jeffrey, 369.

⁶ M'Laren on Wills and Succession, 3d ed. vol. ii. 1243; Robertson v. Morrison, Dec. 4, 1823, 2 S. 479.

⁷ Torbet v. Borthwick, Feb. 23, 1849, 11 D. 694, 21 Scot. Jur. 231.

⁸ Cowie v. Muirden, July 20, 1893, 20 R. (H. L.) 81.

⁹ Liquidator of the Consolidated Copper Co. of Canada v. Peddie, Dec. 22, 1877, 5 R. 393; Ferrao's case, 1874, L. R., 9 Ch. App. 355.

¹⁰ Ferguson v. Murray, 16 D. 260.

¹¹ White v. Steel, March 10, 1894, 21 R. 649, per Lord Kincairney, p. 650.

¹² Forbes v. Morrison, 7 D. 853.

¹³ Scott v. Patison, Dec. 21, 1826, 5 S. 172.

No. 2. At advising,—

Oct. 17, 1896. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When this case came before a bench of three Judges in this Division, there was a difference of opinion, and we thought the question so important that it was desirable it should be heard before a larger Bench, and I am glad that this course was taken in view of what I understand will be the decision of a considerable majority of the Bench which has heard the case of new.

The Lord Ordinary in the action in reference to which this suspension is brought was asked by the defender to limit the finding in favour of the pursuer for expenses to expenses “out of the estate, or only as an ordinary creditor.” This the Lord Ordinary refused to do. And the finding as to expenses is,—“Finds the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, liable in expenses to the pursuer.”

It is contended on behalf of the complainer in this suspension that this finding is equivalent to a finding such as was asked from the Lord Ordinary and refused by him. He further maintains that having been called, and having appeared as judicial factor, he is not liable to do more than make the funds in his hands forthcoming, and that if these will not meet the expenses he has caused to the pursuer, the pursuer must suffer the loss.

If these contentions are to receive effect, it must be upon the ground that there is a difference between the case of a judicial factor and other litigants who engage in litigation by either suing or defending as in a fiduciary character, such as testamentary trustees, or trustees in bankruptcy, or official liquidators. If such litigants must make good to a successful opponent the expense he has incurred in litigation, and cannot plead that the fund they hold is exhausted as a ground for resisting payment, is there any ground for holding the position of a judicial factor to be different? It is only different from the case of voluntary trustees in this particular, that he is paid for his services, but in what is his position different from that of trustee voluntary or official, or liquidator, as regards his opponent in the litigation? There are cases which might be held exceptional, such as a curator bonis to one insane, who cannot obtain any aid by opinion or guarantee from his ward. It seems in one case to have been so held. I take leave to doubt whether the exception so made is sound in principle, but it is certainly not the same case as the present, where the factor was truly acting for parties quite able to advise and support him, just as those behind trustees, or behind a trustee in bankruptcy, or a liquidator, may do.

If this question were to be decided on principle, I should decide it as the Lord Ordinary has done. But I hold that there is authority for so deciding it in the case of Ferguson v. Murray.¹ I have not, after repeated consideration—knowing that a different view is taken—been able to come to any other conclusion than that the decision in that case established that a judicial factor found liable in expenses must make them good to his opponents by supplying any deficiency of the funds of the factory out of his own funds, he having relief against the estate, if from the condition of that estate he can obtain it.

But it is said that the Lord Ordinary by his finding the defender liable

"as judicial factor," limited his liability to the funds in his hands. This does not appear to me to be a sound reading of his interlocutor. It has been decided in express terms that a judgment finding a trustee litigant liable in expenses "qua trustee" is enforceable to the effect of making him pay the expenses, and I am unable to understand how the exactly corresponding words in the case of a judicial factor should not be read as applicable to the case of the factor in the same way. No cases were cited to the Court shewing that in practice such words have been so construed,—differently from what is done where similar words are used in the case of trustees.

No. 2.
Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

It is true that the Lord Ordinary, who refused to frame his interlocutor so as to limit the pursuer's claim for expenses to the funds in the factor's hands, states that the factor was "justified in defending the action," but if that had been intended as meaning anything more than that as regards the estate he represented he committed no blameworthy wrong in defending the action, then it would, I think, be a contradiction of the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the cause, which held that the defender was in the wrong in the litigation, and that decree must be given in terms of the summons.

I have stated thus shortly why, contrary, I believe, to the opinion of the large majority of your Lordships, I am in favour of affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I have abstained from going more at length into the question, because I have had an opportunity of reading an opinion prepared by Lord Trayner, in which I desire to express my entire concurrence.

LORD YOUNG.—After this case was argued and taken to avizandum in the Second Division, the Judges thought it raised a question of general interest and importance which it was fitting should be decided by a full bench. It regards the liability of a judicial factor on the estate of a deceased owner for a sum of expenses of process for which he has been found liable "as judicial factor" in an action against him in that capacity by a creditor of the deceased.

The respondent holds decree against the complainer for a debt of £159, 6s. 8d., and also for a sum of £179, 6s. 11d., of expenses of process "as judicial factor" on the estate of the deceased debtor.

With respect to the debt, the respondent admits that the complainer is under no other obligation to him than to treat him as a just creditor and claimant to the amount of it on the factorial estate. But with respect to the expenses of process, he contends that the complainer's obligation is not thus limited, but that by force of the decree he is personally bound to him as debtor therefor, or as cautioner and surety for the sufficiency of the factorial estate to meet them in full.

The complainer disputes this contention, and maintains that as regards his obligation or duty to the respondent, there is no distinction between the debt and the expenses of process.

Proceeding on the view which he takes of his right, the respondent charged the complainer personally on the decree for expenses in order to do diligence for the attachment of his private property, and the question before us arises in a suspension of the charge.

The decree, on which alone any liability of the complainer to the respondent stands, makes no distinction between the debt and the expenses of process, declaring in terms that his liability for both and each is "as judicial factor." I am unable to regard these words as superfluous and unmeaning, or otherwise than as distinct and intelligible words of limitation, operating alike on the liability for the debt and for the expenses. Now, what is that limitation? I have characterised it as, in my opinion, distinct and intelligible, thinking it clearly imports that the complainer is not by the decree thus qualified made the respondent's debtor, or the respondent his creditor for the sums specified, but is only ordered to treat the respondent as having a good claim on the factorial estate for these sums.

No. 2.
Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

It is, I think, not doubtful that a judicial factor, although sued and concluded against only as such, may competently be found liable and decerned against in such manner as to subject him personally in immediate and direct liability, at least for expenses of process, so that diligence therefor may be done against his private property, and all that I mean by what I have already said is that this is not done by finding him liable and decerning against him "as judicial factor."

It was contended on the part of the respondent that a judicial factor sued as such by a claimant on the estate committed to his charge, and defending the action, is in the same position with respect to liability for costs as a party defending an action directed against himself personally—that costs ought in both cases alike to follow the result, and with the personal liability therefor of the losing party.

I think this contention is based on a misapprehension. It is true that costs as a rule follow the result in this sense—that they are not given or withheld only according as the Court is of opinion or not that the unsuccessful action (or defence) was reasonable and therefore excusable although unsuccessful. In this, the only reasonable sense of the rule, it is applicable to an action properly brought to establish a claim against a factorial estate so that the successful pursuer of such action will, unless under exceptional circumstances, have decree against his debtor (the factorial estate) not only for the debt which he has established, but also for costs, although the Court should be of opinion that the defence by the factor officially representing the estate was "without doubt" reasonable. The rule in this sense—and I can take it in no other—was acted on in the respondent's favour when in his action he got decree for his costs in the same terms as for his debt, although the Court was of opinion that the defence "was without doubt justified." But the question regarding the factor's liability, the only question of importance here, involves quite other considerations. Irrespective of the decree, the relation of debtor and creditor does not, and never did, exist between the complainer and respondent, and by the decree the complainer is made debtor in no other sense or capacity for the costs than for the debt found to have been due by the deceased owner of the factorial estate.

The respondent had no living debtor when he raised his action, and has none now unless the decree creates one, which I think it clearly does not. His only debtor died in 1890, and no representative of his with a passive title—that is to say, liable for his debts—exists, or ever existed. A judicial factor has no passive title to make him debtor to the creditors on the factorial estate, and when an action is brought against him as such it is to establish an alleged debt not against him but against the estate. It is not doubtful that the debtor for costs awarded to a successful claimant on the estate is the estate itself, which must accordingly be administered by the factor with a view to meet them as a proper claim upon it. It would be absurd to contend that under such a decree as we have here to deal with the estate is not liable, and that the successful pursuer can only claim the costs from the individual factor who unsuccessfully defended the action. The personal liability sought to be imposed on the factor is therefore in truth that of a cautioner or surety for the sufficiency of the estate. That such liability may be imposed must, I think, be admitted when the Court is of opinion that the factor has been guilty of some misconduct—some violation or neglect of duty which warrants it. But the idea of this Court putting such cautionary obligation on its own officer, who has only done his duty, without violating or neglecting it in any respect, is, I think, abhorrent to reason and justice.

A judicial factor on the estate of a person deceased is, as I have already said, not debtor to that person's creditors, owes them nothing, and is under no duty to them, except an honest and intelligent performance of the duties of his office. These duties he owes to all without distinction who are interested in the factorial estate. It may be, or not, according to his duty to resist individual claims on the estate, and to require that they shall be judicially established before he admits them. If he fails in this duty, violates, or falls short of it, by resisting any claim which he ought in the due discharge of his duty to have admitted, or by admitting and satisfying any claim which it was his duty to resist, he may incur personal responsibility and consequent liability to any sufferers or sufferer by his misconduct. Whether by resisting any particular claim—that is to say, defending an action brought to establish it—he has acted according to his duty or in violation of it, is a question to be determined in the action itself, and the determination of it unfavourably to the judicial factor may lead to his being subjected to personal liability for the costs thereby occasioned to the claimant. But the proposition that a judicial factor cannot in the due and proper discharge of his duty defend an action without incurring the risk of such personal liability, and being actually subjected to it if the pursuer establishes his claim, is one which I must reject.

I can pay no attention to the imputations of the respondent in his answer 5, because it is, I think, the reasonable and settled rule that any misconduct or breach of duty by a judicial factor warranting the imposition of personal liability for costs must be found by the Court in the action in which the costs are awarded, while in that action here the Court (Lord Low) not merely found nothing amiss in the factor's conduct, but distinctly expressed the opinion that "he was without doubt justified in defending the action"; and I may here remark, that if the complainer "was without doubt justified in defending the action," he was "without doubt" entitled to pay his own expenses out of the estate, though the consequence might be to leave nothing to pay the debt for which the respondent holds decree. To say that he is nevertheless personally bound as

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

No. 2. cautioner for the costs given to the respondent by the same decree and in the same terms seems extravagant.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

It was suggested and urged in argument that while on the one hand justice to the successful pursuer to whom costs are awarded requires that the judicial factor shall pay them as cautioner for the estate, on the other no injustice is thereby done to the factor, because he always may, and in prudence ought to, protect himself against the consequences of such cautionary liability by consulting those who are beneficially interested in the estate, and procuring their obligation to protect him against the consequences before taking the position of defender in the action.

I am altogether adverse to this view. In the first place, the pursuer's debtor, and only debtor, is the factorial estate, which in his interest, and that of all others having claims on it, has been placed under judicial management. The judicial manager is in no sense whatever his debtor, and in the action is not called as his debtor, but only as manager and administrator of the estate which is. It is hardly worth saying that a successful pursuer thinks it hard when he finds that his debtor is unable to pay his debt and costs. The case is familiar enough, and the law certainly does not protect any pursuer against it by giving him a cautioner for his debtor's ability to pay. In the second place, I cannot countenance the notion that a judicial factor who is honestly and on reasonable grounds of opinion that it is according to his duty to resist a claim on the estate unless it shall be established to the satisfaction of the Court whose officer he is, ought, before defending an action brought to establish it, to consult those interested in the estate, and obtain their approval and also pecuniary obligations from them for his protection. I must say that I think such a proceeding is of questionable propriety, but apart from that, it is one which in many, I should think in most cases, is impracticable. Further, regarding this suggestion of the possibility of obtaining an obligation of indemnity as an answer to the argument based on the manifest injustice of putting a cautionary obligation on an unoffending judicial factor, I am not influenced by it. For why should an unoffending factor, who is honestly and intelligently doing his duty, be put to look out for and take obligations of indemnity against risk? And what is the character of the obligations which it is thought he may get, and ought for his safety to take, before acting according to what he rightly believes to be his duty? Is it a written bond of caution for expenses of process to be substituted for the liability which ex hypothesi the law imposes on himself, and which his opponent in the action must be content with? or a bond of relief, on receiving which he must be content to take the risks, or otherwise decline to perform what he believes to be his duty?

Small at the best, and possibly uncertain as the estate committed to the factor here was, we must assume that this Court was judicially satisfied that it was such an estate, and that the interests in it were such, as to make it proper that it should be committed to the charge of a judicial factor, with the duty of managing and administering it as should in his judgment be best in the interests of all concerned; and we must further assume that the person appointed to the office was so appointed only after the Court was satisfied of his fitness. We may now have a petty case to deal with, but in considering a general question we must disregard that detail. A factorial estate may be of any value, and of any degree of certainty or uncertainty of realisation, having regard to its character and investments. Further, the interests in it and the claims upon it may be of any character and of any extent. Now, the factor is charged with the care and protection of the estate in the interests of all alike, and a very conspicuous part of his duty, in the common interest, is to protect the estate against claims which are not established to his satisfaction, and the establishment of which may cause expense to the claimants or the estate. This duty involves the exercise of judgment, and I should have thought it clear, on the one hand, that he is bound to exercise his judgment honestly and intelligently, and on the other, that no more can be required of him. It is in the common interest that he shall exercise it without favour and also without fear. Now, consider the position in which he would be placed, and the risk to which the interests placed in his charge would be exposed if the law were that if he resisted any claim, although of a character which he was "without doubt warranted" in resisting, he must become personally cautioner to the claimant for the expenses of process. I think this is not a position in which anyone ought to be placed who is required to exercise a disinterested judgment, for it is a position which gives him an obvious personal interest and bias in one direction.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

The case may be rare—I hope it is—when an estate which this Court has thought fit to commit to a judicial factor turns out to be so worthless as that here in question seems likely to do, but we must, as I have said, deal with the question before us and the considerations of reason, justice, and expediency bearing on it, as they may occur in any reasonably supposable case. Now, an apparently large factorial estate may be wholly lost without any fault on the part of the factor, as by sudden failure of securities, or the success of a claimant on an outside title to what had long been regarded as part of the estate. To put the judicial factor in the position of cautioner for the estate's sufficiency to pay costs, possibly of large amount, may therefore be a very serious matter indeed. A proper litigant must undoubtedly take the risk of the law's uncertainty, or rather perhaps the uncertainty of Judges and judgments. But to put such risk on a judicial factor with respect to the ultimate result in the law Courts—it may be in the Court of last resort—and with much and reasonable difference of opinion, on a question in the decision of which he has no interest whatever, but only a duty to see that it is regularly and properly tried, is a quite different thing.

If any claimant on a factorial estate who brings an action against it—for such action must, as I have said, be regarded as brought against the estate, the pursuer having certainly no other debtor—ought to be dealt with so exceptionally from other pursuers, that caution for expenses must be given as the condition of a defence being allowed, it is difficult to see why he should be bound to take the caution of the judicial factor. But why he should have any caution I cannot conceive. He gives none himself, and no other pursuer or defender does, but takes the risk of his debtor being able to pay what may be found owing and decerned for.

I have specially dealt only with the case of a judicial factor defending an action brought against him as such, and which resulted in a decree in the terms of that before us, and certainly the case is the strongest for the application of the views which I have expressed. At the same time I think it right to say that my opinion extends to the case of a judicial factor who in the due performance of his duty makes a claim on behalf of the estate and raises action to establish it. I see no reason why the pursuer (the estate) should find caution for expenses, or why the obligation of a cautioner should be put on the factor as a condition of his performing his duty, which is, I assume, to institute and pursue the action.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

I also think it right to say that the considerations, with their result, which I have expressed and endeavoured to illustrate, apply, or may apply (for there may be exceptional cases), to trustees including executors, and generally to anyone holding an office involving duties to others whose common interests the law has placed in his charge, and involving no interest on his own part except the faithful and intelligent performance of these duties.

I stated in the outset of these observations that the qualifying and limiting words "as judicial factor" in the decree against the complainer are, in my opinion, inconsistent with the personal liability which the respondent contends for, and this opinion, if sound, is enough for the decision of the case. It was suggested in the argument for the respondent that Lord Low, who pronounced the decree, must have intended personal liability, seeing that he has refused this suspension to resist it. But I think it clear enough from his Lordship's notes that he had no intention of imputing misconduct to the complainer, and, on the contrary, was judicially satisfied that he had acted according to his duty, although he was nevertheless of opinion, in point of law, that personal liability attached to him. I have stated fully my reasons for differing from this opinion. Had there been grounds for thinking that his Lordship meant to impose personal liability because of any misconduct which would warrant it, I should not merely have regretted the inaccurate (in that view) language of the decree, but felt disposed if possible to overcome it.

It is important that there should be no doubt as to the meaning and effect of these qualifying and limiting words "as judicial factor," or "as trustee" or "as executor," or as to the grounds on which they ought to be used or avoided, and others importing personal liability employed. This must be my excuse for entering so fully into the subject, and was indeed the reason which induced the Second Division to refer the case to a full Bench.

With respect to the authorities to which we were referred, I have to say, first, that I am unable to accept the decision in *Gibson*¹ as an authority. It has never since been followed, and the practice of the Court, so far as my experience goes, has been at variance with it. Second, I think the decision and the opinions expressed in *Forbes v. Morrison*² are in accord with the views which I entertain and have expressed. Third, I think the case of *Ferguson v. Murray*³ is not in point. Fourth, the most recent case—Laird v. Humphrey,⁴ and the opinion of the Lord President, concurred in by all the Judges, are entirely in accord with the views which I hold. Fifth, in the English case—in *re Bolton & Company, Salisbury-Jones, and Dale's*⁵ case, which was not cited to us, the Court proceeded on the same view adverse to the personal liability of a trustee who has been guilty of no misconduct or failure in duty.

¹ 11 S. 656.⁴ 3 R. 1192.² 7 D. 853.⁵ L. R. [1895], 1 Ch. 333.³ 16 D. 260.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

LORD ADAM.—I think it is clear that all questions of expenses as between the parties to an action must be determined in the action in which they are incurred. I think it is quite incompetent to inquire in this case whether, or in what capacity, the complainer should have been liable in expenses in the original action.

It appears to me therefore that the only question we can competently consider in this suspension is, What has the Lord Ordinary decided as to expenses in that action? And in that matter the interlocutor or decree must speak for itself. We cannot go to the Lord Ordinary's opinion to see what meaning he intended that the interlocutor should have. Third parties,—messengers-at-arms, for example, or arresters and others interested—have no access to such sources of information, and the interlocutor must have effect according to its legal meaning and construction, whatever that may be.

Now, the Lord Ordinary has in the original action ordained the complainer, as judicial factor, to make payment to the respondent of a principal sum of £159, 6s. 8d., with interest, and has found him "as judicial factor foresaid" liable in expenses to the respondent.

The question is, whether by the finding, expressed in the terms used, the complainer is bound to make payment of these expenses personally, out of his own pocket, or only out of the factory estate?

Now, as I have stated above, the complainer has been ordained to pay a principal sum of £159, 6s. 8d. as judicial factor. I have not heard the respondent or anybody else suggest that the complainer is personally liable to pay that sum, or that the words do not aptly express the intention of limiting liability to the factorial estate.

I can only say that throughout my long experience I have always understood that the words "as judicial factor" or "qua judicial factor" when used as here were intended to limit liability to the factorial estate, and I have always so used them. But if that is their undisputed meaning when used in this interlocutor in connection with the principal sum, how can it be maintained that they are not to have the same meaning when used in connection with the finding as to expenses? I cannot read the interlocutor as if no such words were in it, or as if it found the judicial factor personally liable. To my mind the construction of the interlocutor is clear, and it imposes on the complainer no personal liability for expenses.

I do not think that we have to consider what would be the effect as regards liability for expenses of an interlocutor finding the defender liable in expenses without qualification, or whether as regards such liability judicial factors or other officers of Court are in a different position from trustees in bankruptcy. But as the question has been argued to us, I may say that I concur with Lord Young on that matter.

I think that, if it is intended that such officers are to be personally liable in expenses to the opposing litigant, it should be expressly so found.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is wrong.

Y. 1. The question—The question was asked at the last hearing of the case—whether the trustee is liable for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property. The question is the question of the trustee's liability for expenses incurred in his representative capacity.

As to the first question I shall say very little. I hold it to be wrong to state as a general rule that a trustee is liable for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property. It is a question of fact whether the trustee is liable for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property. But this is not in dispute. One case has been cited in the case of Langdon v. The Bank of England, where the trustee is liable for the expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property. Now, in all cases where the trustee is a trustee in a bank, I should be disposed, in considering the trustee's liability for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property, to consider the trustee's liability for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property, but where the trustee is a trustee in a bank, I should be disposed, in considering the trustee's liability for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property, to consider the trustee's liability for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property.

I have said that the question is one of trustee liability, because it is a question of fact whether a trustee is liable for all practical purposes a trustee. It is a question of fact whether the reason for appointing a trustee is that he is a trustee under a will or a new trustee, and the trustee is liable for the expenses incurred under judicial supervision, while the trustee is a trustee under a will or a new trustee. But now that the trustee is a trustee under a will or a new trustee, the trustee is seen to be a trustee under a will or a new trustee, and the trustee has the power to appoint a trustee under a will or a new trustee, and the trustee is liable for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property.

The next question I take on the second question would (if I were a judge) make it necessary to consider the first. I think that the question whether a trustee is liable for expenses incurred in the action at law for the recovery of the trust property, is a question that ought always to be decided in the original action. If the decree is simply against the "pursuer" or the "defender," I should understand this as meaning that the defendant decreed against must pay the expenses, reserving his claim to be indemnified out of the trust-estate, a claim which of course cannot be determined one way or the other in an action to which beneficiaries are not parties. In the present case the interlocutor in the original action, which is the warrant of the decree, ordains Mr Craig, "as judicial factor of Archibald Robert Hogg," to make payment to the pursuer of £159, 6s. 8d., with interest, and also finds the defender, "as judicial factor foresaid," liable in expenses to the pursuer. It is not disputed that the decerniture for principal and interest due under the account sued for is a decerniture against Mr Craig in his representative capacity; and it follows, in my opinion, that an award of expenses, qualified in identical terms, must be read subject to the same limitation.

In so reading the decree we are not, as I conceive, laying down new law. So long ago as 1842 the meaning of an obligation undertaken by obligants

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

"as trustees" was determined by the House of Lords. I refer to the case of Gordon v. Campbell.¹ This case arose out of a charge given on letters of horning to enforce payment of principal and interest under a bond granted by the suspenders "as trustees." The chargers had intimated their intention of following out the charge by a caption, and a suspension was brought on the ground that the suspender was not in the possession of trust funds to meet the claim. The Lord Ordinary, Lord Moncreiff, found "that there was no legal warrant in the heritable bond and disposition on which the letters of horning were issued for charging the suspender as on personal diligence for payment of the debt in question as due by him personally and individually," and therefore suspended the charge. To this interlocutor the Lords of the Second Division adhered, and their judgment was affirmed on appeal. This decision has been accepted and acted on as the charter of limited liability for trustees and representative persons in all cases where the parties to a contract are free to contract on such terms. In his judgment in *Muir's*² case the case is examined by Lord Cairns and approved, and his Lordship went so far as to say that in such a case, where there is authority to accept a contract so limited, "the words used could have no meaning and could be referred to no object other than that of limiting responsibility."

I think it would be unfortunate if it should be held that an obligation constituted by decree in language which ex facie imports a limited responsibility has a different meaning from that which has been attached to the same words when used in a voluntary deed of obligation, and I see no reason for the suggested distinction. I think that as the chargers state their intention of using the charge so as to affect the private estate of the judicial factor, the charge ought to be suspended.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the opinion of Lord Young, both (1) as to the construction and effect of such an interlocutor as that pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, and (2) on the general principle which ought to guide the Court in deciding whether a judicial factor should be liable personally or in his factorial capacity. My reasons for doing so have been stated so fully and so clearly by his Lordship that I do not think I would be justified in occupying the time of the Court by repeating them.

LORD TRAYNER.—The general rule of our practice is that an unsuccessful litigant is found liable in the expenses of the action in which he has unsuccessfully maintained a claim or a defence. I say either claim or defence, because in my opinion it makes no difference in the question of liability for expenses whether the unsuccessful party has voluntarily come into Court to pursue a claim which he has not been able to establish, or has been called into Court and stated a defence which has been repelled. If the general rule, as I have stated it, is applied in the case before us, the suspender (defender in the action in which expenses were decerned for) is bound to pay these expenses, and his suspension of the decree against him should be refused.

But the suspender maintains that the general rule is not applicable to his

¹ 1 Bell's App. 428.

² Muir v. City of Glasgow Bank, April 7, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 21.

No. 2. case (1) because he was called and appeared in his character of judicial factor merely, and that a judicial factor is not liable for expenses if he has no factorial funds in his hands; and (2) because in any view the terms of the decree pronounced against him—being against him qua judicial factor—limit his liability to the amount of the factorial estate in his hands.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

10 On the first point my opinion is adverse to the contention of the suspender. That he was called to the action and defended it as judicial factor does not, in my opinion, hinder in the least the application of the general rule as to liability for expenses, and I think there is neither authority nor principle for giving effect to the exception for which the suspender contends. Called to the action as judicial factor, he appears in it in his official capacity—that is, a representative capacity—he represents the factorial estate. Does that fact relieve him from liability for expenses? If it does, then a judicial factor is more favoured than other litigants who appear as representatives of interests other than their own. Testamentary trustees suing or being sued as such in matters connected with the trust-estate under their care are liable in expenses to their successful opponent, and must pay such expenses whether they have trust funds in their hands or not. So also, a trustee in bankruptcy, suing or being sued in reference to the sequestrated estate, is liable to his successful opponent in expenses, and (as has been decided in express terms) it is not a relevant answer to a charge for such expenses to say that he has no funds belonging to the sequestrated estate. There is no such difference between a judicial factor and testamentary trustees or a trustee in bankruptcy, as to make it necessary, expedient, or right that a rule should be applied in his case different from the rule applied in theirs. Indeed, a judicial factor is in very many cases, if not in all cases, practically a trustee in bankruptcy, or a testamentary trustee. He either represents beneficiaries, like a testamentary trustee, or creditors like a trustee in bankruptcy. In the present case, it appears from the statements of the parties that the suspender is acting chiefly in the interests of creditors, and he is therefore, as I have said, in the same position as a trustee in bankruptcy. It can make no difference in the question of his liability for the expenses of an unsuccessful litigation that he is called a judicial factor, and not a trustee, or that he acts under an extracted appointment made by the Court, instead of under an act and warrant by the Court confirming an appointment made by creditors. That being so, it appears to me to have been decided that it is no relevant answer for this suspender to make to the charge served upon him, that he has no trust or factorial funds in his hands to meet it. In giving this opinion, I am not forgetting that it was said in the case of *Forbes v. Morrison*¹ that the position of a trustee in bankruptcy is very different from that of a curator bonis. This difference is strongly asserted, but the only reason assigned for the difference seems to me, if I may with deference say so, quite inadequate. The reason was that a trustee in bankruptcy had always the creditors on the estate behind him to give him both advice and instructions as to whether he should qua trustee embark on a certain litigation; that he acted as mandatory for the creditors; whereas the curator bonis, in the case cited (he was curator to an insane ward), could not, from the very circumstances of his position, consult with the ward whose interests were involved in the litigation. Now, I cannot help thinking that this peculiarity in the position of the curator bonis had a good deal to do with the judgment arrived at, which, it may be thought, shewed more consideration for the difficult and embarrassing position of the curator bonis than for the just claims of his opponent. The difficulty of the curator's position was his misfortune, but why should that prejudice his opponent? But while I can see no difference in principle as regards liability for the expenses of an unsuccessful litigation between a curator bonis and a trustee in bankruptcy—both litigating in a representative capacity and in interests other than their own—I am not concerned for the purposes of this case to deny that such a distinction may exist; for the distinction,—at least the reason assigned for the distinction,—cannot avail the suspender. He had behind him both creditors and beneficiaries with whom he might have consulted before litigating with the respondent, and in that respect was not different from a trustee in bankruptcy. But as a trustee in bankruptcy would undoubtedly have been personally liable prima instantia for the expenses of an unsuccessful litigation, so should the suspender be liable, between whose case and the trustee's no real distinction can be drawn.

¹ 7 D. 853.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

It is not, however, necessary to determine the question before us upon principle, for, in my opinion, it is already determined by authority. I refer to the decision in the case of Ferguson v. Murray.¹ Some observations have been made upon the interlocutor in that case, to the effect that it is complex and involved, if not unintelligible. I have not experienced any difficulty in understanding that interlocutor, the language and meaning of which seems plain enough; and it is just worth noticing in passing, that that interlocutor was pronounced by the First Division of the Court at a time when that Court was composed of Judges whose opinions have always been regarded by the profession as entitled to more than ordinary respect. In that case the Lord Ordinary found "the defender" (who was a judicial factor, and called as such) liable in expenses to the pursuer. The Court held that that finding imported that the defender was bound to pay the expenses found due primarily out of the funds in his hands as factor, and failing thereof "to supply any deficiency prima instantia from his own funds, he having always relief against the estate." That expresses exactly what I think should be done here; it is what the Lord Ordinary has done in the interlocutor now under review.

On the second point maintained by the suspender, I am also adverse to him. It is said that the Lord Ordinary, by finding (in the original action) the defender qua judicial factor liable in expenses, limited the defender's liability to the extent of the factorial funds in his hands. The Lord Ordinary certainly did not intend to do so, for he expressly refused to insert in his interlocutor any finding so limiting the defender's (spender's) liability although moved by the defender to do so. Nor do I think the Lord Ordinary did by implication what he refused to do per expressum. The words "qua judicial factor" appear to me to be words merely of description, not words of limitation. This view is also supported by autho-

¹ 16 D. 260.

No. 2.
Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

ity. In the cases of *Scott v. Patison*¹ and *Gibson v. Pearson*² the defender was found liable "qua trustee," and in both of these cases the contention that such words limited the defender's liability to the funds in his hands as trustee was repelled, the Court holding that the defender under such a decree was bound prima instantia to pay the expenses found due to his opponent, leaving him thereafter to operate his relief against the estate he was administering. If a decerniture "qua trustee" or "as trustee" was so interpreted, I cannot see why the same interpretation would be objectionable if put upon the words "qua judicial factor."

It has been remarked upon that the suspender did not wrongfully enter upon the litigation in which he was found liable for expenses, and the Lord Ordinary's observation has been quoted that he was "without doubt justified in defending the action." It is not quite clear to my mind what bearing that observation has on the present question. The Lord Ordinary could not mean to say that the suspender was "justified in defending the action" as in a question between him and the pursuer of the action. If that had been the Lord Ordinary's meaning he would necessarily have found the suspender entitled to expenses, not liable in them. If, however, the Lord Ordinary meant (as I think he did) that the suspender's conduct, as in a question with the estate he represented was justified, I have no reason to doubt the justice of the statement, but it is of no importance here. The suspender could not be justified in opposing the respondent's demand, for his opposition was held to be ill-founded and decree went against him. As in a question with his opponent, an unsuccessful litigant is never justified in his opposition, and cannot be, for being unsuccessful he is held to have been wrong. But to prevent any misunderstanding as to my own view on this matter, I must add that I could not hold any judicial factor justified in entering into a litigation who had no funds or estate whatever belonging to the factory in his hands, and no reasonable prospect of ever getting any, which was the case here.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—What we have to decide in this case is, whether the decree for expenses granted by Lord Low in the previous action between the parties does or does not warrant personal diligence against the complainer. That question must be determined according to the legal construction of the decree, and the finding as to expenses upon which it proceeds, which is contained in Lord Low's interlocutor of 1st March 1894. If, properly construed, the decree warrants personal diligence against the complainer, this suspension must be refused. We cannot in this process determine whether in the circumstances the complainer should or should not be held personally liable; that is a matter which must be held to have been decided in the original process.

The question,—in my opinion the only question,—which it is necessary to decide is, whether the decree, according to its terms, imposes personal liability for expenses on the complainer? I agree with those of your Lordships who hold that it does not, because the complainer was found liable in expenses "as judicial factor," and not as an individual. These are limiting words; their natural and legal signification and effect is to restrict the decree to one against the party in a representative capacity. No. 2.

¹ 5 S. 172.

² 11 S. 656.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

The case of Gordon v. Campbell,¹ is a strong authority as to the restrictive effect of such words. Although in that case the words "as trustees" occurred in a heritable bond, and not in a decree, the question was really the same as in the present case (the registered bond being a good warrant for letters of horning), viz., whether an obligation undertaken "as trustees" warranted personal diligence against the parties to the bond. It was pleaded for the charger (p. 453) that the words "as trustees" were used to describe the character of the parties, and not to limit their liability, just as in this case it is pleaded that the words "as judicial factor" were used in the summons and the decree simply to describe the character in which the complainer was sued. But this argument was disregarded. It may be observed that this judgment of the House of Lords was subsequent in date to the case of Gibson v. Pearson,² and the earlier case of *Scott v. Patison*³ (relied on by the respondent), the first of which at least was relied on by the appellant in Gordon v. Campbell.¹

Later cases cited for the complainer—in particular, Kay v. Wilson's Trustees,⁴ and *Davidson's Trustees v. Carr*⁵—shew that where it is intended that in the event of the trust or factory estate proving insufficient, the trustee or factor shall be personally liable to make good the deficiency, this should be expressly stated in the decree.

I do not proceed upon the ground that in the summons the pursuer concludes for expenses against the defender "as judicial factor," because in dealing with expenses the Court are in use to disregard such a limitation. What I do proceed upon is, that in his finding as to expenses the Lord Ordinary finds the defender liable only "as judicial factor." He says,— "Here the complainer was not found personally liable for expenses, and his right of relief against any estate which he may recover remains entire." But he seems to have thought that a personal decree is required only when it is intended to deprive the factor of his relief against the estate, and that in order to render the factor personally liable to the successful litigant, it is not necessary that he should be decerned against personally. In this I do not agree with him.

I may add that it is not disputed that an earlier part of the decree, viz., that in which decree is given for the principal sum of £159, 6s. 8d., and in which the same words "as judicial factor" are used, does not warrant personal diligence against the defender. It would be confusing and inextricable if the same words were held to bear a different signification in two parts of the same decree.

In what I have said I have assumed, as I think the Lord Ordinary has assumed, that there are no trust funds out of which the expenses can be paid. If this is admitted, I think the charge should be suspended.

¹ 1 Bell's App. 428.

² 11 S. 656.

³ 5 S. 172.

⁴ 12 D. 845.

⁵ 12 D. 1069.

No. 2. In the view which I have stated it is not necessary to consider the general question which was argued to us as to the personal liability of a judicial factor for expenses when the factory estate proves insufficient.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

I may say, however, that, as at present advised, I am not prepared to affirm that as a general rule a judicial factor who litigates unsuccessfully is not personally liable for the expenses of the successful party. Assuming, as I do, that a testamentary trustee is personally liable for such expenses as a general rule, I do not think that there is any solid distinction between the position of a judicial factor and that of a testamentary trustee. The factor has as good means as the trustee of knowing the amount of the funds at his disposal, and of obtaining legal advice, and consulting the beneficiaries or creditors interested. If there is a distinction it is against the factor, because he is paid for his services and the trustee is not.

I do not think that much aid is to be derived from the judgment of the Inner-House in the case of Ferguson v. Murray.¹ I confess that I read that judgment in the same way as the Lord Ordinary and the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner; but it admits of being read, and has been read, in a different sense, and no reasons are given in the report to aid us in construing it. Leaving out of view this doubtful authority, it is a point in favour of the complainer that there is no express decision against his view. It must be remembered, however, that the law as to the liability of parties suing or being sued in a representative capacity has matured slowly, if indeed it has matured, and that even as regards the liability of testamentary trustees the decisions up to a recent date are by no means consistent.

But for reasons which I have already stated I think that we should not in this process attempt to lay down any general rule on the subject.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the charge suspended.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords of the Second Division, along with three Judges of the First Division, having heard counsel on the complainer's reclaiming note against Lord Low's interlocutor of 10th January last, in conformity with the opinions of a majority of the whole of the Judges present at the hearing, recall the interlocutor complained against: Sustain the first and second pleas in law for the complainer: Suspend the charge and whole grounds and warrants thereof, and decern."

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 3. HUGH M'CALLUM AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Dickson— Craigie.

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

THOMAS LOCHHEAD AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Salvesen.

Burgh—Police—Election of Police Commissioners—Casus improvisus—Order by Court—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 17.—A burgh administered by twelve police commissioners elected by the whole burgh was divided into four wards in 1895, and in 1896 an election fell to take place in each of the four wards for the purpose of filling the places of the four senior commissioners, who were bound to retire from

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

office in that year. Prior to the date of the election a fifth commissioner intimated his resignation, and, as he had been elected by the burgh and not by a ward, the election of his successor did not fall to any particular ward. The commissioners applied to the Court for an order under sec. 17 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892, which empowers the Court "wherever in any burgh it has from any . . . cause become impossible to proceed with the execution of this Act," after certain procedure, to "pronounce any order which in their judgment will enable the proceedings for the execution of this Act within such burgh to be continued as nearly as possible as if the said . . . cause had not taken place."

The Court ordered the election of an additional commissioner by the First Ward.

THIS was a petition by the Police Commissioners of Dunoon, for 1ST DIVISION. an order under section 17 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.*

The statements of the petitioners were to the following effect:—Dunoon was constituted a burgh in 1868, in terms of the General Police Act of 1862, and in 1892 the Sheriff of Argyllshire fixed the number of Commissioners at twelve, in terms of section 29 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. In December 1895 the Sheriff, under the powers conferred by section 11 of the Act last mentioned, divided the burgh into four wards. In terms of sections 32 and 37 of the same Act, one-third of the existing Commissioners, who had all been elected by the burgh as a whole, were bound to retire on the first Tuesday of November 1896, and an opportunity would thus be afforded to each of the four wards of electing one Commissioner. Mr William Mackenzie Shields, not being one of the Commissioners who was bound to retire in November 1896, had also intimated his resignation, and it was necessary that another Commissioner, in addition to the four above mentioned, should be elected.

"The Act makes no provision for apportioning the existing Commissioners among the wards, so as to indicate by which ward casual vacancies are to be supplied during the period of three years immediately succeeding the division into wards, and in the present circumstances the question has arisen whether one of the four wards into which the burgh is now divided shall return two members at the forthcoming election."

The petitioners accordingly craved the Court "to pronounce an order directing by what ward or wards the places of the five retiring Commissioners shall, at the forthcoming election, to be held on the 3d November 1896, be filled up, or to pronounce such other order as will

* 55 and 56 Vict. c. 55, section 17, provides:—"Wherever in any burgh in existence before the passing of this Act, and which thereafter continues to be a burgh . . . it has, from a failure to observe any of the provisions of this Act, or any other Act, or from any other cause, become impossible to proceed with the execution of this Act, the following provisions shall have effect ; (1) It shall be lawful for any seven householders within the burgh to present a petition to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff Court, . . . (3) Upon resuming consideration of the petition, with or without answers, and after receiving such evidence as they shall require, the Court may pronounce any order which, in their judgment, will enable the proceedings for the execution of this Act within such burgh to be continued as nearly as possible as if the said failure to observe the provisions of this Act, or any other Act, or other cause, had not taken place ; and such order shall be final, and shall be recorded in the Sheriff Court books of the county within which such burgh is situate."

No. 2. cation of the views which I have expressed. At the same time I think it right to say that my opinion extends to the case of a judicial factor who in the due performance of his duty makes a claim on behalf of the estate and raises action to establish it. I see no reason why the pursuer (the estate) should find caution for expenses, or why the obligation of a cautioner should be put on the factor as a condition of his performing his duty, which is, I assume, to institute and pursue the action.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

I also think it right to say that the considerations, with their result, which I have expressed and endeavoured to illustrate, apply, or may apply (for there may be exceptional cases), to trustees including executors, and generally to anyone holding an office involving duties to others whose common interests the law has placed in his charge, and involving no interest on his own part except the faithful and intelligent performance of these duties.

I stated in the outset of these observations that the qualifying and limiting words "as judicial factor" in the decree against the complainer are, in my opinion, inconsistent with the personal liability which the respondent contends for, and this opinion, if sound, is enough for the decision of the case. It was suggested in the argument for the respondent that Lord Low, who pronounced the decree, must have intended personal liability, seeing that he has refused this suspension to resist it. But I think it clear enough from his Lordship's notes that he had no intention of imputing misconduct to the complainer, and, on the contrary, was judicially satisfied that he had acted according to his duty, although he was nevertheless of opinion, in point of law, that personal liability attached to him. I have stated fully my reasons for differing from this opinion. Had there been grounds for thinking that his Lordship meant to impose personal liability because of any misconduct which would warrant it, I should not merely have regretted the inaccurate (in that view) language of the decree, but felt disposed if possible to overcome it.

It is important that there should be no doubt as to the meaning and effect of these qualifying and limiting words "as judicial factor," or "as trustee" or "as executor," or as to the grounds on which they ought to be used or avoided, and others importing personal liability employed. This must be my excuse for entering so fully into the subject, and was indeed the reason which induced the Second Division to refer the case to a full Bench.

With respect to the authorities to which we were referred, I have to say, first, that I am unable to accept the decision in *Gibson*¹ as an authority. It has never since been followed, and the practice of the Court, so far as my experience goes, has been at variance with it. Second, I think the decision and the opinions expressed in *Forbes v. Morrison*² are in accord with the views which I entertain and have expressed. Third, I think the case of *Ferguson v. Murray*³ is not in point. Fourth, the most recent case—Lau v. Humphrey,⁴ and the opinion of the Lord President, concurred in by all the Judges, are entirely in accord with the views which I hold. Fifth, in the English case—in *re Bolton & Company, Salisbury-Jones, and Dale's*⁵ case,

¹ 11 S. 656.

² 7 D. 853.

³ 16 D. 260.

⁴ 3 R. 1192.

⁵ L. R. [1895], 1 Ch. 333.

which was not cited to us, the Court proceeded on the same view adverse to the personal liability of a trustee who has been guilty of no misconduct or failure in duty.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

LORD ADAM.—I think it is clear that all questions of expenses as between the parties to an action must be determined in the action in which they are incurred. I think it is quite incompetent to inquire in this case whether, or in what capacity, the complainer should have been liable in expenses in the original action.

It appears to me therefore that the only question we can competently consider in this suspension is, What has the Lord Ordinary decided as to expenses in that action? And in that matter the interlocutor or decree must speak for itself. We cannot go to the Lord Ordinary's opinion to see what meaning he intended that the interlocutor should have. Third parties,—messengers-at-arms, for example, or arresters and others interested—have no access to such sources of information, and the interlocutor must have effect according to its legal meaning and construction, whatever that may be.

Now, the Lord Ordinary has in the original action ordained the complainer, as judicial factor, to make payment to the respondent of a principal sum of £159, 6s. 8d., with interest, and has found him “as judicial factor foresaid” liable in expenses to the respondent.

The question is, whether by the finding, expressed in the terms used, the complainer is bound to make payment of these expenses personally, out of his own pocket, or only out of the factory estate?

Now, as I have stated above, the complainer has been ordained to pay a principal sum of £159, 6s. 8d. as judicial factor. I have not heard the respondent or anybody else suggest that the complainer is personally liable to pay that sum, or that the words do not aptly express the intention of limiting liability to the factorial estate.

I can only say that throughout my long experience I have always understood that the words “as judicial factor” or “qua judicial factor” when used as here were intended to limit liability to the factorial estate, and I have always so used them. But if that is their undisputed meaning when used in this interlocutor in connection with the principal sum, how can it be maintained that they are not to have the same meaning when used in connection with the finding as to expenses? I cannot read the interlocutor as if no such words were in it, or as if it found the judicial factor personally liable. To my mind the construction of the interlocutor is clear, and it imposes on the complainer no personal liability for expenses.

I do not think that we have to consider what would be the effect as regards liability for expenses of an interlocutor finding the defender liable in expenses without qualification, or whether as regards such liability judicial factors or other officers of Court are in a different position from trustees in bankruptcy. But as the question has been argued to us, I may say that I concur with Lord Young on that matter.

I think that, if it is intended that such officers are to be personally liable in expenses to the opposing litigant, it should be expressly so found.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is wrong.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

LORD M'LAREN.—Two questions were argued at the last hearing of the cause,—(1) Assuming that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the action at the instance of the present respondent leaves open the question of the liability of the judicial factor, what is that liability? (2) Is this question left open, or is the suspender only liable for expenses in his representative capacity?

(1) On the first of these questions I shall say very little. I hold it to be settled in practice, and clear in principle, that in questions of expenses trustees are principals, and this on the ground that whoever opposes a just claim is liable to compensate the claimant for the expense to which he has been put in vindicating his claim. But this is not an absolute rule. One familiar exception is the case of litigation as to rights under a deed, where the difficulty is caused by the obscurity of the deed. Now, in all cases where the Court has a discretion as to costs, I should be disposed, in exercising that discretion, to consider favourably the case of trustees who are defending the interests of minors, or insane or absent persons; but where the question does not come within the region of discretion, I think that trustees must be liable for costs like other people, and this without reference to the character or purposes of the trust.

I have intentionally put the question as one of trustee liability, because it so presents itself to my mind. A judicial factor is for all practical purposes a trustee. It has repeatedly been observed that the reason for appointing judicial factors to administer trusts (rather than new trustees) is that the accounts of the former are audited under judicial supervision, while the latter are not directly responsible to the Court. But now that trusts may be brought under judicial supervision, the distinction is seen to be unsubstantial. I am unable to admit that the Court has the power to award to its officers a privilege of litigating without liability for expenses that is not shared by private trustees.

(2) The view which I take on the second question would (if I were sitting alone) make it unnecessary to consider the first. I think that the question whether a trustee or judicial factor is to be made liable in expenses individually, or only in his representative capacity, is a question that ought always to be decided in the original action. If the decree is simply against the "pursuer" or the "defender," I should understand this as meaning that the individual decerned against must pay the expenses, reserving his claim to be indemnified out of the trust-estate, a claim which of course cannot be determined one way or the other in an action to which beneficiaries are not parties. In the present case the interlocutor in the original action, which is the warrant of the decree, ordains Mr Craig, "as judicial factor of Archibald Rodan Hogg," to make payment to the pursuer of £159, 6s. 8d., with interest, and also finds the defender, "as judicial factor foresaid," liable in expenses to the pursuer. It is not disputed that the decerniture for principal and interest due under the account sued for is a decerniture against Mr Craig in his representative capacity; and it follows, in my opinion, that an award of expenses, qualified in identical terms, must be read subject to the same limitation.

In so reading the decree we are not, as I conceive, laying down new law. So long ago as 1842 the meaning of an obligation undertaken by obligants

"as trustees" was determined by the House of Lords. I refer to the case of Gordon v. Campbell.¹ This case arose out of a charge given on letters of horning to enforce payment of principal and interest under a bond granted by the suspenders "as trustees." The chargers had intimated their intention of following out the charge by a caption, and a suspension was brought on the ground that the suspender was not in the possession of trust funds to meet the claim. The Lord Ordinary, Lord Moncreiff, found "that there was no legal warrant in the heritable bond and disposition on which the letters of horning were issued for charging the suspender as on personal diligence for payment of the debt in question as due by him personally and individually," and therefore suspended the charge. To this interlocutor the Lords of the Second Division adhered, and their judgment was affirmed on appeal. This decision has been accepted and acted on as the charter of limited liability for trustees and representative persons in all cases where the parties to a contract are free to contract on such terms. In his judgment in *Muir's*² case the case is examined by Lord Cairns and approved, and his Lordship went so far as to say that in such a case, where there is authority to accept a contract so limited, "the words used could have no meaning and could be referred to no object other than that of limiting responsibility."

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

I think it would be unfortunate if it should be held that an obligation constituted by decree in language which ex facie imports a limited responsibility has a different meaning from that which has been attached to the same words when used in a voluntary deed of obligation, and I see no reason for the suggested distinction. I think that as the chargers state their intention of using the charge so as to affect the private estate of the judicial factor, the charge ought to be suspended.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the opinion of Lord Young, both (1) as to the construction and effect of such an interlocutor as that pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, and (2) on the general principle which ought to guide the Court in deciding whether a judicial factor should be liable personally or in his factorial capacity. My reasons for doing so have been stated so fully and so clearly by his Lordship that I do not think I would be justified in occupying the time of the Court by repeating them.

LORD TRAYNER.—The general rule of our practice is that an unsuccessful litigant is found liable in the expenses of the action in which he has unsuccessfully maintained a claim or a defence. I say either claim or defence, because in my opinion it makes no difference in the question of liability for expenses whether the unsuccessful party has voluntarily come into Court to pursue a claim which he has not been able to establish, or has been called into Court and stated a defence which has been repelled. If the general rule, as I have stated it, is applied in the case before us, the suspender (defender in the action in which expenses were decreed for) is bound to pay these expenses, and his suspension of the decree against him should be refused.

But the suspender maintains that the general rule is not applicable to his

¹ 1 Bell's App. 428.

² Muir v. City of Glasgow Bank, April 7, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 21.

No. 2. case (1) because he was called and appeared in his character of judicial factor merely, and that a judicial factor is not liable for expenses if he has no factorial funds in his hands; and (2) because in any view the terms of the decree pronounced against him—being against him qua judicial factor—limit his liability to the amount of the factorial estate in his hands.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

On the first point my opinion is adverse to the contention of the suspender. That he was called to the action and defended it as judicial factor does not, in my opinion, hinder in the least the application of the general rule as to liability for expenses, and I think there is neither authority nor principle for giving effect to the exception for which the suspender contends. Called to the action as judicial factor, he appears in it in his official capacity—that is, a representative capacity—he represents the factorial estate. Does that fact relieve him from liability for expenses? If it does, then a judicial factor is more favoured than other litigants who appear as representatives of interests other than their own. Testamentary trustees suing or being sued as such in matters connected with the trust-estate under their care are liable in expenses to their successful opponent, and must pay such expenses whether they have trust funds in their hands or not. So also, a trustee in bankruptcy, suing or being sued in reference to the sequestrated estate, is liable to his successful opponent in expenses, and (as has been decided in express terms) it is not a relevant answer to a charge for such expenses to say that he has no funds belonging to the sequestrated estate. There is no such difference between a judicial factor and testamentary trustees or a trustee in bankruptcy, as to make it necessary, expedient, or right that a rule should be applied in his case different from the rule applied in theirs. Indeed, a judicial factor is in very many cases, if not in all cases, practically a trustee in bankruptcy, or a testamentary trustee. He either represents beneficiaries, like a testamentary trustee, or creditors like a trustee in bankruptcy. In the present case, it appears from the statements of the parties that the suspender is acting chiefly in the interests of creditors, and he is therefore, as I have said, in the same position as a trustee in bankruptcy. It can make no difference in the question of his liability for the expenses of an unsuccessful litigation that he is called a judicial factor, and not a trustee, or that he acts under an extracted appointment made by the Court, instead of under an act and warrant by the Court confirming an appointment made by creditors. That being so, it appears to me to have been decided that it is no relevant answer for this suspender to make to the charge served upon him, that he has no trust or factorial funds in his hands to meet it. In giving this opinion, I am not forgetting that it was said in the case of *Forbes v. Morrison*¹ that the position of a trustee in bankruptcy is very different from that of a curator bonis. This difference is strongly asserted, but the only reason assigned for the difference seems to me, if I may with deference say so, quite inadequate. The reason was that a trustee in bankruptcy had always the creditors on the estate behind him to give him both advice and instructions as to whether he should qua trustee embark on a certain litigation; that he acted as mandatory for the creditors; whereas the curator bonis, in the case cited (he was curator to an insane ward), could

¹ 7 D. 853.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

not, from the very circumstances of his position, consult with the ward whose interests were involved in the litigation. Now, I cannot help thinking that this peculiarity in the position of the curator bonis had a good deal to do with the judgment arrived at, which, it may be thought, shewed more consideration for the difficult and embarrassing position of the curator bonis than for the just claims of his opponent. The difficulty of the curator's position was his misfortune, but why should that prejudice his opponent? But while I can see no difference in principle as regards liability for the expenses of an unsuccessful litigation between a curator bonis and a trustee in bankruptcy—both litigating in a representative capacity and in interests other than their own—I am not concerned for the purposes of this case to deny that such a distinction may exist; for the distinction,—at least the reason assigned for the distinction,—cannot avail the suspender. He had behind him both creditors and beneficiaries with whom he might have consulted before litigating with the respondent, and in that respect was not different from a trustee in bankruptcy. But as a trustee in bankruptcy would undoubtedly have been personally liable prima instantia for the expenses of an unsuccessful litigation, so should the suspender be liable, between whose case and the trustee's no real distinction can be drawn.

It is not, however, necessary to determine the question before us upon principle, for, in my opinion, it is already determined by authority. I refer to the decision in the case of Ferguson v. Murray.¹ Some observations have been made upon the interlocutor in that case, to the effect that it is complex and involved, if not unintelligible. I have not experienced any difficulty in understanding that interlocutor, the language and meaning of which seems plain enough; and it is just worth noticing in passing, that that interlocutor was pronounced by the First Division of the Court at a time when that Court was composed of Judges whose opinions have always been regarded by the profession as entitled to more than ordinary respect. In that case the Lord Ordinary found "the defender" (who was a judicial factor, and called as such) liable in expenses to the pursuer. The Court held that that finding imported that the defender was bound to pay the expenses found due primarily out of the funds in his hands as factor, and failing thereof "to supply any deficiency prima instantia from his own funds, he having always relief against the estate." That expresses exactly what I think should be done here; it is what the Lord Ordinary has done in the interlocutor now under review.

On the second point maintained by the suspender, I am also adverse to him. It is said that the Lord Ordinary, by finding (in the original action) the defender qua judicial factor liable in expenses, limited the defender's liability to the extent of the factorial funds in his hands. The Lord Ordinary certainly did not intend to do so, for he expressly refused to insert in his interlocutor any finding so limiting the defender's (suspender's) liability although moved by the defender to do so. Nor do I think the Lord Ordinary did by implication what he refused to do per expressum. The words "qua judicial factor" appear to me to be words merely of description, not words of limitation. This view is also supported by autho-

¹ 16 D. 260.

No. 2. rity. In the cases of *Scott v. Patison*¹ and *Gibson v. Pearson*² the defender was found liable "qua trustee," and in both of these cases the contention that such words limited the defender's liability to the funds in his hands as trustee was repelled, the Court holding that the defender under such a decree was bound prima instantia to pay the expenses found due to his opponent, leaving him thereafter to operate his relief against the estate he was administering. If a decerniture "qua trustee" or "as trustee" was so interpreted, I cannot see why the same interpretation would be objectionable if put upon the words "qua judicial factor."

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

It has been remarked upon that the suspender did not wrongfully enter upon the litigation in which he was found liable for expenses, and the Lord Ordinary's observation has been quoted that he was "without doubt justified in defending the action." It is not quite clear to my mind what bearing that observation has on the present question. The Lord Ordinary could not mean to say that the suspender was "justified in defending the action" as in a question between him and the pursuer of the action. If that had been the Lord Ordinary's meaning he would necessarily have found the suspender entitled to expenses, not liable in them. If, however, the Lord Ordinary meant (as I think he did) that the suspender's conduct, as in a question with the estate he represented was justified, I have no reason to doubt the justice of the statement, but it is of no importance here. The suspender could not be justified in opposing the respondent's demand, for his opposition was held to be ill-founded and decree went against him. As in a question with his opponent, an unsuccessful litigant is never justified in his opposition, and cannot be, for being unsuccessful he is held to have been wrong. But to prevent any misunderstanding as to my own view on this matter, I must add that I could not hold any judicial factor justified in entering into a litigation who had no funds or estate whatever belonging to the factory in his hands, and no reasonable prospect of ever getting any, which was the case here.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—What we have to decide in this case is, whether the decree for expenses granted by Lord Low in the previous action between the parties does or does not warrant personal diligence against the complainer. That question must be determined according to the legal construction of the decree, and the finding as to expenses upon which it proceeds, which is contained in Lord Low's interlocutor of 1st March 1894. If, properly construed, the decree warrants personal diligence against the complainer, this suspension must be refused. We cannot in this process determine whether in the circumstances the complainer should or should not be held personally liable; that is a matter which must be held to have been decided in the original process.

The question,—in my opinion the only question,—which it is necessary to decide is, whether the decree, according to its terms, imposes personal liability for expenses on the complainer? I agree with those of your Lordships who hold that it does not, because the complainer was found liable in expenses "as judicial factor," and not as an individual. These are limiting words; their natural and legal signification and effect is to restrict the decree to one against the party in a representative capacity. No. 2.

¹ 5 S. 172.

² 11 S. 656.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

The case of Gordon v. Campbell,¹ is a strong authority as to the restrictive effect of such words. Although in that case the words "as trustees" occurred in a heritable bond, and not in a decree, the question was really the same as in the present case (the registered bond being a good warrant for letters of horning), viz., whether an obligation undertaken "as trustees" warranted personal diligence against the parties to the bond. It was pleaded for the charger (p. 453) that the words "as trustees" were used to describe the character of the parties, and not to limit their liability, just as in this case it is pleaded that the words "as judicial factor" were used in the summons and the decree simply to describe the character in which the complainer was sued. But this argument was disregarded. It may be observed that this judgment of the House of Lords was subsequent in date to the case of Gibson v. Pearson,² and the earlier case of *Scott v. Patison*³ (relied on by the respondent), the first of which at least was relied on by the appellant in Gordon v. Campbell.¹

Later cases cited for the complainer—in particular, Kay v. Wilson's Trustees,⁴ and *Davidson's Trustee v. Carr*⁵—shew that where it is intended that in the event of the trust or factory estate proving insufficient, the trustee or factor shall be personally liable to make good the deficiency, this should be expressly stated in the decree.

I do not proceed upon the ground that in the summons the pursuer concludes for expenses against the defender "as judicial factor," because in dealing with expenses the Court are in use to disregard such a limitation. What I do proceed upon is, that in his finding as to expenses the Lord Ordinary finds the defender liable only "as judicial factor." He says,— "Here the complainer was not found personally liable for expenses, and his right of relief against any estate which he may recover remains entire." But he seems to have thought that a personal decree is required only when it is intended to deprive the factor of his relief against the estate, and that in order to render the factor personally liable to the successful litigant, it is not necessary that he should be decerned against personally. In this I do not agree with him.

I may add that it is not disputed that an earlier part of the decree, viz., that in which decree is given for the principal sum of £159, 6s. 8d., and in which the same words "as judicial factor" are used, does not warrant personal diligence against the defender. It would be confusing and inextricable if the same words were held to bear a different signification in two parts of the same decree.

In what I have said I have assumed, as I think the Lord Ordinary has assumed, that there are no trust funds out of which the expenses can be paid. If this is admitted, I think the charge should be suspended.

¹ 1 Bell's App. 428.

² 11 S. 656.

³ 5 S. 172.

⁴ 12 D. 845.

⁵ 12 D. 1069.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1896.
Craig v. Hogg.

In the view which I have stated it is not necessary to consider the general question which was argued to us as to the personal liability of a judicial factor for expenses when the factory estate proves insufficient.

I may say, however, that, as at present advised, I am not prepared to affirm that as a general rule a judicial factor who litigates unsuccessfully is not personally liable for the expenses of the successful party. Assuming, as I do, that a testamentary trustee is personally liable for such expenses as a general rule, I do not think that there is any solid distinction between the position of a judicial factor and that of a testamentary trustee. The factor has as good means as the trustee of knowing the amount of the funds at his disposal, and of obtaining legal advice, and consulting the beneficiaries or creditors interested. If there is a distinction it is against the factor, because he is paid for his services and the trustee is not.

I do not think that much aid is to be derived from the judgment of the Inner-House in the case of Ferguson v. Murray.¹ I confess that I read that judgment in the same way as the Lord Ordinary and the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner; but it admits of being read, and has been read, in a different sense, and no reasons are given in the report to aid us in construing it. Leaving out of view this doubtful authority, it is a point in favour of the complainer that there is no express decision against his view. It must be remembered, however, that the law as to the liability of parties suing or being sued in a representative capacity has matured slowly, if indeed it has matured, and that even as regards the liability of testamentary trustees the decisions up to a recent date are by no means consistent.

But for reasons which I have already stated I think that we should not in this process attempt to lay down any general rule on the subject.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the charge suspended.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords of the Second Division, along with three Judges of the First Division, having heard counsel on the complainer's reclaiming note against Lord Low's interlocutor of 10th January last, in conformity with the opinions of a majority of the whole of the Judges present at the hearing, recall the interlocutor complained against: Sustain the first and second pleas in law for the complainer: Suspend the charge and whole grounds and warrants thereof, and decern."

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

HUGH M'CALLUM AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Craigie.

THOMAS LOCHHEAD AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Salvesen.

Burgh—Police—Election of Police Commissioners—Casus improvisus—Order by Court—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 17.—A burgh administered by twelve police commissioners elected by the whole burgh was divided into four wards in 1895, and in 1896 an election fell to take place in each of the four wards for the purpose of filling the places of the four senior commissioners, who were bound to retire from office in that year. Prior to the date of the election a fifth commissioner intimated his resignation, and, as he had been elected by the burgh and not by a ward, the election of his successor did not fall to any particular ward. The commissioners applied to the Court for an order under sec. 17 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892, which empowers the Court "wherever in any burgh it has from any . . . cause become impossible to proceed with the execution of this Act," after certain procedure, to "pronounce any order which in their judgment will enable the proceedings for the execution of this Act within such burgh to be continued as nearly as possible as if the said . . . cause had not taken place."

The Court ordered the election of an additional commissioner by the First Ward.

THIS was a petition by the Police Commissioners of Dunoon, for 1ST DIVISION. an order under section 17 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.*

The statements of the petitioners were to the following effect:—Dunoon was constituted a burgh in 1868, in terms of the General Police Act of 1862, and in 1892 the Sheriff of Argyllshire fixed the number of Commissioners at twelve, in terms of section 29 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. In December 1895 the Sheriff, under the powers conferred by section 11 of the Act last mentioned, divided the burgh into four wards. In terms of sections 32 and 37 of the same Act, one-third of the existing Commissioners, who had all been elected by the burgh as a whole, were bound to retire on the first Tuesday of November 1896, and an opportunity would thus be afforded to each of the four wards of electing one Commissioner. Mr William Mackenzie Shields, not being one of the Commissioners who was bound to retire in November 1896, had also intimated his resignation, and it was necessary that another Commissioner, in addition to the four above mentioned, should be elected.

"The Act makes no provision for apportioning the existing Commissioners among the wards, so as to indicate by which ward casual vacancies are to be supplied during the period of three years immediately succeeding the division into wards, and in the present circumstances the question has arisen whether one of the four wards into which the burgh is now divided shall return two members at the forthcoming election."

The petitioners accordingly craved the Court "to pronounce an order directing by what ward or wards the places of the five retiring Commissioners shall, at the forthcoming election, to be held on the 3d November 1896, be filled up, or to pronounce such other order as will

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

* 55 and 56 Vict. c. 55, section 17, provides:—"Wherever in any burgh in existence before the passing of this Act, and which thereafter continues to be a burgh . . . it has, from a failure to observe any of the provisions of this Act, or any other Act, or from any other cause, become impossible to proceed with the execution of this Act, the following provisions shall have effect ; (1) It shall be lawful for any seven householders within the burgh to present a petition to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff Court, . . . (3) Upon resuming consideration of the petition, with or without answers, and after receiving such evidence as they shall require, the Court may pronounce any order which, in their judgment, will enable the proceedings for the execution of this Act within such burgh to be continued as nearly as possible as if the said failure to observe the provisions of this Act, or any other Act, or other cause, had not taken place ; and such order shall be final, and shall be recorded in the Sheriff Court books of the county within which such burgh is situate."

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

enable the proceedings for the execution of the said Act within the burgh of Dunoon to be continued as nearly as possible as if such cause had not taken place."

Answers were lodged by Thomas Lochhead and others, ratepayers in the burgh of Dunoon. The respondents admitted the accuracy of the statements in the petition, but suggested that the Court should pronounce an order directing all the Commissioners to retire before the election in November. They stated that this course, which would bring the ward system into full working order at once, had been unanimously approved at a meeting of ratepayers, and that it was the only course which would make such a difficulty as had occurred impossible in the future. "Any allocation by the Court of the Commissioners to particular wards would besides be entirely arbitrary, and might operate serious injustice to the retiring Commissioners, who might be entirely unknown to the ratepayers of the particular ward which, by the finding of the Court as sought they were practically held to represent. Further, the constitution of the Commission would be anomalous, five of the members representing the specific wards, and the other seven representing the whole community."

The petitioners argued ;—The Court should order two Commissioners to be elected by the first ward. This would enable the proceedings for the execution of the Act to be continued "as nearly as possible as if" Mr Shields' resignation, which was the "cause" of the difficulty "had not taken place." To compel all the Commissioners to retire would be unjust. No doubt section 6 of the General Police Amendment Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 102) provided that, when a burgh was divided into wards, the Commissioners in office at the time of such division should remain in office only until the expiry of the current year of office, but that Act had been repealed by the Act of 1892.*

Argued for the respondents ;—The simplest way out of the difficulty was that the whole Commissioners should retire, and that each ward should elect three members. The new system of election by wards would thus get a fair start, and no confusion would occur in the future.

* Section 32 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892 enacts,—“There shall be an annual election of commissioners under the Act on the first Tuesday of November ; and such annual election in the burgh, or, if it is divided into wards, in the several wards thereof, shall be conducted under the rules, regulations, and provisions applicable by law to the election of town-councillors in burghs in Scotland : And for all the purposes of such annual election, first meeting of commissioners and election of magistrates, and after procedure consequent upon such annual election, a burgh under this Act shall be deemed a burgh, having to provide for the appointment and election of magistrates and councillors therefor, in terms of the Acts relating to the election of magistrates and councillors in royal and parliamentary burghs in Scotland which may be in force for the time.”

Section 37 enacts,—“One-third of the commissioners shall, on the first Tuesday of November annually retire, in order prescribed by law for the retirement of councillors in burghs having to provide for the election of magistrates and councillors as aforesaid.”

By section 16 of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 76, which is entitled an Act to alter and amend the laws for the election of the magistrates and councils of the royal burghs in Scotland, it is enacted that one-third of the council of each such burgh, consisting of the councillors who have been longest in office, shall annually go out of office.

Section 12 of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 77, contains a like provision with regard to the councils of Parliamentary burghs.

No. 3.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If our province under section 17 were to fill up and complete the scheme of legislation contained in the Act of 1892 as regards burghs divided into wards, there would be much to say for our holding that, there being no provision for the next election after such a division, we should order that there be an election for all the seats according to wards. But when I turn to the section which we have to administer, I find that there is a narrower province assigned to us in this matter. We are only entitled to act if and in so far as it appears that in the burgh which we are considering it is impossible to execute the Act at the coming election owing to some cause which has occurred. Now, I would first consider the case as if Mr Shields had not resigned. Could it be said that if Mr Shields had not resigned it was impossible to proceed with the execution of the Act? Most certainly it could not, for we are told by both sides at the bar that the authorities were going on to execute the Act in the very sensible way of filling the vacancies caused by the retirement of four councillors by holding an election in each of the four wards. Things would have run quite smoothly, and we are not to consider what might have happened if things were in a totally different position. Therefore the thing seems to me to be limited to the case arising from the resignation of Mr Shields. That I think is the cause which in the sense of section 17 has made it impossible to proceed with the execution of the Act without an order.

Well, now, Mr Shields having resigned, we are not merely to enable the Act to be carried out, but to enable it to be carried out in such a way that matters should go on as nearly as possible as if Mr Shields had not resigned. My observation on that is that to order an election to fill all the seats on the council would be to wander very far indeed from the ambit of our duty; and it seems to me that all we have to do is to find some means ready to hand for getting an election to fill Mr Shields' vacancy. It must be by one of the wards, for the town is now divided into wards, and it cannot, I think, be suggested that we should revert to the old system which has been abolished. Now, if it be by a ward, it seems to me that the first ward has a clear ground of preference merely by reason of its being the first ward. In some of the Acts of Parliament there is a provision that where there is equality, or some similar emergency arising, the decision should be by lot. We are not required to do that, and accordingly we proceed to take the first ward that comes, and the first ward that comes is the First Ward. And I therefore think that we should order that an additional election of a councillor take place in the First Ward.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree, and shall only add that the principle of ward elections in this Act, as also in the Municipal Corporation Act of 1833 and subsequent statutes, is that of rotation, a certain number of members retiring each year from the bottom of the list. It seems to me that we are carrying out the principle of rotation if in this matter we take the wards in numerical order.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Order that at the next ensuing election of Police Commissioners in Dunoon,

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1896.
M'Callum v.
Lochhead.

two Commissioners, and not one only, shall be elected by the electors in the First Ward, and decern: Allow the expenses of both parties to be paid out of the funds of the Burgh General Assessment."

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—STURROCK & STURROCK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 4.

Oct. 20, 1896.
Robertson v.
Park, Dobson,
& Co.

ROBERT ROBERTSON, Petitioner.—Shaw—Constable.
PARK, DOBSON, & Co., Respondents.—C. J. L. Boyd.

Inhibition—Composition on debt for which inhibition was used—Refusal of debtor to discharge inhibition—Petition for recall—Expenses.—A creditor raised an action for payment of a debt and used inhibition on the dependence, but he acceded to a composition arrangement on his debtor's estate, and the summons was not called.

He subsequently refused to discharge the inhibition on payment of the composition being tendered. In a petition at the instance of the debtor, held that he was entitled to have the inhibition discharged, and that the creditor was liable for the expenses of the application.

Roy v. Turner, March 18, 1891, 18 R. 717, referred to.

2D DIVISION.

ROBERT ROBERTSON, builder, Leith, presented this petition praying for recall of inhibition used by Messrs Park, Dobson, & Co., merchants, Leith, who were called as respondents.

On 23d September 1892 the respondents, who were creditors of the petitioner in a business account, served on him a summons containing warrant to inhibit, and inhibition was used thereon. The inhibition was duly registered on 7th October 1892.

Shortly thereafter the petitioner's creditors agreed to accept a composition of 2s. 6d. per £ on their claims against him. Along with the other creditors, the respondents signed a minute of concurrence in this arrangement, and their summons against the petitioner was never called in Court.

On 9th May 1896 the petitioner's agents wrote to the respondents' agents enclosing for signature a discharge of the inhibition, in return for which they promised to send the amount of the composition due to them. On 11th May the respondents' agents replied that they were not aware that their clients had agreed to the composition, but promising to inquire, and on 19th May they wrote that their clients had no recollection of the alleged agreement. The petitioner's agents in reply sent the formal concurrence signed by the respondents. After further correspondence the petitioner's agents on 26th May sent a cheque for the amount due to the respondents, whose claim at this time was almost the only one outstanding. On the return of this cheque, with the intimation that it could not be accepted in satisfaction of the respondents' claim, the petitioner's agents consigned the money in bank. On 13th June they wrote,—“We trust you have now gone into this matter and that your clients have signed discharge of inhibition. The instructions which we have are to apply for recall of inhibition, failing settlement by Wednesday, 17th curt.” On 26th June they wrote,—“We shall be glad if you now state whether your clients are to take payment of this consignment, or whether you leave us without alternative but to apply for recall of inhibition. If you drive us to the latter course we shall found on our correspondence with you and ask expenses against your clients.” On 27th the respondents' agents replied,—“We are favoured with your letter of yesterday's date. As we have already explained to you, our clients are not satisfied to take the money consigned by you. So far as they are aware there was no agreement to accept this composition, and unless their debt is paid in full at once, we are instructed to proceed with the action for recovery."

No. 4.

Oct. 20, 1896.
Robertson v.
Park, Dobson,
& Co.

This petition was then lodged, praying for recall of the inhibition, for warrant for marking the same as discharged on the Register of Inhibitions, and to find the respondents liable in the expenses of the application. The petitioners set forth the facts above narrated, and produced the correspondence.

Answers lodged for the respondents admitted the statements in the petition, apart from the statement that they had agreed to accept the composition, which was denied. This was, however, admitted at the bar, and the respondents did not oppose recall of the inhibition, but they opposed the application for expenses.

Argued for the petitioner;—When the action fell the inhibition fell along with it, and the petitioner was entitled to the expenses of his application. An unsuccessful pursuer who had used inhibition was bound to clear the record at his own expense.¹ The present case was analogous. The existing debt to the respondents did not affect the applicability of the authority, because the inhibition was not used on any document of debt, but on the dependence of the action, and the inhibition was unavailing unless followed by decree in the action.² Besides, the petition had been rendered necessary by the unreasonable conduct of the respondents. [LORD TRAYNER cited the case of Roy v. Turner.³] That case was distinguishable. The pursuer who had used arrestments on the dependence was successful. Here the respondents did not call their case, and could not claim that they would have been successful. *Turner*³ profited by his arrestment, for he secured payment. Here the inhibition had been futile. Further, this was a more serious case than Roy,³ in which arrestments alone were used. An inhibition used and recorded must be cleared away by a formal document.

Argued for the respondents;—It was settled that if they were right in using diligence they were not bound to pay the expense of discharging it.³ This inhibition was justified. Here there was an existing debt in respect of which inhibition was used. It was not satisfied by the composition offered. Accordingly, they were not bound to sign the discharge. The reason for not calling the action was the impecuniosity of the petitioner. He could take no benefit from that, and in such circumstances the respondents were not bound to pay the expenses of clearing the record.

LORD YOUNG.—The facts in this case are of the simplest possible nature. The petitioner was debtor to the respondents in a sum of money for which the respondents brought action. They did not proceed with that action, very sensibly, no doubt, because the petitioner, I suppose, was not in funds to meet their claim, and was making an arrangement to pay a composition to his creditors. That arrangement was concluded, the respondents agreeing, among other creditors, to accept the composition. Inhibition had been used ¹ Laing v. Muirhead, Jan. 28, 1868, 6 Macph. 282, Auditor's report therein, and Authorities there cited, 40 Scot. Jur. 154.

² Erskine, Inst. ii. 11, 3.

³ Roy v. Turner, March 18, 1891, 18 R. 717.

No. 4.
Oct. 20, 1896.
Robertson v.
Park, Dobson,
& Co.

on the dependence of the action. When the petitioner's agents were in a position to proceed to carry out the composition arrangement, they sent a discharge of the inhibition to be signed by the respondents, intimating that the inhibition stood in the way of the petitioner's making payment, and that upon receiving the discharge signed they would settle with the respondents. The respondents' agents replied that they were not aware whether their clients had agreed to accept the composition, but they would inquire. Their clients said that they had no recollection of having done so. Thereupon the petitioner's agents sent the composition agreement bearing the respondents' signature. Ultimately they sent a cheque for the amount due under the composition contract to the respondents. There was thus no question of security such as had been raised by the respondents' agents, for the petitioner was ready to make payment at once. The respondents' agents returned the cheque. They refused to accept anything but payment in full, or to sign the discharge of the inhibition, and so the correspondence goes on till the end of June, shewing the conduct of the respondents to have been most unreasonable, and certainly nimious. On the 27th June their agents wrote —[His Lordship read the letter of that date above quoted]. Now, after that letter, there being an agreement for a composition, all the other creditors having been paid in terms of that agreement, as appears from the letter of date 30th May, and the respondents who had signed that agreement having refused to accept the amount due them under it in full of their claim, or to discharge the inhibition, what was the petitioner to do but make the present application? Accordingly this petition was presented about a fortnight after the letter of 27th June had been received. It asks for recall of the inhibition, with expenses. I think the conclusion for expenses is altogether reasonable. The inhibition might have been discharged, as was proposed by the petitioner, without any expense to the respondents. But this the respondents refused to do, and no other course was left open to the petitioner but to present this application. I think the conduct of the respondents has been most unreasonable and nimious, and that the petitioner is entitled to his expenses.

I may say that I have formed this opinion after reading the opinions delivered in the case of Roy v. Turner.¹ It is not necessary to make any observation on that case further than to say that, after reading the opinions of the learned Judges who took part in the decision of it, in this case I am of opinion that the respondents should be found liable in expenses.

THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD TRAYNER, and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the inhibition referred to in the petition, and grant warrant for marking the same as discharged on the Register of Inhibitions, and find Messrs Park, Dobson, & Company liable in the expenses of this application," &c.

WALLACE & PENNELL, W.S.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM HUNTER MARSHALL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Johnston—John Wilson.

THE CALLANDER AND TROSSACHS HYDROPATHIC COMPANY, LIMITED, Defendants (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—W. Campbell.

THE EAGLE PROPERTY COMPANY, LIMITED, Defendants.

JOHN WILSON, Defender.

No. 5.

Oct. 22, 1896.
Marshall v.
Callander and Trossachs
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

Process—Appeal to House of Lords—Interlocutor ordaining defender to commence building operations within specified period—Effect of judgment in appeal affirming interlocutor—Decree ad factum præstandum.—By interlocutor dated 18th July 1895, the First Division ordained the defenders in an action to commence certain building operations “within three months from the date of this interlocutor.” The defenders appealed to the House of Lords, but subsequently, with their consent, the interlocutors appealed against were affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the period within which the defenders were bound to commence building was three months from the date of the judgment of the House of Lords.

(SEE 22 R. 954, and 23 R. (H. L.) 55.)

In conjoined actions at the instance of William Hunter Marshall against the Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Company, Limited, the Eagle Property Company, Limited, and John Wilson, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), by interlocutor dated 1st March 1895, inter alia, decerned and ordained “the whole defenders, jointly and severally, forthwith to proceed to rebuild the buildings of the hydropathic establishment, which were erected on the subjects contained in the feu-contract referred to in the summons in terms thereof, and which were on or about 7th November 1893 destroyed by fire, and that to the extent necessary to maintain said buildings as of the total value of £15,000, said rebuilding to be commenced within three months of the date hereof, to be duly proceeded with to the satisfaction of John Peddie, architect, Edinburgh, and to be completed to his satisfaction within two years from the date hereof.”

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

The defenders having reclaimed, the First Division, on 18th July 1895, adhered to the portion of the interlocutor above quoted, “with this variation, that the rebuilding is to be commenced within three months from the date of this interlocutor.”

The defenders the Callander Company and the Eagle Company appealed to the House of Lords against these interlocutors, but at the hearing their counsel informed the House that the appellants consented to the appeal being dismissed; whereupon, on 8th May 1896, the interlocutors appealed against were affirmed by the House of Lords, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

On 9th July 1896 the pursuer presented a note to the Lord President, in which he stated that the period within which the defenders were appointed to commence the rebuilding of the subjects, in terms of the interlocutor of the First Division had expired on 18th October 1895; that the defenders had not yet commenced to rebuild, and that he desired to insist in the alternative conclusions of the supplementary summons. He accordingly craved his Lordship “to move the Court to resume consideration of the cause, and to dispose of the conclusions of the summons remaining undisposed of, or otherwise, to remit the said cause to Lord Kyllachy to proceed therein as accords.”

The Court having remitted the cause, the Lord Ordinary, on 18th July 1896, pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard

No. 5.
 Oct. 22, 1896.
 Marshall v.
 Callander and Trossachs
 Hydropathic
 Co., Limited.

counsel, in respect the defenders have failed to implement the order to rebuild contained in the interlocutor of 18th July 1895, afterwards affirmed by the House of Lords, finds therefore that the pursuer is entitled to damages: Allows the pursuer a proof of his averments in regard to the amount of damages, and the defenders a conjunct probation thereanent, the proof to be taken on a day to be afterwards fixed."

The defenders the Callander Company reclaimed, and argued;—The defenders had not failed to implement the order of the Court, as the three months within which they were to commence rebuilding fell to be reckoned from the date upon which the interlocutor of the First Division was affirmed by the House of Lords. The effect of the interlocutor was necessarily suspended until the date upon which it was affirmed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The judgment of the House of Lords being a simple affirmance of the interlocutors appealed against left these interlocutors standing, and accordingly the interlocutor of the First Division must be held to have taken effect from its date. If the defenders desired to have the interlocutor varied that might have been done by motion in the House of Lords, or even after the House of Lord's judgment, by motion in this Court, but such a motion was too late now that they had been found to be in default. In any view, the defenders were not entitled, as matter of right, to have the period for the commencement of rebuilding prorogated.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—When this case was withdrawn by the appellants' counsel from the consideration of the House of Lords, the parties omitted to advert to the fact that the interlocutor to be affirmed specified a date for the commencement of the work which was already past. This seems to me to have been the fault of the respondent as well as of the appellants, for the pursuer of an action ad factum præstandum is interested, and it is his duty to obtain a decree plainly specifying what is to be done.

The order of the House of Lords, however, does not present any practical difficulty in construction. In affirming the interlocutor of this Division, the Lords decided that there was to be rebuilding, that this was to be forthwith, and that from the date of final judgment three months were to be given for beginning, and two years for finishing, the work. That, I think, is the fair reading of the order, as applied to the pleadings and statements before the House.

Now, the orders of this Court fixing the dates of commencement and completion having been orders of an executory nature, they might have been modified to meet any change of circumstances; and the affirmance by the Lords would probably not have rendered them the less flexible, no question having been raised on them specifically. Neither party, however, came to the Court proposing such a change, and accordingly when the case came before the Lord Ordinary, the proper footing was that the three months were current from 8th May, the date of the judgment of the Lords. The Lord Ordinary, however, on 18th July 1896—much within the three months—found that the defenders had failed to implement the order to rebuild, and allowed a proof of damage.

I do not think that this judgment can be supported, and that on the ground that the time allowed for commencing had not expired.

The pursuer, by making this premature motion, may have slightly complicated the question of the time of commencement by interrupting the currency of the permitted period, and virtually calling on the defenders to stop preparing to build, and to pay damages. But the defenders must remember that their primary duty was, and is, to commence forthwith, and that, whether any allowance is to be made for the intervention of the pursuer or not, more than two months of the time of grace had expired before this intervention took place. None of those questions require present decision, nor do I think it necessary that we should do more than recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 5.
Oct. 22, 1896.
Marshall v.
Callander and Trossachs
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I think it is perfectly clear that the true date of the interlocutor considered by the House of Lords is the date on which it was affirmed, the effect of the interlocutor having been suspended by the appeal to the House of Lords. Accordingly, the meaning of the order contained in the interlocutor, that the defenders should commence to build within three months, is that they must begin to build within three months of the interlocutor taking legal effect,—that is, within three months reckoned from the date of the judgment of the House of Lords. It follows, therefore, in my opinion, that the Lord Ordinary has been premature in holding that the defenders were in default at the time when his Lordship came to consider the cause.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against.

J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

PAUL ROTTENBURG, Pursuer (Appellant).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Clyde.

JOHN THOMSON DUNCAN, Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Asher—C. J. Guthrie—Orr.

JAMES BROWN, Defender (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Aitken.

THE TRITON STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Asher—C. J. Guthrie—Orr.

No. 6.
Oct. 23, 1896.
Rottenburg v.
Duncan.

Process—Amendment of Record—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29.—A brought an action in the Sheriff Court against B and C and the D company, averring that he had invested £450 in the purchase of certain shares in a ship; that B and C had held the ship in part in trust for him, and that in breach of this trust they had sold the whole ship to the D company. He prayed for decree against the defenders, jointly and severally, for payment of £450, with interest from the date on which the investment had been made. In the record as closed the pursuer did not state his claim to be for damages, but after certain procedure in the action he craved leave to amend his record by adding certain averments, and a plea that he was entitled to the sum sued for as damages.

The defenders objected that the proposed amendment was incompetent as not being within the scope of the action as originally laid.

The Court allowed the amendment.

Process—Interlocutor pronounced in error—Cancellation.—An interlocutor dismissing an action in respect of an undertaking by the defenders

No. 6. was pronounced in ignorance of circumstances which made its fulfilment impossible. The Court, on the joint application of the parties, cancelled the interlocutor.

Oct. 23, 1896.
Rottenburg v
Duncan.

Harvey v. Lindsay, July 20, 1875, 2 R. 980, followed.

1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by Paul Rottenburg, merchant in Glasgow, against John Thomson Duncan, Glasgow, and James Brown, coal-merchant, Glasgow, and the Triton Steamship Company, Limited, carrying on business and having its registered office in Glasgow. The pursuer concluded against the defenders, jointly and severally, (first) for payment of the sum of £450, with interest from 9th May 1892, or otherwise (second) for payment of that sum, with interest from 2d January 1895, and of the pursuer's share of the profits earned by the steamship "Triton" between 9th May 1892 and 2d January 1895.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a merchant in Glasgow. The defenders Duncan and James Brown are two of the persons in whom the steamship 'Triton' was, until recently, vested, the third being Thomas Brown, Milford Haven. Said ship was held by these parties in trust for the other defenders, the Triton Steamship Company, Limited, and in part for the pursuer." (Cond. 2) "The pursuer, on or about 9th May 1892, invested £450 in purchase of a part interest in the steamship 'Triton,' conform to receipt of said date produced in process." (Cond. 3) "A limited company was formed in or about November and December 1892 to acquire said ship, and, without the pursuer's authority, he was entered as a shareholder in respect of his interest in the 'Triton.' The pursuer thereafter presented a petition for rectification of the register. . . . the petitioner's name was by order of the Court removed from the register." (Cond. 4) "Thereafter the pursuer intimated to the defenders Duncan and James Brown, and to Thomas Brown, that the ship being held in part for him, he withdrew all authority from the defenders to deal with the ship, and asked for an account of the dealings with the ship. The defenders the Triton Company were also given a similar intimation." (Cond. 5) "Notwithstanding his intimations, on or about the 2d January 1895, the defenders Duncan and Brown and Thomas Brown, in breach of trust, conveyed the whole ship 'Triton' to the defenders the Triton Company, including the part held for the pursuer. The said company were well aware that the part of the ship in which the pursuer was interested was held by the defenders Duncan and Brown and Thomas Brown for him, and that they had no right or authority to convey it to the company." (Cond. 6) "The said ship 'Triton' has, it is believed and averred, been traded with to this date. The pursuer has received no account whatever of the intromissions with said ship." (Cond. 7) "In these circumstances this action has been rendered necessary. The pursuer reserves his whole further rights in the premises."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders Duncan and James Brown having, in concert with Thomas Brown and the other defenders, in breach of trust, conveyed to the company the ship "Triton," including the pursuer's interest therein, the pursuer is entitled to decree, with interest, as craved. (2) Separatim, or otherwise, the pursuer is entitled to decree, with interest from 2d January 1895, as craved, and to an accounting with the funds of the ship down to said date, and in his option to decree for any balance due thereon.

The defenders Duncan and Brown denied that they held any part of the vessel in trust for the pursuer, and stated that the £450 had been paid by the pursuer under an agreement that the ship should be transferred to a limited company.

No. 6.

Oct. 23, 1896.
Rottenburg v.
Duncan.

The defenders the Triton Steamship Company stated in answer 6 that they were willing to account to the pursuer for his share of the profits, if any, earned by the "Triton" from 1st January 1893, from which date they had traded with the steamship. In answer 7 they made the following tender,—To grant a bill of sale in the pursuer's favour of six 64th shares of the "Triton" steamship, being the number of shares of the purchase price of the vessel represented by the amount subscribed by him, under burden of the existing mortgage for £2500 over the vessel, and to pay the pursuer's expenses to date.

All the defenders pleaded, that in respect of the tender by the Triton Company they should be assoilzied.

After various procedure in the Sheriff Court, including a proof by writ of the trust alleged by the pursuer, the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuer appealed, and after hearing parties the Court, on 25th June 1896, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors subsequent to 20th May 1895 [the date when the case was sent by the Sheriff-substitute to the Procedure Roll]; and in respect of the undertaking of the defenders on record (1) to procure and grant in favour of the pursuer a bill of sale for six 64th shares of the 'Triton' steamship under burden of existing mortgages, and (2) to account for the ship's profits from 1st January 1893, dismiss the action, and decern: Find the pursuer liable in expenses in both Courts," &c.

Thereafter the pursuer presented a note to the Lord President, in which he stated that since the date of the above-quoted interlocutor it had come to his knowledge that on 27th January 1896 the whole steamship "Triton" had been sold by a mortgagee to a Mr Blethyn, and accordingly craved his Lordship to move the Court to cancel the interlocutor.

All the parties to the action also concurred in a joint minute making a similar application to the Court.¹

On 10th July 1896 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the joint minute, No. 31 of process, in respect of said minute, and in respect that it is stated that prior to the date of the previous interlocutor, dated 25th June 1896, the steamship 'Triton' had been sold, and that by error on the part of the defenders the Triton Steamship Company, Limited, this fact was not stated to the Court, and that the pursuer and the defender James Brown were ignorant of the sale having taken place, appoint the Clerk of Court to cancel the said interlocutor: Open up the record: Allow the defenders within four days to alter their record by deleting the tender of shares of the said steamship, and statement relative thereto, and continue the cause in order that the pursuer may state what amendments, if any, he desires to make on his record, reserving all question of expenses."

The pursuer subsequently lodged a minute stating that he proposed to amend the record by adding to Cond. 5 the following:—"The said ship, including the pursuer's interest therein, has, since August 1893, been held by the defenders Duncan and Brown, who were also

¹ Authority referred to.—Harvey v. Lindsay, July 20, 1875, 2 R. 980.

No. 6. directors of the Triton Company, for behoof of that company, without regard to the pursuer. In December 1894 or January 1895 the existing mortgage was discharged. Thereafter the defenders Duncan and Brown formally transferred the title in the whole ship to the Triton Company. That company of new mortgaged the ship to the Marine Securities Corporation, Limited, London, which corporation, on or about 27th January 1896, sold the whole ship to Charles Thomas Blethyn, Milford Haven, county of Pembroke, ship-chandler. Since 27th January 1896 various other transactions have taken place, conform to copy register produced herewith. None of the defenders have in any way consulted with or taken the authority of the pursuer to these transactions or to the way in which his interest in said ship was to be managed or dealt with, and that though they knew they had no authority to act for him. The value of pursuer's interest in said ship was at May 1892 and August 1893 not less than £450. In March 1894 the pursuer, in ignorance that the defenders Duncan and Brown had given up control of his interest in said ship, and were holding the whole ship for behoof of the Triton Company, agreed with Brown, Sons, & Company to sell his interest in said ship to them for £337, 10s., and the pursuer by his agents received a deposit of £33, 15s. to account. Brown, Sons, & Company failed to complete the transaction, and forfeited the amount of their deposit, it having been agreed between the pursuer and the said Brown, Sons, & Company that if the transaction should fall through (which it did) the said £33, 15s. should remain the property of the pursuer. The pursuer is willing to take as the value of his interest in said ship at January 1895 said sum of £303, 15s., being said sum of £337, 10s., less the deposit of £33, 15s., with interest at the rate of 5 per cent from 30th March 1894 till said 2d January 1895. Said value was not less than that sum. The pursuer has by the defenders' actings suffered loss to at least the amount of £350."

By adding to condescendence 6 the following:—"In the event of the pursuer obtaining decree for £450, with interest from 9th May 1892 or 2d January 1895, or even for £303, 15s., with interest from 30th March 1894, he is willing to abandon his claim to an accounting."

By adding the following pleas:—"(3) The defenders having illegally and without the pursuer's knowledge or authority appropriated, or otherwise disposed of the pursuer's interest in said ship 'Triton' are bound to make good the value of said interest to him, and the pursuer is therefore entitled to decree as craved. (4) The value of pursuer's interest in said ship being not less than the sum sued for, or at all events (in the circumstances condescended on) not less than £303, 15s., with interest from 30th March 1894, the pursuer is entitled to decree for said sum of £450, or at all events for said sum of £303, 15s., with interest, conform to his offer on record. (5) The pursuer, having, through the actings of the defenders as condescended on, sustained loss and damage, is entitled to be compensated therefor. (6) The loss and damage sustained by the pursuer being moderately estimated at the sum sued for in the first alternative conclusion, or at all events at the sum of £350, which the pursuer is willing to accept in full of his damage, he is entitled to decree in terms of said first alternative conclusion, or at all events for said sum of £350."

The defenders objected to the amendment being allowed.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer brought his action for restoration of a specific sum, and he now desired to turn the action into one of damages, which would be an entirely new case. The amendment was therefore incompetent as not being within the scope of the action as originally laid.¹

No. 6.

Oct. 23, 1896.
Rottenburg v.
Duncan.

The defender Brown further argued ;—The Court had a discretion to reject an amendment, even if competent,² and should exercise it in this case, even if they held the amendment to be within the scope of the action as originally laid. It would raise delicate questions as to the extent of this defender's knowledge of the transactions now complained of, which were not raised before.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion the proposed amendments fall sufficiently within the scheme of the action to be within the section of the Act. I think they are necessary for the purpose of determining in this action the real question in controversy between the parties, and cannot be said, in the sense of the section, to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger or other fund than that specified in the original action. The term "fund" seems to have been misapplied in the discussion, because in the Act it surely is applied to money set apart in the hands of some person, or earmarked and set aside for a special purpose. I may mention by way of illustration the fund in medio in a multiplepinding. In this case the pursuer on record is seeking compensation simply. He says to the defenders Duncan and Brown,—“I gave you £450 to put into a ship; you put it into the ‘Triton.’ You held the ship in trust for me, and to that amount you disposed of it without my consent, and I have never got back my money.” It is true that he said on record,—“Because I gave you the money, you must give it me back,” but his first view, from which he lapsed, but which he never abandoned, seems to be the more proper view, namely, that he has a claim of damages against the defenders, and the action is, I think, calculated to bring out this claim.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT allowed the amendments.

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

ALEXANDER MUIRDEN AND ANOTHER (Atherstone's Trustees), AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Brodie Innes.

No. 7.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Atherstone's
Trustees.

Trust—Nobile Officium—Petition for authority to pay income of legacy for behoof of minor legatee domiciled in England to his father.—Petition by trustees acting under a Scottish trust-settlement for authority to pay the income of legacies to the fathers of minor beneficiaries who were domiciled in England, and from whom, according to the law of England, a valid discharge could not be obtained, refused on the ground that the Court had no power to grant the authority craved.

THIS was a petition at the instance of the trustees under the trust-^{1ST DIVISION.} disposition and settlement of the deceased John Greasley Atherstone, ¹ Court of Session Act, 1868, section 29 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101); Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans, Dec. 7, 1895, 23 R. 256; Laming & Co. v. Seater, June 21, 1889, 16 R. 828; Forbes v. Watt's Trustees, Nov. 9, 1870, 9 Macph. 96.

² Taylor v. M'Dougall & Sons, July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1304.

No. 7. a domiciled Scotsman, for authority to pay the income of certain pecuniary bequests made in the settlement to the fathers of the respective legatees.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Atherstone's
Trustees.

The petitioners stated that the legatees in question were all in minority; no tutors or curators were appointed to them by the settlement, nor did that deed provide for payment of either the principal or income of the bequests to the parents of the legatees. The legatees and their fathers were all domiciled in England, and the petitioners had been advised by English counsel that the legatees could not, either alone or along with their parents, grant a valid discharge for the said legacies, and that the petitioners must retain the same until the legatees attained majority; and further, that by the law of England there was considerable doubt whether the petitioners could, without the authority of the Court, pay the income of said legacies to the fathers of the legatees.

The petition was unopposed.

The petitioners argued;—Had the legatees been domiciled in Scotland, no difficulty would have arisen, but being minors domiciled in England, they could not, either alone or along with their parents, grant a legal discharge. The Court in England had a discretionary power to authorise payment such as the petitioners here were willing to make. In Scotland the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, had a similar power.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This seems to be a case of overdriving the nobile officium of the Court. The inherent difficulty is that no one is in a position to give a valid discharge of payment, and no decree of ours can supply that defect.

Mr Innes emphasises the impossibility of payment being made at the trustees' own hand, and thus makes clear that the quality of the difficulty makes it one which the Court cannot get over.

LORD ADAM.—The question is whether we can authorise the trustees to pay money belonging to infants without obtaining a discharge. I think we cannot.

LORD M'LAREN.—I express no opinion on the question whether without an order the trustees would be entitled to pay the legacies to the minor children. I should imagine that if the money was paid for their benefit, it would be unlikely that the trustees should ever be reproached with it. We cannot enter into that question; but if the trustees have not power to make such payment, we certainly cannot give it to them.

LORD KINNEAR.—The statement of the trustees is, that the legatees, or those who may ultimately be found entitled to these sums, are according to the law of their own domicile infants incapable of granting a discharge, and they have no legal guardians capable of giving one binding on them and their heirs. The trustees say they are not in a position to make payment to the legatees themselves or anyone on their behalf, because they can get no valid discharge. That shews that we have no power to supply a defect which makes it impossible for them to proceed upon their own responsibility.

THE COURT refused the petition.

DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C., Agents.

POLICE COMMISSIONERS OF BURGH OF GOVAN, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—

No. 8.

C. J. Guthrie—M'Lennan.

ALEXANDER LINDSAY AIRTH (Logan's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—J. Wilson—Findlay.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Airth.

Police—Street—Footway—Statute—Construction—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), secs. 6, 141, and 327—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 149.—Section 149 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, enacted that owners of premises abutting on any street should, on the requisition of the Commissioners, and at their own expense, construct footways on the sides of such street in such way as the Commissioners should direct, and that the owners should “thereafter from time to time, as occasion may require, repair and uphold such footways.”

The Burgh Police Act, 1892, by section 6, repealed the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, and enacted by section 141 that the owners of premises abutting on any street should “at their own expense, when required by the Commissioners, cause footways before their properties respectively on the sides of such street to be made, and to be well and sufficiently paved or constructed with such material . . . as the Commissioners shall direct, and the Commissioners shall thereafter from time to time repair and uphold” the footways.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that section 141 applied to cases where a footpath had already been constructed under the Act of 1862.

ON 25th July 1894 the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Govan issued an order under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), section 141,* requiring Alexander Lindsay Airth, Angus Logan's trustee, to cause the footway abutting on certain tenements in Carmichael Street, Govan (belonging to the deceased Angus Logan), to be made and well and sufficiently paved, in the manner stated in the order, with Caithness flag or granolithic pavement.

1st Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), sec. 141, enacted,—“The owners of all lands or premises fronting or abutting on any street shall, at their own expense, when required by the Commissioners, cause footways before their properties respectively on the sides of such street to be made, and to be well and sufficiently paved or constructed with such material and in such manner and form and of such breadth as the Commissioners shall direct, and the Commissioners shall thereafter from time to time repair and uphold such footways.”

Section 142.—“It shall be lawful for the Commissioners to resolve . . . to undertake the maintenance and repair of all the footways of the burgh. When the Commissioners shall undertake the maintenance and repair of the foot-pavements in the burgh, they shall call upon all owners to have their foot-pavements before their properties put in a sufficient state of repair, and failing their doing so within six weeks, the Commissioners may cause the same to be done at the expense of such owners, and thereafter the said foot-pavements shall be maintained by the Commissioners.”

Section 327 empowered the Commissioners, in default of their orders being implemented by the owners, to execute the necessary work at the expense of the latter.

Section 339 gave persons aggrieved by any order of the Commissioners right to appeal either to the Sheriff Court or to the Court of Session.

Section 6 repealed the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101).

No. 8.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Airth.

Mr Airth refused to comply with the order, on the ground that in terms of an order by the Police Commissioners, dated 6th July 1878, acting under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,* he had been called upon to pave the footway opposite the property in question with second-class pavement or asphalt, and had implemented the order by laying down a pavement of asphalt.

The Commissioners accordingly executed the work under section 327 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892; and on 8th March 1896 they raised this action against Mr Airth for payment of the cost of the work, amounting to £43, 6s. 8d.

The pursuers admitted that the defender had implemented the order of the Commissioners in 1878, but averred,—“The pursuers, in the exercise of their duty, declined to take over the footway in front of the defender’s said property until the same was formed as prescribed by said last-mentioned Act, and in the manner prescribed by them and specified in said order of 1894.”

The pursuers stated that the defenders’ pavement was in a bad state of repair, and that “in the public interest they could not undertake to relieve him of the future maintenance of the footway, made with asphalt nearly twenty years ago, which since then has been gradually superseded by the more enduring and satisfactory material of granolithic; but the defender still continues to refuse payment of the account for the work done by the Commissioners. At the date of the said order of 1894, the footway in question was in a state of disrepair, as before stated.”

The defender averred that section 141 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, was inapplicable, and that the order of the Commissioners thereunder was unwarranted. He also “explained and averred that the order of 25th July 1894 was an order to reconstruct the said footway, and no such obligation is laid upon the defender by either of said Acts.”

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) By the provisions of the Burgh Police Act of 1892 the pursuers were entitled to issue the order of 25th July 1894 upon the defender. (2) The defender having failed to comply with the said order served upon him, the pursuers were entitled to execute, at his cost, the work therein specified, and he is liable to them in repayment of the sum sued for, with interest.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The order of 25th July 1894 being unwarrantable and without statutory authority, the pursuers are not entitled to charge the defender for any work done in terms thereof, and he should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 12th June 1896, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds it admitted that in 1878 the defender constructed a pavement of asphalt opposite his property in Carmichael Street, Govan, in compliance with an order to that effect by the Police Commissioners of Govan acting under the General Burgh

* The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), section 149, enacted,—“The owners of all lands or premises fronting or abutting on any street shall, at their own expense, when required by the Commissioners, cause footways before their property respectively on the sides of such street to be made, and to be well and sufficiently paved with flat hewn or other stones, or to be constructed in such other manner and form and of such breadth as the Commissioners shall direct, and shall thereafter from time to time, as occasion may require, repair and uphold such footways. . . .”

Police Act, 1862 : Finds it not alleged that that pavement is in such a condition as to be beyond repair : Finds that in these circumstances the order by the pursuers, dated 25th July 1894, is unauthorised by the General Burgh Police Act, 1892 : Therefore assails the defender from the conclusions of the summons.*

No. 8.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of Govan v. Airth.

* "OPINION.—This is a case of some difficulty and of general importance in reference to the provisions of the Police Act of 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), in regard to the paving of public streets. The facts are simple. The Commissioners of the burgh of Govan have ordered the defender to cause the footway abutting on his property in Carmichael Street, Govan (admitted at the bar to be a public street), to be paved in the manner stated in the order with Caithness flag or granolithic paving. The order bears to be issued in virtue of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, 'particularly clause 141.' It is not an order which proceeds on any averment that the existing pavement had fallen into a state of disrepair. It is not an order to repair or to reconstruct an existing pavement. It could not have been, because section 141 of the Act imposes no obligation on owners to repair or to reconstruct pavements. The order is expressed just as if there were no existing pavement, and in being so expressed it corresponds with its warrant (clause 141), which imposes on owners the obligation to make pavements, but not to repair or reconstruct them.

"The defender has not complied with the order, and the work ordered has been completed by the Commissioners, under section 327 of the Act, and they now sue for the cost. The defence is that in 1878 the defender had been ordered by the Police Commissioners, acting under the General Police Act, 1862, to pave the street in question opposite his property with second-class pavement or asphalt, and had implemented the order by laying down a pavement of asphalt. That defence is admitted to be true in point of fact, and the question is, whether it justifies the defender's refusal to implement the pursuers' order. I am of opinion that it does.

"The defender had right under section 339 to appeal against the order either to the Sheriff Court or Court of Session ; and I suppose that the question now raised might have been decided in the appeal. It may be that the pursuers could have pleaded that the defender, not having adopted that remedy, cannot now be heard to object to the order. But the pursuers have—advisedly, as I was informed—abstained from stating a plea to that effect, because they are desirous of obtaining a judgment on the question.

"Although the Commissioners have chosen to proceed under clause 141, yet they had other remedies under the statute, if they were dissatisfied with the condition of the pavement of Carmichael Street. They might have proceeded under clause 142, but that would have involved undertaking the maintenance of all the footways in the burgh ; or they might have proceeded under section 129, which confers very wide powers to improve and form not only public streets, but also public pavements and footpaths ; but in that case they must, I apprehend, have done the work at their own expense, and not at the charge of the owners. But they have elected not to proceed under that section ; and this case does not relate to the powers of the Commissioners under either clause 129 or clause 142, but solely to their powers under clause 141.

"Now clause 141 is not a novelty introduced into the Act of 1892, and confers no new power on the Police Commissioners. It may be traced back to the Burgh Police Act of 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 46). The 105th section of that Act enacted that the proprietors of houses fronting the street should, when required by the Police Commissioners, 'cause footpaths before their property respectively on the sides of the said . . . streets . . . to be made and to be well and sufficiently paved with flat, hewn, or other stones, or to be constructed in such other manner and form and of

No. 8.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Airth.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—The Commissioners could not call upon the defender to repair the footpath under section 142 of the Act of 1892, for they were not in the position of having taken over all the footpaths. They had to proceed then under section 141, by which owners were bound, when required, to construct them. The section made no distinction between imperfect and non-existing footways, nor between existing footways which had or had not been made under statutory order. The Act of 1862 had been repealed by the Act of 1892, and the defender, therefore, could not found upon the order under it.¹

Argued for the defender ;—It was vain for the Commissioners to attempt to use section 141 of the Act of 1892 for their purpose. That section was framed on the assumption that there was no existing pavement at the place to which the order related. Here the statutory obligation to construct had been admittedly implemented in 1862, and the Commissioners could not reimpose it. The obligation to uphold and maintain contained in the 1862 Act still subsisted, and the defender was quite willing to implement it.²

such breadth as the said Commissioners shall direct.' The next General Police Act was 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 33, 1850, and the 212th section is substantially to the same effect. Neither statute expressly declares who shall repair and uphold the pavement when made. The corresponding clause in the Burgh Police Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), is the 149th, and it is substantially to the same effect, except that it enacts that, after the pavements are made, the owners shall 'repair and uphold such footways.' Section 141 of the Act of 1892 is substantially to the same effect, with the important difference that it enacts that when pavements are made, 'the Commissioners shall thereafter, from time to time, repair and uphold such footways.'

"There is substantially no difference in the primary obligation imposed on owners by these clauses of the several statutes. It is to construct, not to repair pavements. No new power is conferred by any of these Acts on the Police Commissioners. The old power, conferred in 1833, has been continued from statute to statute, and under all the Acts it is vested in one permanent and continuing body—the Police Commissioners. All these statutes confer power on the Commissioners to do the work themselves, on the failure of the owners, at the owners' expense. The requirements of the Police Authorities are satisfied by the construction of the works, either by the owners or by the Commissioners. The legal result in either case is the same.

"Now, if a pavement were constructed under any of these Acts—say under the Act of 1850—on the order of, and to the satisfaction of, the Commissioners, or by the Commissioners at the owners' expense, I think that the obligation of the owners under that statute to make a pavement would have been exhausted, and that the Commissioners could not repeat that order under the same powers of that Act, unless indeed the pavement had become so destroyed as to be past repair, in which case there might be a question. Repeated orders to construct pavements do not appear to be contemplated, and, if so, I cannot see why there should be any difference when a new Act is passed not altering the powers of the Commissioners or the

¹ Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, 21 R. 498 ; Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners v. Granite City Steamship Co., July 2, 1896, 23 R. 918.

² Police Commissioners of Old Aberdeen v. Leslie, &c., March 18, 1884, 11 R. 733.

At advising,—

No. 8.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think his Lordship gives too much weight to the repealed statutes, and too little to the statute which is in force. I Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Airth.

It would have been a very intelligible plan for the Act of 1892 expressly to take account of existing pavements which had been made under former statutes, and to limit the compulsory power in section 141 accordingly. But it has not done so. Or, the statute might have provided for the Commissioners requiring repairs of pavements to be made by individual owners, where such repairs are required. But again, it has not done so, for section 142 only applies to the event of the Commissioners taking over all the footways of the burgh.

On the other hand, the scheme of the Act, in the matter in hand, is simple enough, if a little crude. It authorises the Commissioners to order an owner to find them a pavement to their satisfaction; and, on this being done once for all, the owner is relieved of all further responsibility. The obligation of the owners. So, in this case, the owners, having in 1878 constructed a pavement in implement of the order of the Police Commissioners, I consider that the Police Commissioners could not in 1890, when the same Act was in force, have ordered the work to be repeated, unless, as before said, the work had gone into such decay as to be past repair, when there might possibly be a question. In such a case, under the Act of 1862, not only is the obligation of the owner to make a pavement exhausted, but a different burden is expressly imposed on him, viz., the burden of repair. Can it then (repeating the question) make any difference that a new statute has been passed continuing the power of the Commissioners and the obligation of the owner? I think that the passing of a new statute can make no difference in that respect, and I do not see that the new provision, which throws the burden of maintenance on the Commissioners, affects that question.

“Consistently with this view, the words of clause 141 appear to me to apply to the case where there is no previous pavement, and to be inapplicable to the case where a pavement exists. The right of appeal may, it is true, protect the owners from oppression. But I do not proceed on the ground that it would be unreasonable and oppressive to hold that an owner could be compelled to construct a pavement twice, but on the ground that the sections of the various Acts which have been quoted impose the burden of constructing a pavement once for all, and are framed on the assumption that there is no existing pavement at the place to which the order authorised relates. Reference was made to the case of the Commissioners of Old Aberdeen v. Leslie, 18th March 1884, 11 R. 733. There an order as to a pavement under the 149th clause of the Act of 1862 was sustained, notwithstanding a defence that the pavement was existing, and was to be held as having been made under the Act of 1850. It had not in fact been so made, because it had been made before that Act was adopted. The Lord President, who gave the judgment of the Court, was careful to rest his opinion on the ground that the order was an order to execute repairs (which might be ordered under the 149th section of the Act of 1862, although not under the 141st section of the Act of 1892), and the impression seems permissible that, had the order been an order to pave of new, the judgment might have been different.

“I was referred to a judgment pronounced by Sheriff Blackburn in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton, in reference to section 149 of the Act of 1862, to the effect that the obligation to pave was exhausted by implement of an

No. 8.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Airth.

section does not distinguish between imperfect footways and non-existing footways,—still less between those existing footways which have, and those which have not, been made under statutory order; it recognises but one kind of footway, and that is a footway up to the requirements of the Commissioners under the Act of 1892.

In the administration of this section, two things are to be observed. First, the Commissioners will of course take account of existing footways, where what has formerly been done can be utilised, so as to diminish what has to be required in order to bring the footway up to the legitimate wants of the community. Second, any excessive requirement is subject to the review of the Sheriff on summary appeal. Accordingly, the existing state of the pavement is necessarily taken account of; and anything done aforetime will go to the credit of the owner, if and in so far as it in reason affects what ought yet to be done. But I can see no warrant for holding that an existing footway is, under section 141, any better (or worse) for having had a statutory origin under a repealed Act.

The contrary view is very frankly stated in a passage in the Lord Ordinary's opinion. His Lordship, first, by way of illustration, puts the case as if it had occurred before the passing of the Act of 1892,—to wit in 1890,—and says that the Commissioners could not have ordered work to be repeated in 1890, when the same Act was in force as in 1878, when the work was first done. Then the Lord Ordinary goes on,—“Can it then make any difference that a new statute has been passed continuing the power of the Commissioners and the obligation of the owner?”

Now, with deference to the Lord Ordinary, I think the passing of the new statute makes all the difference; but then I do not think that his Lordship quite accurately describes the statute as “continuing the power of the Commissioners.” The scheme of the statute is to make a fresh start, to repeal the former statutes, and (in the matter in hand) to authorise Commissioners in absolute terms, to order certain things, without any qualification by way of reference to what has been ordered or done before.

I am for recalling the interlocutor reclaimed against, and granting decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

order of the Police Commissioners, in which judgment I concur—Irons on Burgh Police Act, 1892, p. 200.

“It is not to be denied that this construction of the Act involves some difficulty. In particular, the pursuers pointed out that the Act of 1862 has been repealed by section 6 of the Act of 1892; and they say that it follows that persons who have made pavements under the Act of 1862 are therefore released from their obligation to uphold them, and that no such obligation can be enforced at all unless it can be enforced under section 141, and that they represented as a reductio ad absurdum of the defender's contention. That, however, is not a conclusive argument in regard to the construction of a statute. But while I do not require to decide what obligation now lies on persons in the position of the defender to uphold the pavements they have made, I see no obvious absurdity in supposing that it was the intention of the Legislature to relieve the owners in such a case, and to lay the burden on the Commissioners. That difficulty, if it be one, cannot, however, convert clause 141 into a clause empowering the Commissioners to order repairs of an existing pavement, or the order under consideration, into an order to repair, which it admittedly is not.”

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNAR concurred.

No. 8.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Airth.

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

SIR ROBERT DRUMMOND MONCREIFFE, BARONET, Pursuer (Respondent).

No. 9.

—Macfarlane—Sym.

WILLIAM SCOTT FERGUSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—W. C. Smith—C. K. Mackenzie.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Moncreiffe v.
Ferguson.

Bankruptcy—Trust for creditors—Adoption of lease by trustee—Deed of assignation and renunciation—Liability for rent.—The tenant of a farm under a lease, granted in 1886, "excluding all assignees, whether legal or voluntary, and all subtenants or trustees or managers for behoof of creditors," on 13th May 1895 executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, in which he assigned to the trustee his whole estate, including the lease of his farm, with full power to enter on and manage the farm till the natural expiry thereof, or to renounce the lease. The landlord on 20th May executed a deed acceding to the trust-deed, and consenting to the assignation of the lease on condition that the trustee should execute a renunciation of the lease as from the next term of Martinmas. On 29th June the trustee executed a renunciation of the lease as from Martinmas 1895, reserving to the landlord his whole rights under the lease down to that term. The trustee managed the farm for six months, and ingathered the crop for the year.

Held that under the deeds the trustee must be held to have possessed the farm as tenant under the lease, and that he was personally liable for the rent of the year during which he had possessed.

By lease dated 22d July 1886, Thomas Richmond became tenant of the farm of Hilton, in the parish of Forteviot, Perthshire, of which Sir Robert Drummond Moncreiffe, Baronet, of Moncreiffe, was the proprietor. The lease "excluded all assignees, whether legal or voluntary, and all subtenants and trustees or managers for behoof of creditors." It further provided that if the tenant should become bankrupt or insolvent, or should execute a trust for creditors, or otherwise divest himself of his effects, the landlord should have the option of declaring the lease void and null at the term of Martinmas following upon such bankruptcy, insolvency, or other act. As arranged by minute of agreement of 20th July 1887, the lease was to endure for ten years, the termination being at Martinmas 1896, and the rent was to be £380.

On 13th May 1895 Mr Richmond executed a trust-deed for behoof of creditors in favour of William Scott Ferguson, farmer, Pictons-hill, Perthshire, by which he disposed, assigned, and conveyed to the latter his whole estate, heritable and moveable, "surrogating hereby and substituting the said William Scott Ferguson as trustee foresaid in my full right and place of the premises"; "and in particular to take charge of and manage in such way as he shall think best the farms of Hilton and Broomhill, of which I am tenant, with the stock and cropping thereon, purchasing and selling from time to time such live stock as may be necessary and expedient for the due and proper conduct and management of said farms, and to carry on the leases of the said farms until the natural expiry thereof, or to renounce and give them up at such time as he shall consider expedient."

1st Division.
Ed Stormonth-
Darling.

No. 9.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Moncreiffe v.
Ferguson.

On 20th May 1895 Sir Robert Moncreiffe executed the following deed:—"I . . . accede to the trust-deed executed by Mr Thomas Richmond on May 13th, 1895, and consent to the assignation of the lease of Hilton therein contained; this accession and consent being on the footing that that lease be renounced by Mr Ferguson as from Martinmas next, and a formal renunciation delivered within three weeks from this date."

Mr Ferguson entered into possession of the farm in May 1895, and on 29th June he executed a renunciation of the lease as at Martinmas following, reserving to Sir Robert Moncreiffe "his whole rights and claims under the lease so far as applicable to the tenancy of the subjects thereunder for the period to the said term of Martinmas 1895."

Mr Ferguson continued in possession of the farm till Martinmas 1895, managing and cultivating it during that time, and reaping the crop of the year.

On 23d January 1896 Sir Robert Moncreiffe raised this action against Mr Ferguson for payment of the sum of £380 as the rent for crop and year 1895, which the pursuer maintained he was bound to pay as assignee of the tenant.

The defender averred,—“The particulars of the defender’s administration as trustee are stated in the joint minute for the parties,* which is referred to for this purpose. In his administration of the estate the defender has done nothing beyond realising crop 1895 and stock in terms of the trust-deed for behoof of the creditors, including the pursuer. No benefit was received by the trust-estate or the conditional defender by the limited assignation of the lease contained in the trust-deed. Explained that in July 1895, after the execution of the renunciation above referred to, a note of the rent due by Mr Richmond to the pursuer, amounting to the said sum of £795, 11s., was lodged with the defender as trustee, and intimation was made that the pursuer claimed out of the trust-estate a preference and full payment of at least the rent for crop 1895. The defender, as trustee on Mr Richmond's estate, rejected the pursuer's claim for full payment of the rent for crop 1895, but admitted him to rank as an ordinary creditor on said sum of £795, 11s."

* “Sym for the pursuer and Smith for the defender concurred in admitting that the total acreage of the farm of Hilton, referred to on record, is 273·606 acres; that when the defender entered on the farm, the whole of the white crop, extending to 89·835 acres, and the whole of the potato crop, extending to 17·848 acres, were already sown; that Swedish turnips, extending to about 12 acres, were also sown; that the remaining turnip crop, extending to about 20 acres, was not sown, but the ground was prepared for sowing, and the defender purchased manure and seeds to the value of £21, 19s. 4d. and applied them, along with other manures purchased and delivered before the trust-deed, and then lying at the farm, in sowing the remainder of the turnip crop; that, at the date of the defender’s appointment, there was a considerable quantity of manure lying at the farm ready for application to the ground, and this was applied by him, the expenditure of the sum stated being all that was required, in addition to said last-mentioned manure, to complete the sowing of the turnip break, and all other manuring; that the defender did not purchase any live stock nor any manure or seeds other than as above mentioned; that the total cost of sowing, manuring, and working the farm for crop 1895 amounted to between £500 and £600, of which all, excepting £40, 5s. 9d., had been expended before the appointment of the defender as trustee; that the grass parks on the farm extended to 112·036 acres, of which 38½ acres were in hay; that all the parks were let by Thomas Richmond, except the break in hay, up till Martinmas 1895; that the defender sold the hay crop on 2d August 1895, and has since sold the white and green crop and stock.”

No. 9.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Moncreiffe v.
Ferguson.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The defender, as Mr Thomas Richmond's assignee in said lease, having occupied and possessed the farm of Hilton thereunder as condescended upon, is liable for the rent stipulated therein for crop and year 1895, with interest thereon, and decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons accordingly. (2) The defender having adopted the lease, is liable for the rent.

The defender pleaded ;—(2) The pursuer having acceded to the said trust-deed, and intimated a claim thereunder, including the sum now sued for, is bound to accept a composition or dividend along with the other creditors, and is barred from suing the present action. (3) The defender, not having adopted the lease in question, should be assoilzied. (4) No benefit under the lease having been assigned to the defender or the trust-estate, and the pursuer having consented to the assignation only conditionally for the limited purpose of enabling the defender to execute the trust by realising the stock and crop 1895, the pursuer is not entitled to found on said assignation as inferring personal liability against the defender.

On 17th June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) decreed against the defender conform to the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—Questions of difficulty have sometimes arisen (as in the case of M^r Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustees, 18 R. 576) where it was necessary to gather from the conduct of parties whether a trustee for creditors had adopted the lease of a farm so as to render himself personally liable for its prestations.

"Here the question of adoption or non-adoption is to be solved, not by conduct, but by documents, and the material documents are (1) the trust-deed in favour of the defender, dated 13th May 1895 ; (2) the accession by the pursuer, dated 20th May 1895 ; and (3) the renunciation by the defender, dated 29th June 1895. The combined effect of these writings is that the lease was assigned to the defender as at 13th May 1895, that the pursuer consented to the assignation on condition that the defender renounced the lease as at the term of Martinmas following, and that the defender did so renounce, expressly reserving to the pursuer his whole rights and claims under the lease, so far as applicable to the tenancy down to that term.

"The defender had full possession under the deeds for six months. His acts of possession are fully detailed in the joint minute, and they probably amounted to nothing more than what was necessary for working and reaping the crop of 1895, with a view of realising and distributing the estate among the creditors. It is probably also true that if there had been no consent by the landlord, and no renunciation by the trustee, the same results could have been achieved, because, by the terms of the lease, the landlord could not have exercised his option of terminating the tenancy till Martinmas 1895, and in the meantime he could not have prevented the tenant continuing in possession and managing for the trustee.

"But the parties chose to arrange matters differently. The assignation in the trust-deed was validated by the landlord's consent. The trustee thereupon became himself the tenant, and in that capacity he renounced the lease. I cannot doubt therefore that he became personally liable for the rent payable during the period of his possession.

"It was argued for the defender that if so he must also be liable for

No. 9.

Oct. 24, 1896.
Moncreiffe v.
Ferguson.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The first question was whether, apart from the deeds, the defender had adopted the lease as tenant so as to render himself liable in its prestations. Now all that he had done was perfectly consistent with the view that he had occupied the farm merely with the view of realising and distributing the estate among the creditors, and without becoming actual tenant.¹ But (2) the various deeds were not inconsistent with this view. The pursuer had consented to the assignation of the lease, not in order to receive the defender as assignee of a continuing liability, but, as the deed of accession bore, to confirm his title to obtain a valid renunciation of the lease with a view to re-letting the farm. The bargain conferred no benefit such as would induce the defender in the interest of the creditors to increase the extent of his liability,²—indeed it was a bargain entirely in favour of the pursuer. The defender could have done all he did without the landlord's consent. If the Lord Ordinary was right, the defender was saddled with liability for arrears of rent as well as for the rent of the current year.³ Such a claim was not made here, and there being nothing to shew an absolute adoption by the defender of the lease, he could not be held liable as tenant under it.⁴

Argued for the pursuer;—The cases relied on by the defender arose with trustees in sequestrations, whose rights were statutory. In this case the trustee derived his rights from a voluntary agreement with the landlord contained in the deeds. Under these deeds he became tenant of the farm, and having the full benefit of the crop for the year, was personally liable for the rent to the pursuer. The fact that the pursuer had not sued for arrears of rent could not deprive him of his right to sue for the rent due in the year of the defender's occupation.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—It appears to me to be clear, on the face of the documents produced, that the defender possessed and cultivated the farm till Martinmas 1895 as tenant under the assignation granted in his favour by Mr Richmond and consented to by the pursuer.

But it is said by the defender that that was not the character in which he possessed the farm. He avers that in point of fact the pursuer never consented to any beneficial assignation of the lease, but only agreed to the occupation of the farm by the defender till Martinmas 1895 in order that the defender might realise the stock and wind up the tenancy, and that in administering the farm he has done nothing beyond realising the crop of the year 1895, and stock, in terms of the trust-deed.

arrears of rent. That is a claim which may sometimes be made against a trustee who adopts a lease, but a landlord by his conduct may very easily waive it, and here it is not made. Certainly, what I am deciding by no means implies that it could be successfully made in the present case."

¹ M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1891, 18 R. 576.

² Gibson v. Kirkland & Sharpe, March 25, 1833, 6 W. & S. 340, per Lord Wynford, p. 351, 5 Scot. Jur. 322; Kirkland v. Cadell, March 9, 1838, 16 S. 860, at p. 881, 10 Scot. Jur. 363.

³ Ersk. Inst. ii. 6, 34; Ross v. Monteith, Feb. 5, 1786, M. 15,290; Dundas v. Morison, Dec. 4, 1857, 20 D. 225, per Lord Cowan, 229, 30 Scot. Jur. 120; Munro v. Fraser, Dec. 11, 1858, 21 D. 103, 31 Scot. Jur. 70.

⁴ Lord Strathmore's Trustees v. Kirkcaldy's Trustees, June 21, 1853, 15 D. 752, 25 Scot. Jur. 455.

It may be, as the Lord Ordinary says, that the defender might have done substantially all that he did towards realising the crop and stock without becoming actual tenant of the farm. I do not know how that may be, but if that was all that was intended it is not easy to understand why the transaction should have taken the form which it did, or why the pursuer's consent to the assignation of the lease in the defender's favour should have been sought and obtained, and the renunciation of the lease by him as tenant stipulated for. I think it is clear that his possession of the farm was as tenant under the aforesaid lease.

It is true that the pursuer acceded to the trust, but it does not follow from that that he was entitled only to a dividend on the rent of the farm for crop and year 1895. If I am right in what I have before said, that rent was not a debt of Mr Richmond's, but was due by the defender himself as tenant of the farm for that period.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

LINDSAY, HOWE, & Co., W.S.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

G. & W. RIDDELL, Petitioners (Respondents).—Abel.

WALTER GALBRAITH, Respondent (Reclaiming).—Graham Stewart.

No. 10.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Defect in statement of concurring creditor's claim—Petition for recall—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 21 and 49.—In a petition by a debtor for sequestration the affidavit of the concurring creditor described the debt due to him as "being the amount contained in an account for goods supplied by the deponent" to the debtor. The relative account contained forty-eight items of varying amounts and under different dates. The sole description in the case of each item was "Goods." The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson, diss. Lord M'Laren) granted a petition for recall of the sequestration on the ground that the account produced by the concurring creditor was not sufficiently specific in its terms to satisfy the requirements of the Bankruptcy Act.

Ballantyne v. Barr, January 29, 1867, 5 Macph. 330, followed.

On 17th June 1896 the Sheriff of Aberdeen awarded sequestration of the estates of Alexander Walton, cycle manufacturer, upon the petition of the bankrupt, with the concurrence of John Gordon, cycle warehouseman, Banff, a creditor to the amount of £271, 19s. 10d., who produced an affidavit and relative account.

In the beginning of the following July, Messrs G. & W. Riddell, manufacturers in Aberdeen, creditors of the bankrupt to the amount of £24, 0s. 6d., presented a petition, in which they stated that the account referred to in the affidavit of Mr Gordon, the concurring creditor, was invalid and defective on the ground that no specification was given of the goods alleged to be furnished, "the items being simply stated 'to goods,' and no further vouchers were produced instructing the said items," and craved the Court to recall the sequestration in terms of section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.*

* Section 21 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that in all petitions for sequestration "the petitioning or concurring creditor shall produce with such

No. 9.
Oct. 24, 1896.
Moncreiffe v.
Ferguson.

Oct. 27, 1896.
Riddell v.
Galbraith.

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Pearson.

No. 10.

Oct. 27, 1896.
Riddell v.
Galbraith.

Answers were lodged for Walter Galbraith, C.A., Glasgow, trustee in the sequestration, who submitted that there was no defect in the award of sequestration, and that the petitioners were in any event barred from challenging its validity, in respect that they had appeared and voted at the meeting for the election of a trustee.

The affidavit of Mr Gordon, the concurring creditor, and the account signed as relative thereto, were produced. The affidavit described the deponent's debt as "being the amount contained in an account for goods supplied by the deponent to the said Alexander Walton," commencing 21st November 1895, and ending 30th May 1896. The account contained forty-eight items of varying amounts and under different dates, the words "to goods" being the only information given as to each item.

On 24th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) recalled the sequestration.*

petition an oath to the effect hereinafter specified, and also the account and vouchers of the debt as hereinafter provided; failing which production, the petition shall be dismissed."

Section 49 enacts,—“To entitle a creditor to vote or draw a dividend he shall be bound to produce at the meeting, or in the hands of the trustee, an oath to the effect, and taken in manner hereinbefore appointed in the case of creditors petitioning for sequestration, and the account and vouchers necessary to prove the debt referred to in such oaths.”

* “OPINION.— . . . Messrs Riddell now petition for recall of the sequestration, on the ground that the affidavit and claim of the concurring creditor was radically defective, on the face of it. . . .

“The statutory requisites are set forth in section 21 of the Bankruptcy Act, thus:—‘The petitioning or concurring creditor shall produce with such petition an oath to the effect hereinafter specified, and also the account and vouchers of the debt as hereinafter provided; failing which production, the petition shall be dismissed.’ The old statute of 54 George III. required production of ‘the grounds of debt or a certified copy of the account’; but these words do not occur in the Act of 2 and 3 Victoria, or in the subsisting Act. The requisite now is, production of ‘the account and vouchers of the debt as hereinafter provided,’ that is (apparently) as provided in section 49, namely, ‘the account and vouchers necessary to prove the debt referred to in such oath.’

“Now in the case of a claim upon an open account for goods supplied, there are no vouchers in the strict sense of that word. But it is the more necessary that the account itself should be specific, not merely as to date and price, but as to the description of the goods supplied. It was pointed out that here the ‘goods’ were furnished by a cycle warehouseman to a cycle manufacturer; and I was asked to draw the inference that the goods had to do with cycles and their appurtenances. But in my opinion that is not enough. I think that all parties concerned are entitled to more specific information in the account itself; and the tradesman's own books ought to have enabled him to furnish that information. Accordingly this seems to me not so much a failure to vouch, but rather a failure to lodge a proper account.

“The point seems to me to be decided by the case of Ballantyne v. Barr (1867), 5 Macph. 330. There the concurring creditor's account amounted to £57, 10s. It consisted of five items. The first three were unobjectionable. The fourth was £10 for ‘cash lent you’; and the fifth was, ‘June 18.—To amount of goods, £17.’ The Court held that both these were inadmissible; Lord Neaves saying expressly, ‘the £17 which is essential to bring the creditor's claim up to the statutory amount is stated in a form which is quite insufficient and incompetent.’

“This being so, the question is not one of discretion but of competency.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The account was sufficiently specific, and the Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the case fell under the judgment in Ballantyne.¹ While that case resembled the present, it was distinguishable in two respects—(1) There was some possibility in that case of the account embracing a variety of goods. Here it was clear from the nature of the buyer's and seller's business that the "goods" must have been cycles. (2) In *Ballantyne*¹ goods supplied at different times appeared to have been slumped together in the account. At all events the defect was not such as necessarily to lead to the recall of the sequestration, and that being so, the petitioner having taken an active part in the proceedings under the sequestration was not entitled to succeed.²

No. 10.
Oct. 27, 1896.
Riddell v.
Galbraith.

Argued for the petitioner;—The account was not sufficiently specific in its terms. The nature of the goods supplied must be specified. The defect was a radical defect, on account of which the Court was bound to recall the sequestration.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think with his Lordship that the point is decided by the case of Ballantyne.¹ It is extremely difficult, as Mr Stewart avowed, to find any distinction, and I do not think, so far as I can satisfy myself, that the distinctions which have been pointed out are substantial. I think they are rather superficial. It seems to me that the view of the Court there was that, in as much as an open account cannot be instructed by vouchers in the proper sense of the term, there is the more need for there being such a specification as shall indicate to the body of creditors what is the origin and nature of the claim. Now, in the case there, as here, the use of the general word "goods" does not advance knowledge at all, and accordingly it seems to me that, in reason, the Court had very good ground for holding that that was not an adequate compliance with the rule of the statute, and that they were not furnished with the measure of information which enabled the persons interested to scrutinise and judge of the validity of the claim. Accordingly, treating this as a subject-matter upon which the law ought to be settled by a decision, I for my part am disposed to follow the case of Ballantyne,¹ which disposes both of the question of the sufficiency of the account and

The objection is one which appears on the face of the claim, and is not within the rule applicable to cases where the objection is latent, that the Court may recall the sequestration or not, upon general grounds of expediency—Mitchell v. Motherwell (1888), 16 R. 122.

"For the same reason, I think the plea of acquiescence in the sequestration, through Messrs Riddell having voted in the election of trustees, must be rejected. This question also arose in the case of Ballantyne v. Barr, and was so decided by the Court, distinguishing it from Ure v. M'Cubbin (1857), 19 D. 758.

"I therefore recall the sequestration. The expenses of the petition itself cannot be allowed—Smith Brothers & Co. (1860), 23 D. 140; and with regard to the expenses caused by the opposition, I think that in the circumstances none should be awarded."

¹ Ballantyne v. Barr, Jan. 29, 1867, 5 Macph. 330, 39 Scot. Jur. 149.

² Ure v. M'Cubbin, May 28, 1857, 19 D. 758, 29 Scot. Jur. 353.

³ Ballantyne v. Barr, supra, note 1; Tennant v. Martin & Dunlop, March 6, 1879, 6 R. 786, per Lord President Inglis at p. 788; Mitchell v. Motherwell, Nov. 22, 1888, 16 R. 122.

No. 10.
Oct. 27, 1896.
Riddell v.
Galbraith.

also of the legal result. For if this be not a claim vouched in terms of the statute, then the sequestration should not have been granted, and it is not a matter of discretion, but of right, that the sequestration should be recalled.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—My opinion does not affect the decision of this case, but it is right that I should indicate the grounds upon which it proceeds. The statute requires that the petitioning creditor should supplement his affidavit of debt by production of the account and vouchers instructing the claim. That has been, I think, quite correctly interpreted to mean that he must produce the account of his claim, and the vouchers, if any. Of course there could not be any in the case of an account of goods sold. The question therefore is whether the account is correctly stated. Now, in my opinion, the account in this case is a perfectly good account. It is stated in the form in which accounts are usually rendered by one dealer to another, and no doubt it is just a transcript of the account in the creditor's ledger. The objection made is that there is not a description of the goods supplied under each item. I think such description is not necessary to the correctness of a business account, and although there is a case to the contrary decided in the other Division of the Court, I do not think it necessary to suppress my opinion in deference to a single decision.

If the question were one of mere form I should say nothing. The decision would only involve the presentation of a new petition for sequestration. But the point is of substance, because one important object of a sequestration is to prevent the acquisition of preferences, and of course such may have been acquired if the existing sequestration is cut down. Now, a bankrupt might be induced to present an application for sequestration on an imperfect account knowing that the other creditors would rely upon it, and a secured creditor might in the meantime acquire a preference contrary to the spirit of the bankruptcy laws.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair and Lord Adam. I think that the question is ruled by the case of Ballantyne v. Barr,¹ and that we are bound to follow that decision. This is a branch of law in which it is extremely important that rules of practice once authoritatively laid down should be fixed, and that the Sheriffs of this country would be placed in a difficult position if the decisions in this Court varied from time to time. I think we should follow the decision in Ballantyne,¹ and I confess I do not see any ground to doubt the soundness of that decision.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—CAIENS, M'INTOSH, & MORTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 11.
Oct. 27, 1896.
Tosh v.
Ferguson.

MRS MARTHA FERGUSON OR TOSH AND ANOTHER, Pursuers
(Respondents).—J. A. Reid.

WILLIAM FERGUSON, Defender (Appellant).—Sym.

Process—Appeal for jury trial—Proof—Remit to Lord Ordinary—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 40.—In an action of account—ing raised in a Sheriff Court the defender, having appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, moved for a proof in the Court of Session. The pursuer submitted that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court for proof. No. 11.

Oct. 27, 1896.
Tosh v.
Ferguson.

Held that the proper course was to take the proof in the Court of Session, there being no circumstances rendering the case specially suited for trial in the Sheriff Court.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at the instance of Mrs Martha Ferguson or Tosh and her husband against William Ferguson, farmer, Glen Prosen, her father. The pursuers craved decree ordaining the defender to account for his intromissions with the funds of the female pursuer, and in particular with a sum of £486, of which he was alleged to have had the custody, and with which he was alleged to have intromitted, between 1889 and 1896. 1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of For-farshire.

Proof having been allowed in the Sheriff Court, the defender appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act; and, after stating an objection to the relevancy, moved, in the event of that objection not being sustained, for a proof in the Court of Session.

He argued;—It was competent for the Court to treat the case as if it had originated in the Court of Session, and there being no circumstances rendering the case peculiarly adapted for trial in the Sheriff Court, the proper course of procedure was that proof should be taken before a Judge of the Court of Session.¹

Argued for the pursuers;—The case was suitable for trial in the Sheriff Court, and could be more conveniently and inexpensively tried there. The case not being suited for jury trial should therefore be remitted to the Sheriff for proof.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—At this time of day it is of course impossible to dispute that the Court has power to send back to the Sheriff Court for trial there a case appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act. But then it is necessary to observe that that has only been done where circumstances could be pointed to which rendered the Sheriff Court peculiarly appropriate as a tribunal for ascertaining the facts. Now, in this case I do not think that Mr Reid has succeeded in pointing to any such specialties. It is a substantial case; it has not more local colour than belongs to other questions of disputed fact; and there are no greater facilities in the Sheriff Court for its determination than here. Accordingly, I think that, having regard to the authorities, the proper course is to have a proof in the Court of Session, and I suggest that it should be remitted to the Outer-House, and in the Outer-House to Lord Kincairney.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT remitted to Lord Kincairney to take the proof.

REID & GUILD, W.S.—MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Cochrane v. Ewing, July 20, 1883, 10 R. 1279; Willing & Co. v. Hays & Sons, Nov. 15, 1892, 20 R. 34; Crabb v. Fraser, March 8, 1892, 19 R. 580; Willison v. Petherbridge, July 15, 1893, 20 R. 976.

² Bain v. Countess of Seafeld, Feb. 13, 1894, 21 R. 536.

No. 12.

Oct. 28, 1896.
Sangster's
Trustees v.
General
Accident
Insurance Corporation,
Limited.

of his representatives. I do not think that a fair way of reading the contract, because the general words "or otherwise wilfully, wantonly, or negligently exposing himself to any unnecessary danger," follow an enumeration of specific cases, and the kind of case intended to be embraced by the general words must be such as the cases specifically enumerated. Now, the characteristic of the specifically enumerated cases is this, that in them the danger was obvious. It was not that the thing might be dangerous according as the circumstances on subsequent examination turned out, but the thing itself must be dangerous. For example, "travelling by rail in any other than a passenger carriage," or "acting in violation of the bye-laws of a railway or tramway company," or "riding horse or cycle races or steeple-chases," all these things have got danger written on the face of them, and it does not depend upon an examination and analysis of the circumstances whether they are found to be dangerous or not, but they are seen to be dangerous. All that can be said in the present case is that the deceased did not sufficiently realise the cold of the water, or his own capacity to stand cold, or that the boat was so constructed that it would be difficult to get into it without assistance. Whatever view as to the state of the facts the reclaimers choose to take—and they have left the matter rather vague—they are not able to say that what the deceased did was of itself a dangerous operation, or rather, I should say, they are not able to shew that it was seen to be, or was obviously, a dangerous operation. Accordingly, I think the circumstances of the case will not sustain the contention of the reclaimers, and I thoroughly concur in the judicious view of the case taken by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

WM. RITCHIE RODGER, S.S.C.—MILL, BONAR, & HUNTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

THOMAS FERGUSON SOMERVILLE, Pursuer (Appellant).—

A. S. D. Thomson—Munro.

WILLIAM BURNETT HARDIE, Defender (Respondent).—D. Dundas.

Reparation—Negligence—Unfenced hatchway in shop.—A small shop had a counter on one side extending 8 feet from the door, but the part intended for customers was only the 5½ feet nearest the door. At this distance from the door a barrier was formed across the shop by a box 2 feet wide placed close to the wall opposite the counter, and by the hinged lid of an open hatchway 3 feet square which fenced the hatchway from the front shop. The space between the edge of the lid and the counter, 11 inches, was kept open as a passage for the shopman. The side of the hatchway adjoining the passage was not fenced.

A customer on entering the shop found the shopkeeper engaged with another customer, and the shopboy standing near the door. He playfully took the latter by the ear and led him to the narrow passage leading to the back of the shop. The boy then went round to the back of the counter and the customer stood in the narrow passage joking with him. On turning to leave it he fell into the hatchway and was injured.

In an action of damages brought by the customer against the shopkeeper, held (1) that the defender was in fault in not having the hatchway sufficiently fenced, and (2) that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer,—diss. Lord Moncreiff, who held that if there was fault on the part of the defender there had been contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer. No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

THOMAS FERGUSON SOMERVILLE, pattern-maker, Glasgow, brought this action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against William Burnett Hardie, ham-curer, Glasgow, for damages for injuries sustained by the pursuer from falling into a hatchway in the floor of the defender's shop. The pursuer pleaded that the defender was in fault in not having the hatchway fenced. 2^D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The accident to the pursuer having been the result of his own negligence and carelessness, the defender should be assolizied, with expenses. (2) The pursuer having by his own negligence contributed to the accident in question, defender is entitled to absolvitor.

The following facts were proved :—The defender's premises consisted of a small shop with one window, and a counter 8 feet in length along one side. The only part of the counter intended for customers was the 5½ feet next the door. At this distance from the door the front shop was separated from the back of the shop by a heavy box 2 feet wide, placed against the wall opposite the counter, and by the hinged lid of a hatchway 3 feet square, which stood open and rested for a few inches on the box and fenced the open hatchway behind from the front shop. Between the edge of this lid and the counter a narrow passage of 11 to 12 inches was left for the use of the shopman as an access to the back of the shop. There was no fence between the open hatchway and the narrow passage.

On the occasion in question the pursuer and a friend on entering the shop found the shop-assistant Knox, a boy of fourteen, standing at the door. The defender was in the shop attending to a female customer. The pursuer addressed Knox in a playful manner, and asking him if he had no work to do, he took him by the ear and led him from the door to the narrow passage. Knox went behind the counter by the narrow passage past the hatchway. The pursuer, standing in this passage, continued to laugh and jest with Knox until the woman was served, when he turned in order to approach the defender. In doing so he fell into the hatchway and dislocated his shoulder.

It was proved that on a previous occasion a little boy who had visited the shop as a customer fell down the hatchway.

The details of the evidence are given in the opinions of the Judges.

The Sheriff-substitute (Balfour), after finding the facts above stated, proceeded :—“ Finds that there was abundant space for the pursuer and his friend to stand at the counter alongside the female customer without coming in contact with the hatch : Finds that there were no goods lying for sale on the counter, but they were exposed for sale at the window : Finds that the narrow passage between the hatch and the counter is about 12 inches broad, and that the passage is not intended for customers at all, and there was no occasion for the pursuer going into that passage to make his intended purchase : Finds that the trap-door covering the hatch was standing in a vertical position protecting the end of the hatch, and it was kept in position by a box 3 feet long and 2 feet broad, which was placed against the wall of the shop and against a portion of the end of the trap-door, all as shewn on the plan : Finds that the pursuer was not drunk, but he was affected by liquor, having had a glass of whisky and a glass of beer immediately before the accident, and he was in a frolicsome humour : Finds that

No. 13.
Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

on the occasion in question the pursuer, although an ordinary customer of the shop and intending to make a purchase, was not acting as a customer should have acted, but he led both the boy and himself into danger by dragging the boy by the ear into the narrow passage: Finds that to an ordinary customer conducting himself properly the hatch was little source of danger, especially when only three customers had to be served: Finds that the pursuer brought the accident on himself by his frolicsome and irregular conduct, and the defender is not to blame for it: Therefore assolvies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns." *

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The defender was in fault because in that part of the shop to which the public were invited there was an open trap, which was dangerous. The pursuer had a right to stand in the narrow passage as it was in front of the counter, and therefore it was offered to the public as safe for standing.¹ The pursuer was not bound to examine the floor. He was entitled to count on its safety. The hatchway should have been fenced, especially as it was usual to have it open for ventilation.² Accordingly (2) the pursuer had not been so negligent as to have lost his remedy. Even if the evidence for the defender were believed, the pursuer was entitled to prevail. The Sheriff-substitute attributed the accident to the foolish behaviour of the pursuer, but it was clear that any frolic on his part was over before the accident occurred. When he fell he was behaving like any ordinary customer. Ordinary care would not have saved the pursuer, and therefore, even if he had been negligent, he still could sue, as the main cause of the accident was the negligence of the defender.³

Argued for the defender;—The shopkeeper was bound to provide a safe floor, but the customer was also bound to take reasonable care. The defender had taken sufficient precaution to protect customers from falling down the trap, and only great carelessness, against which he was not bound to provide, would result in such injury. It was such carelessness to enter the narrow space between the counter and the hatchway. A customer had no occasion to do so on business. There were no goods exposed on that part of the counter. The pursuer had no business or excuse to be there. There was room for him to stand

* "NOTE.—If I believed the pursuer's story I would probably find the defender liable in damages. If he had acted as an ordinary customer on the occasion, and had got into the narrow space between the hatch and the counter while waiting to be served, I think the defender might have been liable for his falling into the hatch, because a customer should not have been allowed to stand in the narrow space without at least being cautioned. But I have no confidence whatever in the pursuer's story, and I believe entirely in the version of the facts given by the defender and his witnesses. It would be absurd to hold that where a man goes into a shop and drags the shopboy by the ear into a passage near a hatch which is not intended for customers, the shopkeeper is liable in damages for his falling down the hatch. There was no occasion for the pursuer to be in that part of the shop at all. There was plenty of room for him at the counter, away altogether from the hatch, and he got into the narrow passage through his own silly conduct."

¹ Brady v. Carter, June 7, 1887, 14 R. 783, per Lord Craighill, p. 789; Prentice v. Assets Co., Limited, Feb. 21, 1889, 17 R. 484.

² Cairns v. Boyd, June 5, 1879, 6 R. 1004.

³ Davies v. Mann, Nov. 4, 1842, 10 M. & W. 546.

at the counter in the front of the shop. Besides the place was sufficiently fenced. The hatch in an upright position was a sufficient obstacle, or at least a warning. The narrowness of the footway past it was another call upon the pursuer's vigilance. It was his desire for a frolic which blinded him to such patent warning, and the consequences should fall on him. Such carelessness took the case out of the rule of Davies v. Mann,¹ and it would be a hardship on the defender to hold that he should have provided more elaborate fencing.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After describing the shop and the position of the trap-door)—The first question which we have to consider is, was that a proper state of things, so that if a person who was present as an ordinary customer fell through the trap-door no blame would attach to the owner of the shop? I have given this question careful consideration, and have ultimately come to be of a definite opinion that it was not a proper state of things. Any customer coming into the shop would find a box upon the floor supporting a board, and suppose there were people filling up the shop, or suppose he had to give way to other customers coming in, he might quite well move up the shop with his face to the counter, and get between the counter and this board, without any idea that there was a pit open behind his feet. There was no protection to keep such a customer from falling into the hatchway except the board and a box which kept the board upright. The hatchway was necessarily in shade owing to the position of the counter, which came between it and the window, and the board itself, which came between it and the glass door. There was therefore nothing to call the attention of a customer to the fact that there was a hole in the floor. Indeed, that seems to have been the view of the Sheriff-substitute, for he says, "If he (the pursuer) had acted as an ordinary customer on the occasion, and had got into the narrow space between the hatch and the counter while waiting to be served, I think the defender might have been liable for his falling into the hatch, because a customer should not have been allowed to stand in the narrow space without at least being cautioned." I agree in that. I hold that an ordinary customer standing where the pursuer did, and falling into the hole, would have had a good claim against the defender.

The only remaining question therefore is, whether the pursuer did anything that deprives him of that claim. Now, the allegation is that he was not in a fit state to look after himself; that he had been drinking, and that accordingly he himself was to blame for the accident that occurred to him. That is a charge which must be clearly proved. I am of opinion that it is not proved. The Sheriff-substitute does not hold that it is proved, and the evidence does not support it. The woman who was in the shop says, "I did not see anything in his conduct to show that he was the worse of drink, except that he was carrying on, and coming in arm-in-arm with the other man to the shop, and then laughing and joking at the other end of the counter." There is no counter evidence. But in my opinion the strongest, and indeed the conclusive evidence on this matter is that of the doctor who examined him immediately after the accident. He has necessarily experience

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

¹ 10 M. & W. 546.

No. 13. in such matters. It is his business to look into such cases and to distinguish drunkenness from other causes of confusion. He says that the pursuer was perfectly sober, and there is evidence that such was his own belief at the time, because he put the pursuer under chloroform, which he says he would not have done if the pursuer had been the worse of drink. The pursuer therefore was not unfit to look after himself.

Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

It is said that he was in a frolicsome humour, and took the shop-boy by the ear. But it may very well be that he may have done so without being drunk, and without doing anything to deprive him of his claim against the defender if the defender was in fault. To take a boy by the ear in a frolicsome humour is not fault or negligence. It is not disputed that the pursuer came into the shop to buy. He says he moved up the counter a little to let a woman in to the counter who was beckoned forward by the defender. It may be that this was not necessary, but he may have moved so as to give her more room. When he had moved up he still stood at the counter although the hole of the hatchway was just behind him. Now, when he was standing waiting to be served as a customer at the counter, in such a position, as the Sheriff-substitute says, he should have been cautioned. He certainly should have been cautioned by the defender or his assistant, who, it is proved, saw him standing there and was speaking to him at the time. But he was allowed to stand in such position that by moving his foot slightly he fell into the hole. It was certainly no reason for not cautioning him that he was in a frolicsome humour and had taken a boy by the ear.

I am therefore unable to hold that the shop was in a proper condition, and I am also unable to hold that, if the defender would have been liable to an ordinary customer, the pursuer did anything to deprive him of his claim.

I have considered the question of damages, and I would move your Lordships to award the sum of twenty-five pounds.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a case of the kind and class in which we are especially unwilling to interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. Having, as the result of the hearing, formed an impression adverse to his judgment in this case, I have considered the case with care and anxiety, reading the evidence carefully. The impression which I formed after the argument has been confirmed into a distinct opinion that the judgment is erroneous and cannot stand.

With reference to the question—which is the first question in the case—whether the floor was in a safe condition—that is, safe for customers who were entitled and invited to come into the shop—there is in my opinion no room for doubt. The Sheriff-substitute himself is of opinion that the floor of the shop was not in a proper state. He says, no doubt, that “to an ordinary customer conducting himself properly the hatch was little source of danger, especially when there were only a few people in the shop,” but he is of opinion that the shop was not in a safe condition. It was a small shop. I do not need to describe the hatchway, but it was situated only 11½ inches from the counter, and the only but quite distinct and reliable evidence is to the effect that it was dangerous, and that evidence is uncontradicted. That is the evidence of Robert Hay, the architect who made the plan. He says,—“If there was a box on which the hatchway door was resting, that would mislead customers. I would consider that if the hatch was to be left open during business hours it would be dangerous to customers. That danger could have been obviated by putting something in front of the opening between the counter and the hatchway, so that it would have been impossible for the customers to get through.” The defender explains why the hatchway was left open, and why nothing was done to prevent customers getting into the narrow space. He says,—“The narrow space is not intended for customers at all; we need it for ourselves; but I fancy nobody would attempt to go through there. I cure my hams down stairs. For ventilation purposes that hatchway is open night and day, unless when we are getting in anything, and we then require to put it down to let the goods get past, but after that it is put up again.” But it was used as a passage. The defender says he used to walk sideways between it and the counter, but he did not expect customers to do so, but a customer did do so. I think this was a dangerous state of matters. If a customer coming in failed to see the hole, or omitted to remember that there was a hole, and came along the counter as far as the narrow place, if he attempted to turn when he was in that position it might have cost him his life. In the present case the pursuer only dislocated his shoulder, but his injuries might have been much more serious, and even fatal. That is a danger to which customers ought not to be exposed.

Of course a customer may deprive himself of his right to claim damages for injuries resulting from the faulty condition of the shop if such injuries are attributable to notable misconduct or impropriety of conduct on his part. I do not think the pursuer was guilty of any such conduct on this occasion. I would not be inclined to characterise his conduct as even frolicsome. But even if it could properly be so characterised, I do not think that the taking of a boy by the ear would be notable misconduct of such a class as to prevent him from suing for damages for injuries caused by the state of the floor. What are the facts? It appears that the pursuer came into the shop to buy some lard. Before he came in the defender and the shop-boy were playing dominoes. When the woman came in they left off playing dominoes. The boy says he went to the door to talk to a friend. When the pursuer came in and found the boy outside he seems to have used a word of which we cannot approve, and told him to go on with his work. But that was not such impropriety of conduct as to deprive him of his claim against the defender. Then he caught hold of the boy by the ear. The Sheriff-substitute uses the expression “dragging the boy by the ear.” That was not proper language to describe what happened. So far as appears, the boy was not hurt at all. The woman White says the pursuer was “laughing and joking at the end of the counter” with the boy. The boy went round inside, and the pursuer remained on the other side and was laughing with the boy. The master was there and saw them, and he did not say, “Come out of that passage, it is only for our use.” The pursuer took up a knife and drew it along the counter. The Sheriff-substitute says he was carving on the counter, but that was quite an exaggeration. The pursuer, in all that he did, was not acting like a drunk man or a man

No. 13.
Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

No. 187
 Oct. 29, 1896.
 Somerville v.
 Hardie.

affected by drink. What happened was, that as he was standing at the counter joking with the boy, and waiting to be served, and not knowing, or not remembering, that there was an open hatchway behind him, he put back his foot and met with his accident. It is not doubtful that he met with the accident in consequence of the state of the floor. As I have said, I think the state of the floor was dangerous. I do not think that his conduct was characterised by any such impropriety as would deprive him of his claim to damages for the accident. In accordance, therefore, with your Lordship, and in accordance with the Sheriff-substitute, and with the only evidence on that matter in the case, I think that a hatchway open to a passage which was open to customers was dangerous and improper. Affirming that proposition, and negating the proposition that there was any such impropriety in the conduct of the pursuer as to deprive him of his claim, I am bound in law to hold that he is entitled to damages from the defender for the injuries he has sustained. I think the sum of £25 is a very moderate amount at which to assess these damages.

LORD TRAYNER.—If I could concur in the finding of the Sheriff-substitute that the “pursuer brought the accident on himself by his frolicsome and irregular conduct,” I should probably concur in his judgment absolving the defender. But I think the Sheriff-substitute’s finding is wrong. The pursuer’s conduct may perhaps be described as frolicsome and irregular, but I can find no connection between it and what subsequently happened. The frolic with the boy had ceased before the accident in question took place, and the accident was not the result of the frolic. The frolic, perhaps, led the pursuer further into the defender’s shop than he would otherwise have gone. But it did not take him beyond the area of the shop, nor to any part of the defender’s premises to which he might not legitimately go as an ordinary customer. He was still in front of the counter at which the defender did business with his customers, and there was nothing to bar the pursuer from taking, as a customer, the position which he did. I think the defender was to blame in having an unprotected open hatchway in his shop, to which all concerned were invited to come. He knew it was dangerous, because a boy had fallen into it before. I think, therefore, that the defender is liable for the damage suffered by the pursuer, and I agree with your Lordship as to the amount which should be awarded.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that the Sheriff’s judgment should not be disturbed. It is possible that a customer might have been elbowed into the narrow passage between the counter and the trap without being aware that he had left the safe part of the floor, and that the trap was open behind him, and might thus, without fault on his part, have fallen backwards and been injured. Even this is improbable, at least in the case of a grown man, the entrance to the passage being so narrow—only $10\frac{1}{4}$ to $12\frac{1}{2}$ inches. If such an accident had occurred we should have had to decide whether the defender was in fault in leaving the trap open.

But in this case, even assuming fault on the part of the defender, the pursuer, with the exercise of ordinary care, might have avoided the risk. He must, or should, have seen the open lid off the trap; and as he could only go into the narrow passage sideways, he must have squeezed himself in deliberately, not in order to be served at the counter, but as I read the evidence, to continue his jokes with the boy. I think it sufficiently appears that the passage was not a place where customers were invited or intended to stand. I must add that I do not think it proved that the pursuer was the worse of drink. No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1896.
Somerville v.
Hardie.

It is a fair jury question whether this recklessness on the pursuer's part materially contributed to the accident. The Sheriff thought it did, and I see no sufficient grounds for differing from him.

If damages are to be given, I think that the sum proposed is moderate.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, sustain the same, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact (1) that on the occasion in question there was a hatchway left standing open, 11½ inches back from the outer edge of the counter, and 5 feet 6 inches from the inside of the entrance-door of the defender's shop; (2) that the pursuer, when standing at the counter, lost his footing in consequence of the hatch being open, and fell down the hatchway; (3) that his shoulder was dislocated by the fall, and that he received a severe shock to his system; and (4) that the pursuer's fall was due to the fault of the defender in leaving the hatchway open and unguarded: Therefore find the defender liable to the pursuer in damages, and assess the same at the sum of £25, for which decern against the defender: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in this and the inferior Court," &c.

DAVID FORSYTH, Solicitor—J. GORDON MASON, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT MACFARLANE MITCHELL AND OTHERS (M'Morland's Trustees), No. 14.

Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Vary Campbell—Wilson.

WILLIAM FRASER AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—

D.-F. Asher—Ure—McClure.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

Company—Shares—Prospectus—Application for shares "on the faith" of the prospectus—Fraud—Proof—Onus—Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 131), sec. 38.—The Companies Act, 1867, section 38, enacts that any prospectus of a company which does not specify any contract entered into by the company or its promoters before the issue of such prospectus "shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the company knowingly issuing the same, as regards any person taking shares in the company on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contract."

A person applied for shares in a joint stock company on a form which requested allotment "upon the terms of the prospectus," and shares were allotted to him.

In an action brought by his representatives against the directors for declarator that the prospectus was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, in respect that it did not specify a certain agreement, the pursuers, to shew that the deceased had applied for the shares on the faith of the prospectus, founded on the terms of his application, and proved that the prospectus had been widely advertised in Glasgow, where the deceased was living. There was no direct evidence that the deceased had read the prospectus. The defenders proved that the deceased had applied for the shares in reliance on the advice of one of the directors who was a personal friend.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

Held that the pursuers had failed to prove that the shares had been applied for on the faith of the prospectus, and that section 38 did not apply.

Company—Application for Shares—Fraud—Concealment of material facts by director who was also vendor to company.—In an action raised by the representatives of A, a deceased coalmaster against one of the directors of a colliery company, which had gone into liquidation, for damages on the ground that the deceased had been induced to take shares in the company by fraudulent representation and concealment on the part of the defender, it was proved—that the deceased, who was an intimate friend of the defender, applied to him for his opinion as to whether the shares of the company were a good investment; that the defender said that the best answer he could give was that he had himself invested in it, and that he had examined the coalfield, and was satisfied that the supply of coal was unlimited and of the best quality, and near shipping ports,—and that these statements were true;—that the defender did not inform the deceased that the coalfield had been bought by him and the other directors (who were described in the prospectus as the vendors) for £30,000, and had been sold to the company for £60,000. It appeared from the report of a mining engineer printed with the prospectus that the collieries were of the value of £60,000, but that it would require a preliminary outlay of £58,000 to develop them properly. It was proved that about a year after the shares were taken by A, two of the directors who were very large shareholders fell into financial difficulties, and that thereafter sufficient capital could not be obtained for the development of the colliery, and the company went into liquidation.

Held that the proof shewed that there was no fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment on the part of the defender.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 30th June 1892 James and William Wood, coalmasters, Glasgow, carrying on business under the firm name of James & William Wood, lessees of the Bryndu Cefu and Glyn Collieries in South Wales, by minute of agreement sold their rights in the leases and the collieries to the said James and William Wood, as individuals, and to George Anderson and William Fraser, for the sum of £30,000, the purchasers to take possession at 1st July 1892. It was afterwards arranged that James M'Killop should join in this speculation, and on 18th August 1892 an agreement was executed in terms identical with that of 30th June, except that M'Killop was named as one of the purchasers, the term of entry being stated to be as at 1st July 1892.

On the same day, 18th August 1892, a minute of agreement was entered into between (1) these five persons, on the first part, as vendors, and (2) Robert King, coalmaster, Glasgow, on behalf of a limited company intended to be formed, with the name Bryndu Coal and Coke Company, Limited, for the sale of the vendors' rights in the collieries at the price of £60,000. It was agreed that the vendors should be deemed to have carried on the business for the company from 1st July 1892.

On 22d August 1892 a prospectus was issued,* in which Messrs

* The prospectus stated that the capital of the company was fixed at £180,000, in 18,000 shares of £10 each, of which 9000 were six per cent cumulative preference shares, and 9000 were ordinary shares.

Further, that "the vendors, who are the promoters of the company, have fixed the price to be paid by the company for the collieries, including leases, pits, machinery, goodwill, and all plant belonging to them on the leaseholds, at £60,000, payable as to £30,000 in 3000 ordinary shares, fully paid up, and the balance of £30,000 in cash. The business will be taken over as at 1st July 1892, from which date all profits will belong to the company. The vendors will receive interest on the portion of the purchase price, payable

James and William Wood, Anderson, Fraser, and M'Killop were No. 14. named as the directors, and also as the vendors.

At a meeting of the directors held on 5th September 1892, it was agreed that the vendors would waive their right to a dividend on their shares for a period of five years, unless a dividend at the rate of 7½ per cent per annum should be paid on the ordinary shares. At that meeting it was also determined to proceed to allotment, and 4012 preference and 1392 ordinary shares were allotted accordingly.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

On 20th October the directors met to consider the financial position of the company, and being of opinion that £30,000 additional capital was required to work the mines, they agreed respectively, in certain proportions, to take, or get their friends to take, ordinary shares to that amount. At this time the total number of shares taken up, including those which the directors had agreed to take, was 11,400, representing a capital of £114,000, of which £60,000 fell to be deducted as the price of the collieries, leaving £54,000 for working capital, development, &c.

On 26th October Mr Patrick M'Morland, coalmaster, Glasgow, applied for 400 shares, and they were allotted to him on 10th November, "in terms of" his application.*

Owing to insufficient capital for the development of the colliery, the company went into liquidation in the end of 1894, and there was no prospect of any return to the shareholders.

In November 1895 Robert Macfarlane Mitchell and others, the testamentary trustees of Mr M'Morland, who died in April 1893, raised this action against William Fraser, James M'Killop, and Robert Alexander Murray, C.A., Glasgow, trustee on the sequestrated estates of James and William Wood, (1) for declarator that the prospectus of the company was fraudulent on the part of the defenders Fraser and M'Killop and of James and William Wood, within the in cash as before mentioned from that date until payment, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. The book and other debts of the business, and the liabilities connected therewith up to 30th June 1892, will be received and discharged by the vendors. The following contract has been entered into, viz. :—An agreement, dated the 18th August 1892, between James Wood, William Wood, William Fraser, George Anderson, and James M'Killop, on the one part, and Robert King, coalmaster, Glasgow, as trustee on behalf of the company, on the other part. The vendors will provide all preliminary expenses incidental to the purchase of the company, up to and including registration. There are also various contracts connected with the properties as a going concern, which it would be inexpedient to publish, and all applicants for shares must be deemed to waive the insertions of dates and names of the parties to any such contracts as may be required under section 38 of the Joint Stock Companies Act, and to accept the above statements as a sufficient compliance with the Act."

A report by Mr Geddes, mining engineer, printed in the prospectus, stated that the collieries were of the value of £60,000, but that an outlay of £58,000 would be required for their development.

* The application was as follows :—"To the Directors of the Bryndu Coal and Coke Co., Ltd.—Gentlemen,—Having paid to your bankers, the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, or the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, the sum of £1000, being a deposit on 400 ordinary shares of £10 each of the above company, I request you to allot the same to me upon the terms of the prospectus dated the 22d August 1892 . . . and I declare that I waive any fuller compliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, than that contained therein, and all my rights and remedies (if any) in connection therewith whether under the said section or otherwise."

No. 14. meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867,* and was issued by them or on their behalf, and that they were bound, jointly and severally, to make reparation for the damage sustained by M'Morland by taking shares in the company on the faith of the prospectus; (2) for payment by the defenders Fraser and M'Killop of £5000; and (3) for declarator that this sum was a just and lawful debt of James and William Wood.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 6) "On the faith of said prospectus and the statements contained therein, the said deceased Patrick M'Morland applied for and was allotted 400 ordinary shares of £10 each of the company, and he paid thereon £4000. His application, which was dated 26th October 1892, especially bears to be made 'upon the terms of the prospectus dated the 22d August 1892, and the memorandum and articles of association of the company.' . . . The letter of allotment, dated 10th November 1892, proceeds 'upon the terms of your application.' The application was made in a printed form issued by the defenders, and which accompanied the prospectus. Mr M'Morland had received and seen a prospectus before he applied. . . . The company, about October 1892, was, as now appears, suffering from having started with too little capital available for actual work after deducting the promotion money. The defenders were all alike anxious to raise more capital, and they mutually agreed and resolved to get persons whom they or any of them knew or could influence to join their company on the faith of the prospectus. The defender Mr M'Killop thereupon, acting for himself and the other defenders, represented to Mr M'Morland, contrary to the facts as then known to the defenders, that the undertaking and arrangements of the company were good, genuine, and satisfactory for an investing shareholder, and that his own personal interest was that of an investing shareholder. . . . Mr M'Morland acted upon the statements in the prospectus conveyed and confirmed to him personally by the defender Mr M'Killop, acting for himself and the other defenders, as aforesaid." (Cond. 11) "The said prospectus was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, in respect of the failure to disclose the said first agreement of 18th August 1892. It was knowingly issued by the Messrs Wood, and the defenders Fraser and M'Killop and Anderson; and the said deceased Patrick M'Morland took shares on the faith of the prospectus. The said first agreement was a material one to be considered by any person taking shares in the company, and the vendors were bound to set the same forth in the prospectus under and in terms of said Act." (Cond. 12) "The statements in the said prospectus were further false and fraudulent in respect (1) The prospectus set forth that the object of the company was to take over and acquire 'the business now carried on by James Wood, William Wood, William Fraser, George Anderson, and James M'Killop, at the collieries known as the Bryndu and Cefu,' whereas, in point of fact, that business had been carried on by James Wood and William Wood alone; and (2) in setting forth that the vendors had fixed the price to be paid for the collieries at £60,000, the prospectus was calculated and intended to represent, and did represent, that that sum had been fixed as the fair value of the collieries, and was to be paid by the company to the proprietors in respect thereof, whereas, in point of fact, the price which they had fixed as the fair value of the collieries to be paid to the proprietors in respect thereof was £30,000. . . ."

* The Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 131), section 38, enacts,—"Every prospectus of a company and every notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares in any joint stock company, shall specify the dates and the names of the parties to any contract entered into by the company, or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof, before the issue of such prospectus or notice, whether subject to adoption by the directors, or the company, or otherwise; and any prospectus or notice not specifying the same shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the company knowingly issuing the same, as regards any person taking shares in the company on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contract."

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—2. The pursuers are entitled under the statute, and also at common law, to decrees as concluded for, in respect (1) the said prospectus was knowingly issued by the defenders Fraser and M'Killop, and the said James and William Wood, and was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867; (2) the said deceased Patrick M'Morland was induced to take shares in said company through the false and fraudulent statements and concealment of material facts made by the defenders Fraser and M'Killop, and the said James and William Wood. 3. The pursuers are, in any event, entitled to decree as concluded for against the defender M'Killop at common law, in respect Mr M'Morland was induced to take shares through the fraud of that defender.

The defence was that there had been no misrepresentation or concealment at common law, and that the contract of 30th June and the first contract of 18th August were not of such a nature as to require disclosure in the prospectus, and that assuming that it should have been disclosed, it fell under the waiver clause in the prospectus, and that Mr M'Morland did not take the shares on the faith of the prospectus.

Proof was led. It appeared that Mr M'Morland was a partner of the firm of James Nimmo & Company, of which Mr M'Killop was also a partner. As delicate health compelled him to spend the winters abroad, he sold his residence in Glasgow in 1890, and after that date when he required to be in Glasgow he lived in the Central Hotel.

It was proved that Mr M'Morland was residing in the Central Hotel from 8th August to 27th August, from 29th August to 1st September, and from 11th October to 27th October in the year 1892, and that the prospectus was largely advertised during the last fortnight of August in the Glasgow Herald and other newspapers supplied to the visitors, and that 50,000 copies of the prospectus were circulated to investors and to persons interested in the coal trade.

Mr M'Killop deponed that at Mr M'Morland's request he called upon him at "the Central Hotel in Glasgow on the 26th October 1892. . . . There were several business matters in connection with our colliery which required to be spoken of between us, and I accordingly went and saw him at the hotel on the date I have mentioned. . . . Mr M'Morland then said that he understood I was associated with some Welsh mining concern, and he wanted to know about it; and he asked my opinion about it as an investment, considering the usual mining risks. Of course mining risks are speculative, and I said to Mr M'Morland that the best answer I could give to his question was the fact that I was putting a considerable stake in it myself. I told him that I had looked over the plans, and that I had never in my experience contemplated such an area of workable coal. I explained that there was an illimitable supply of coal, that

No. 14. meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867,* and was issued by them or on their behalf, and that they were bound, jointly and severally, to make reparation for the damage sustained by M'Morland by taking shares in the company on the faith of the prospectus; (2) for payment by the defenders Fraser and M'Killop of £5000; and (3) for declarator that this sum was a just and lawful debt of James and William Wood.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 6) "On the faith of said prospectus and the statements contained therein, the said deceased Patrick M'Morland applied for and was allotted 400 ordinary shares of £10 each of the company, and he paid thereon £4000. His application, which was dated 26th October 1892, especially bears to be made 'upon the terms of the prospectus dated the 22d August 1892, and the memorandum and articles of association of the company.' . . . The letter of allotment, dated 10th November 1892, proceeds 'upon the terms of your application.' The application was made in a printed form issued by the defenders, and which accompanied the prospectus. Mr M'Morland had received and seen a prospectus before he applied. . . . The company, about October 1892, was, as now appears, suffering from having started with too little capital available for actual work after deducting the promotion money. The defenders were all alike anxious to raise more capital, and they mutually agreed and resolved to get persons whom they or any of them knew or could influence to join their company on the faith of the prospectus. The defender Mr M'Killop thereupon, acting for himself and the other defenders, represented to Mr M'Morland, contrary to the facts as then known to the defenders, that the undertaking and arrangements of the company were good, genuine, and satisfactory for an investing shareholder, and that his own personal interest was that of an investing shareholder. . . . Mr M'Morland acted upon the statements in the prospectus conveyed and confirmed to him personally by the defender Mr M'Killop, acting for himself and the other defenders, as aforesaid." (Cond. 11) "The said prospectus was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, in respect of the failure to disclose the said first agreement of 18th August 1892. It was knowingly issued by the Messrs Wood, and the defenders Fraser and M'Killop and Anderson; and the said deceased Patrick M'Morland took shares on the faith of the prospectus. The said first agreement was a material one to be considered by any person taking shares in the company, and the vendors were bound to set the same forth in the prospectus under and in terms of said Act." (Cond. 12) "The statements in the said prospectus were further false and fraudulent in respect (1) The prospectus set forth that the object of the company was to take over and acquire 'the business now carried on by James Wood, William Wood, William Fraser, George Anderson, and James M'Killop, at the collieries known as the Bryndu and Cefu, whereas, in point of fact, that business had been carried on by James Wood and William Wood alone; and (2) in setting forth that the vendors had fixed the price to be paid for the collieries at £60,000, the prospectus was calculated and intended to represent, and did represent, that that sum had been fixed as the fair value of the collieries, and was to be paid by the company to the proprietors in respect thereof, whereas, in point of fact, the price which they had fixed as the fair value of the collieries to be paid to the proprietors in respect thereof was £30,000. . . ."

* The Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 131), section 38, enacts,—"Every prospectus of a company and every notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares in any joint stock company, shall specify the dates and the names of the parties to any contract entered into by the company, or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof, before the issue of such prospectus or notice, whether subject to adoption by the directors, or the company, or otherwise; and any prospectus or notice not specifying the same shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the company knowingly issuing the same, as regards any person taking shares in the company on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contract."

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—2. The pursuers are entitled under the statute, and also at common law, to decrees as concluded for, in respect (1) the said prospectus was knowingly issued by the defenders Fraser and M'Killop, and the said James and William Wood, and was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867; (2) the said deceased Patrick M'Morland was induced to take shares in said company through the false and fraudulent statements and concealment of material facts made by the defenders Fraser and M'Killop, and the said James and William Wood. 3. The pursuers are, in any event, entitled to decree as concluded for against the defender M'Killop at common law, in respect Mr M'Morland was induced to take shares through the fraud of that defender.

The defence was that there had been no misrepresentation or concealment at common law, and that the contract of 30th June and the first contract of 18th August were not of such a nature as to require disclosure in the prospectus, and that assuming that it should have been disclosed, it fell under the waiver clause in the prospectus, and that Mr M'Morland did not take the shares on the faith of the prospectus.

Proof was led. It appeared that Mr M'Morland was a partner of the firm of James Nimmo & Company, of which Mr M'Killop was also a partner. As delicate health compelled him to spend the winters abroad, he sold his residence in Glasgow in 1890, and after that date when he required to be in Glasgow he lived in the Central Hotel.

It was proved that Mr M'Morland was residing in the Central Hotel from 8th August to 27th August, from 29th August to 1st September, and from 11th October to 27th October in the year 1892, and that the prospectus was largely advertised during the last fortnight of August in the Glasgow Herald and other newspapers supplied to the visitors, and that 50,000 copies of the prospectus were circulated to investors and to persons interested in the coal trade.

Mr M'Killop deponed that at Mr M'Morland's request he called upon him at "the Central Hotel in Glasgow on the 26th October 1892. . . . There were several business matters in connection with our colliery which required to be spoken of between us, and I accordingly went and saw him at the hotel on the date I have mentioned. . . . Mr M'Morland then said that he understood I was associated with some Welsh mining concern, and he wanted to know about it; and he asked my opinion about it as an investment, considering the usual mining risks. Of course mining risks are speculative, and I said to Mr M'Morland that the best answer I could give to his question was the fact that I was putting a considerable stake in it myself. I told him that I had looked over the plans, and that I had never in my experience contemplated such an area of workable coal. I explained that there was an illimitable supply of coal, that

No. 14.
Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

it was in thick sections of first-class quality, and very near the shipping ports. Mr M'Morland followed up my statement by saying that he had a disposition to take a share in the concern, seeing that I was associated with it in the way that he understood. He asked me if there were any shares to dispose of, and I said yes, that they had not all been taken up by the public, and he volunteered to go to the Bryndu office with me in order to take out an allotment at once. So far as I saw, Mr M'Morland had no prospectus of the company. I had no prospectus, and there was no allusion made at that conversation at all to the prospectus of the company. Mr M'Morland's willingness to associate himself with the concern was entirely in confidence of my individuality, seeing that I was associated with the mines. (Q.) He had confidence in you? (A.) Well, he had great reason to have confidence in me from past experience. Nothing passed at that meeting at all to indicate that he had ever seen the prospectus, or that he was proceeding to any extent on the facts stated in the prospectus. As far as I could judge, in taking the shares he was proceeding entirely upon the fact of my being associated with the mines. After our conversation Mr M'Morland and I went to the office of the company; he volunteered to go, as he intended to leave Glasgow within a few days. When we got to the office of the company, Mr M'Morland asked for a form to fill up. He sat down to write out the form, and when I asked how many shares he purposed to take out he said 500 shares. I then told him I thought that he should not take out such a number, and that he should restrict himself to not more than 400 shares. He then wrote out an application for 400 shares, and handed it to the secretary." In cross-examination Mr M'Killop stated that he did not mention the unregistered agreement of 18th August 1892, and added,—“I did not think it would have been fair to tell him about that.” He did not tell him of the resolution of the directors on 20th October 1892,* that £30,000 additional capital was required, because he had no reason to doubt that capital would be got. With reference to this meeting, witness further deponed,—“When I entered into that arrangement I had no doubt in my mind that, by the application of capital to this colliery, it could be made a profitable concern. Neither I nor the other directors had any motive or interest to decide to put in an additional £30,000 except to get profit out of the concern. (Q.) At that time had your view to any extent changed as to its being an excellent thing? (A.) It never has changed. I had the same opinion of it in October 1892 as I had when I first decided to go into it, and I had the same view when the company went into liquidation.”

* Minute of meeting of directors, 20th October 1892. All the directors present:—“The directors considered the financial position, and were of opinion that £30,000 additional capital was required to carry out the undertaking at Bryndu, and also to open up new shaft at Glyn . . . and the directors agreed to take or get their friends to take ordinary shares to the extent of £30,000 in the following proportions:—

“ James Wood to the extent of . . .	£10,000
“ William Wood „ „ . . .	10,000
“ James M'Killop „ „ . . .	3,330
“ Wm. Fraser „ „ . . .	3,340
“ George Anderson „ „ . . .	3,330
<hr/>
“ £30,000 ”

No. 14.

Mr Fraser, one of the defenders, deponed,—“I was present at the meeting of 20th October 1892. I am put down in that minute for £3340 worth of shares. That was of course in addition to the 350 shares which had been already allotted to me. I was an assenting party to that arrangement. That was virtually an agreement amongst the directors to put £30,000 more into the concern. As the result of our deliberations at that meeting we had all the greatest confidence in the value of the property if we had the thing developed. (Q.) By the arrangement in the minute to which I have just referred you, you become virtually liable for £3340. In assenting to that arrangement, had you any doubt that you were putting your money into a good concern? (A.) The fact that I had at that stage put between £6000 and £7000 into the concern is the best evidence of my opinion. It was undoubtedly my opinion at that time that I was putting my money into a good concern. As far as I had any means of judging, that was also the opinion of my co-directors who consulted with me and concurred in the minute of 20th October. I took the £3340 worth of shares which I had undertaken by the minute to take, and paid for them myself. All the other directors, with the exception of Mr Anderson, carried out their part of the minute and put into the concern the money which is opposite their names, by themselves or their friends.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

(Q.) When did you begin to find out that the Woods' financial position would not enable them to contribute so much towards the development of the colliery as you had expected? (A.) When we got to the point where £7, 10s. had been paid on the shares and the next call became due, we discovered that the Woods were not in a position to meet that call. I should say that was in July 1893, about a year after the formation of the company. The Woods had large commercial enterprises going on at different places, including very extensive collieries over the west of Scotland, and up till that date everybody had regarded them as men with a very large amount of capital. When we discovered that they could not meet this last call on their shares, Mr M'Killop and I took over the shares they had, and paid the calls upon them which were then due. (Q.) Did this failure on the part of the Messrs Wood to continue to take their part in financing the company seriously disturb your arrangements within the company for financing it? (A.) It was the failure of the Messrs Wood that was the sole cause of the failure of the Bryndu Company. They were of course by far the largest holders of stock amongst the directors. After that the question of providing further capital from time to time engaged the attention of the directors. (Q.) Did they ultimately find that they were not in a position to obtain the amount of capital necessary for the development of the colliery? (A.) Mr M'Killop and I felt the whole burden to rest upon ourselves, and we felt ourselves quite unequal, in view of what we had already sunk in the business, to go further with the thing, and we appealed to the shareholders to assist us with the necessary capital to complete the development, but the shareholders declined, and hence liquidation followed. My opinion is still the same, that if the development had been carried through, as foreshadowed in the prospectus, the collieries would have been highly successful.”

Mr Thomas Russell, solicitor, Paisley, deponed that he prepared the agreement of 30th June 1892; that he asked the parties to it whether it was their understanding that it should be a binding agreement whether a company was formed or not, and that they said that it was;

No. 14.
 Oct. 29, 1896.
*M'Morland's
 Trustees v.
 Fraser.*

and in regard to the prospectus, he deponed,—“I acted as law-agent in the matter. I considered whether the agreement of the 30th June fell to be mentioned in the prospectus or not. My opinion was, that as the parties at the time were neither directors nor promoters, it was not necessary to refer to the agreement of 30th June in the prospectus. I also considered the question with regard to the agreement of August, and my opinion was that as it was the same agreement, the same in substance, with the mere addition of a name, it could not affect the matter. I got no instructions of any kind from any of the parties as to either putting in or keeping out that agreement from the prospectus. That was a matter which was entirely in my hands as law-agent, and the question was never put to me.”

The following letters from Mr M'Morland to his law-agent, Mr Taylor, were produced:—“London, 17th Nov. 1892.—I have yours of the 11th. I told Mr M'Killop to call on you to explain matters about the Bryndu Colliery, which I thought he would have done, otherwise I would have written you about it. I only fixed the 400 shares on the eve of starting for London. You might drop him a note the first time he is in town to call on you, when he will give you full particulars. From what he says and assures me of his personal knowledge with regard to everything connected with the colliery seems very good. Of course a good deal depends upon the management, but from what I hear, both from himself and others, I have reason to believe it will be a good venture. Mr M'Killop is a director, and has personally examined the mines, and finds them in every respect satisfactory. The quality and thickness of seams good, and within easy access of Cardiff for shipment, being only eight miles, which is a great advantage. Therefore, if well managed, I don't see why it should not pay well. However, that is to be seen in the future. I wired you to pay the first call on allotment, which I presume you have done.”

“London, 23d Nov. 1892.— . . . Regarding the Bryndu Colliery, I have written M'Killop to call on you and explain matters, which I have no doubt he will do when in town. I have reason to believe from all accounts it is a good genuine venture. Had Mr Mac. not been interested and surveyed the mine for himself, I would not have put a penny into it, as I don't believe much in mining unless the subjects are good, from good authority, and also the management. He will give you a prospectus, and give you all particulars.”

On 6th June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders.*

* “OPINION.—The pursuers here sue for damages in respect that their author, the late Mr M'Morland, was induced to take shares in a certain mining company by the fraud of the defenders, who were the promoters and vendors, and also the whole directors of the company. The leading ground of action is that the defenders failed to disclose in the prospectus a certain contract—or, rather, two contracts—which, according to the pursuers, ought to have been disclosed in terms of section 38 of the Companies Act of 1867. The pursuers also allege a case of misrepresentation or concealment at common law. Now, I have not found it necessary to decide the somewhat difficult questions upon the construction of the 38th section of the Act of 1867, which were raised and argued at the debate. The contract of 18th August 1892 (following on the previous contract of 30th June 1892) is one as to the duty to disclose which I should have had little doubt, but for one circumstance, and that is, I think, the somewhat unusual circumstance that in this case the promoters and directors are themselves disclosed as

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—On the statute.—In buying his shares M'Morland relied on the statements in the prospectus. As a man engaged in business akin to that of the company, he must be taken to have seen and read it in one of the numerous forms in which it was circulated. On M'Killop's evidence it was clear that M'Morland knew of the company, and the natural inference was that he had seen the prospectus. His letters pointed in the same direction. This application was made on the form attached to the prospectus, and he bought upon the terms in the prospectus, which warranted the inference that he had read it, especially in a question with the defenders, who, since they were bound by its terms, were barred from denying the inference. The inference was enough, and actual proof unnecessary.¹ His consultation with M'Killop did not affect the position. It was not necessary to prove that he had bought in sole reliance on the prospectus.² Nor did the pursuers require to shew that he would not have taken the shares if he had known about these contracts. It was enough that he had been influenced by a prospectus which contained this vice.³ The failure to specify the first contract of 18th August 1892 made the prospectus fraudulent.⁴

The waiver clause.—It was questioned whether such clauses were the vendors to the company. The defenders are the sole vendors and the sole directors, and it was therefore plain to any person reading the prospectus that the directors of the company, and every one of them, had an interest adverse to the company. How any intending investor should have invested in a company where that was the state of affairs, I do not myself understand. But that is undoubtedly a peculiarity in this case,—a peculiarity which appears to me to raise a perhaps difficult question as to whether or not the prospectus was fraudulent in respect of the non-disclosure of the contract or contracts in question. I have not found it necessary, as I have said, to determine that difficult question, and I am glad that that is so, because it may come up in some other case. What appears to me to be enough for the decision of this case is, that I have come to the conclusion, upon the evidence, that the pursuers have failed to shew that their author took shares in this company on the faith of the prospectus. That is a question of fact; and having given full attention to the evidence and to the excellent argument which I had upon its import from the pursuers' counsel, I am unable to hold that there is sufficient evidence that Mr M'Morland took shares on the faith of the prospectus. That being so, it is admitted the 38th section of the Companies Act does not apply.

"Then as to alleged misrepresentation at common law, I confess I do not think that was made out. I do not think there is evidence that Mr M'Killop or any of the defenders made misrepresentations to the pursuers' author upon material matters of fact. And that being so, I think the result is that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, and, of course, with expenses."

¹ Smith v. Chadwick, 1884, L. R., 9 App. Ca. 187, per Lord Blackburn, p. 196; Peek v. Gurney, 1873, L. R., 6 Eng. and Ir. App. Ca. 377, p. 410.

² Andrews v. Mockford, 1896, L. R., 1 Q. B. 372.

³ Arnison v. Smith, 1889, L. R., 41 Ch. D. 348, p. 359.

⁴ Cornell v. Hay, 1873, L. R., 8 C. P. 328; Askew's case, 1874, 22 W. R. 833 (not reversed on this point), L. R., 9 Ch. App. 664; Charlton v. Hay, 1874, 31 L. T. (N. S.) 437; Twycross v. Grant, 1877, L. R., 2 C. P. D. 469, per Cockburn, C. J., and Brett, L. J., pp. 527 and 546; Sullivan v. Mitcalf, 1880, L. R., 5 C. P. D. 455, per Theisger and Baggallay, L. J. J., pp. 460-465; Huntingdon Copper Co. v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, 4 R. 294, 5 R. (H. L.) 1; Buckley, Companies Acts, 570; Palmer's Company Precedents, 85; Lindley's Law of Companies, 91.

No. 14.
Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

legal.¹ But even assuming their validity, the defenders could claim no advantage from this clause, as they were confronted with this dilemma—either the clause admitted that there were contracts not divulged, and pretended that these were trading contracts, whereas the contracts of 30th June and 18th August 1892 were not trading contracts, and the defenders could not take benefit from their fraudulent pretence; or the application of the clause was in fact confined to trading contracts and the contracts suppressed were not of this character, but concerned the very initiation and existence of the company, and formed a material consideration for persons who might judge of the company as a means of investment. Either alternative was fatal to the defenders' case. The latter alternative was probably the correct view, for the contracts alluded to were "contracts connected with the properties as a going concern," and the waiver applied to "such contracts." This was the fair reading, and was preferable to any more strained construction. But in any case the waiver clause was part of the prospectus, and if the defenders claimed the benefit of the prospectus they must also grant it. If so the late Mr M'Morland must be taken to have bought on the faith of the prospectus, and this was enough for the pursuers' case. The defenders were agents for the shareholders, and when the shareholders found that they had been defrauded by such a secret agreement they could repudiate all relations with the defenders, and seek complete redress.² The secret agreement of 30th June and 18th August was a fraud on the shareholders, for the true price was £30,000, which was paid to the real vendors, who were the Messrs Wood. The additional £30,000 was a bribe to the other three promoters to induce them to lend their names and influence.

At common law.—There were authorities under the head of common law giving a different remedy from that given by section 38, and illustrating the awkwardness of the shareholder being without such a remedy, and only dependent on statute.³ M'Killop's representations to M'Morland were a clear fraud. He enumerated the advantages of the company and the mines, but he was silent about the financial difficulties with which it was struggling. Even then they were in straits for money. If M'Morland had known this he would never have invested, however excellent the property might be. A partial disclosure might be the most dangerous fraud.⁴

Argued for the defenders;—On the statute.—The onus of proof lay on the pursuers. They must prove that M'Morland bought on the faith of the prospectus. This onus was not discharged. Indeed the evidence was all one way, and shewed that he bought in reliance on M'Killop's representations, but this was superfluous. It was enough that the pursuer had not discharged the onus.⁵ They must shew that if the

¹ Lindley's Law of Companies, 92; Palmer's Company Precedents, 86.

² Huntingdon Copper Co., Limited, v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, 4 R. 294, Lord Young, p. 301, and Nov. 29, 1877, 5 R. (H. L.) 1, per Lord Cairns, L. C., p. 3; Erlanger v. New Sombbrero Phosphate Company, 1877, L. R., 5 Ch. D. 73, per Jessel, M. R., p. 113, and July 31, 1878, L. R., 3 App. Ca. 1218, per Lord Blackburn, p. 1267.

³ Bland's Case, L. R. [1893], 2 Ch. 612.

⁴ Peek v. Gurney, 1873, L. R., 6 Eng. and Ir. App. Cases, 377, p. 410, per Lord Cairns, p. 403.

⁵ Smith v. Chadwick, L. R. [1884], 9 App. Cases, 187; Arnison v. Smith, 1889, L. R., 41 Ch. Div. 348; Sullivan v. Mitcalf, 1880, L. R., 5 C. P. D.

pursuer had known of the contract concealed he would not have taken shares. This failure of the pursuers really removed this case from the application of the other authorities cited. But in any case the prospectus was quite frank. It disclosed that the promoters were vendors. It was also natural that the promoters should have sold at a larger price than they paid. M'Morland's letters pointed to reliance on M'Killop. His letter of application could of itself never be held to import dependence on the prospectus. Thus the pursuers' case, as founded on the prospectus, failed. But even assuming that M'Morland had proceeded on the prospectus, the contract of 30th June and the first contract of 18th August did not fall within the scope of section 38. They were truly private contracts, which put it in the power of the purchasers to offer the collieries to the public. They were not contracts for payment of promotion money. The vendors' obligation to the company was fulfilled when they published the price at which they sold the property. They were not bound also to publish the price at which they bought.¹ The contracts were contracts before the company was formed, and binding whether the company was formed or not. The only case applying on this point was Craig v. Phillips.² The section only applied to contracts the benefits of which were transferred to the company. It did not deal with transactions by which vendors acquired property which they afterwards sold to the company.³

No. 14.
Oct. 22, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

The waiver clause.—Such clauses were valid. Lindley's statement⁴ cited by the pursuers was unsupported.⁵ This clause related to all contracts falling under section 38. "Such contracts" meant contracts falling under the 38th clause, not trading contracts.

At common law.—It was necessary to see from the record what was the fraud alleged. The only averments were in cond. 6 and cond. 12. These were based on the statements in the prospectus, and if the pursuers failed to prove that M'Morland saw the prospectus these statements must fall. Even assuming that he saw the prospectus, the averments did not amount to an allegation of fraud. They amounted to this (1) that the business was taken over and carried on by the five promoters, and (2) that they bought at £30,000 and sold at £60,000. There was no concealment of material facts, and no misrepresentation. There was no duty of disclosure. If both parties were silent on this point there was no fraud. Concealment of a material fact was concealment of a fact which, if known, would make a material modification.³ Material concealment arose when withholding a statement made what was stated false. M'Morland did not rely on M'Killop's past manage-

455, per Thesiger, L. J., p. 460; Arkwright v. Newbold, Feb. 28, 1881, L. R., 17 Ch. D. 301, per Cotton, L. J., p. 324.

¹ Craig v. Phillips, 1876, L. R., 3 Ch. D. 722; Gover's case, 1875, L. R., 20 Eq. 114, 1875, L. R., 1 Ch. D. 182, per James, L. J., p. 187, Bramwell, L. J., 191; Sullivan v. Mitcalf, 1880, L. R., 5 C. P. D. 455, per Bramwell, L. J., p. 470, Baggallay, L. J., p. 467; Twycross v. Grant, 1877, L. R., 2 C. P. D. 469, per Bramwell, L. J., 496, Kelly, C. B., p. 506, Cockburn, C. J., p. 533.

² Craig v. Phillips, 1876, L. R., 3 Ch. D. 722; Cornell v. Hay, 1873, L. R., 8 C. P. 328, per Honeyman, J., 333.

³ Peek v. Gurney, 1873, L. R., 6 Eng. and Ir. App. 377, Lord Chelmsford, 390, Lord Cairns, 403.

⁴ Lindley, Law of Companies, p. 92.

⁵ Palmer's Company Precedents, pp. 86, 94; Buckley, Companies Acts, 574.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
*M'Morland's
 Trustees v.
 Fraser.*

ment, but on his future management, and on his inspection of the coal, and his investments, and his expressed belief. That belief was genuine, and was warranted at the time. The company only failed from want of capital.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late Mr Patrick M'Morland, a coalmaster in Glasgow, applied for and had allotted to him certain shares in a company which was at the time being formed to take over certain interests in collieries, with their machinery, goodwill, &c., under a limited company, to be called the Bryndu Coal and Coke Company, Limited. The pursuers, as the trustees under his trust-disposition and settlement, sue this action to have it found and declared that the prospectus issued by the promoters was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that those who issued the prospectus are bound to make reparation for damage sustained by Mr M'Morland through his taking shares on the faith of the prospectus, and the summons concludes for £5000 of damages. There is further a special conclusion inserted, in respect that certain of the parties being bankrupts, declarator should be pronounced finding that the damages sustained form a just and lawful debt of the bankrupts. The alleged fraud consisted in the failure to disclose in the prospectus, that in addition to the agreement set forth in the prospectus, by which the company were to pay £60,000 to the vendors, half in cash and half in paid-up shares, other agreements had been entered into by which James and William Wood, who were in right of the collieries and business, sold them to themselves and the other defenders for £30,000, these gentlemen then becoming the vendors to the company at £60,000. It is further averred that the prospectus was fraudulent, in respect it described the business as "now carried on" by the two Woods and Messrs Fraser and M'Killop, whereas it had never been carried on by the latter, but only by the Woods.

These questions arise in the case,—

1. Whether it is proved that the deceased took shares on the faith of the prospectus?

2. Whether, if he did so, the prospectus was fraudulent, in respect of its not setting forth the agreement between the Woods and Fraser and M'Killop, and was therefore struck at by section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867?

3. Whether, upon the assumption that section 38 applied, its force was taken away in this transaction by a clause in the prospectus setting forth that there were various contracts which it would be inexpedient to publish, and that all applicants for shares must be deemed to waive the insertion of dates and names of the parties to any such contracts as might be required under section 38 of the Joint Stock Companies Act, and to accept the above statements as a sufficient compliance with the Act?

4. Whether, at common law, it can be held upon the evidence that Mr M'Morland was induced to become a shareholder by false representations made to him by either of the Woods or by Fraser or M'Killop?

It appears that in June 1892 Messrs Wood, who carried on business as a firm, entered into an agreement by which they sold to themselves, as individuals, and to George Anderson and William Fraser, the Bryndu, and certain other collieries, at a price of £30,000 ; and that subsequently, on 18th August of the same year, an agreement was entered into in similar terms, but bringing in Mr M'Killop as one of the purchasers. On the same day these five gentlemen entered into an agreement to sell the same subjects to one Robert King, upon the narrative that a company was about to be formed, and that articles of association had been signed by these five on behalf of the vendors, and that the sale to King was on behalf of the company, and in terms of the articles of association. By that agreement the price was £60,000, and this agreement was set forth in the prospectus issued with a view to obtaining subscriptions of shares. The previous agreements were not disclosed in the prospectus.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

After considering the proof and the documents put in evidence, with the very full and able debate from the bar upon them, I have been unable to see any ground for holding that any false representations were made to Mr M'Morland to induce him to take shares in the company, which would at common law give him a claim against the defenders, or any of them. I believe that Mr M'Killop, who was Mr M'Morland's friend, and had for many years been his partner, acted in the bona fide belief that the collieries were a good speculation, in recommending them to Mr M'Morland for investment, and as Mr M'Morland's action in taking shares was the direct consequence of communication with Mr M'Killop, I see no ground for holding that there was any misrepresentation made to him.

Upon the question whether the non-disclosure of the agreement of August in the prospectus was to be deemed fraudulent under section 38 of the Companies Act of 1867, very forcible arguments on both sides were laid before us, and much instructive authority was quoted. I agree, however, with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that a decision of this somewhat difficult question is unnecessary in this case, as the case may be decided on another ground. And if it is unnecessary to decide whether the prospectus should have referred to the agreement, it is also unnecessary to decide whether, upon that assumption, the clause of waiver in the prospectus affords a sufficient answer, in respect that the buyer of shares bought them on the understanding set forth in the prospectus that he must be deemed to waive the insertion required under section 38. These are both very important points, and would call for very careful consideration were it necessary to pronounce a definite opinion upon them. Upon the latter I have formed a pretty definite opinion, but I think it better not to express it. For I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that it is sufficient for the decision of this case that it is not proved that Mr M'Morland took shares on the faith of the prospectus. Indeed, the evidence seems to shew that he had never seen it. I think it must be held that, when one who has bought shares seeks reparation for loss said to be caused by his acting on a statement, or a failure to include a statement in a prospectus, he must shew that he was deceived or misled thereby, and that he acted upon the prospectus to his prejudice. That seems to me to be the plain import of the case of *Arkwright*¹ in the Chancery Division, which was quoted to us.

There can be no doubt that the ascertained facts disclose a somewhat

¹ L. R., 17 Ch. D. 301.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

extraordinary state of matters. The directors set forth on the face of the prospectus were the same persons and the only persons disclosed in it as being the promoters and the vendors to the company of the subjects to be purchased. Thus, as the Lord Ordinary points out, it was plain upon the face of the prospectus that the directors had an interest adverse to the company. Whoever proposed to invest was informed that he was buying from those who were getting up the company. It is very difficult to understand how anything but an unbounded faith in the integrity of these persons could lead to an application for shares in such circumstances. But if a purchaser did not see the prospectus, but relied only on advice obtained from a gentleman in whose advice he had confidence as regards such a matter, I cannot hold that he, or those who represent him, can obtain damages from those who put out the prospectus, on the ground that he was fraudulently deceived into making the purchase. In such circumstances he cannot shew that he was deceived by the statements in it, or by the omissions in it, and that he being so deceived acted upon it to his prejudice.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuers base the claim made in this action upon two grounds,—(1) That the prospectus of the company in which the late Mr M'Morland took shares was fraudulent, under the terms of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, in respect the contract or agreement of 18th August 1892 was not disclosed in that prospectus; and (2) misrepresentation and concealment at common law. The defenders meet the second of these grounds of action with a denial; and, with regard to the first, maintain that the contract in question was not one disclosure of which was required by statute, but that even if it was, the late Mr M'Morland waived his right to challenge the prospectus on that ground, as well as all his rights and remedies (if any) "in connection therewith, whether under the said section or otherwise."

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the pursuers have failed to establish any claim on the ground of misrepresentation or concealment at common law. The evidence of Mr M'Killop, the only defender who saw or spoke to Mr M'Morland on the subject of the company in question, very distinctly negatives the pursuers' averments. This is the only evidence now available as to what passed between him and Mr M'Morland, unless it be the statements contained in Mr M'Morland's letters. These statements, so far as they go, which is not far, appear to me to support Mr M'Killop's evidence, and in no sense, and to no extent, to contradict it. I think it due to Mr M'Killop to say that there is no foundation in anything which appears before us for the suggestion that he deceived, or wished or intended to deceive, his friend either by misrepresentation or concealment.

The first ground of action can only be pleaded by one who took shares in the company "on the faith of such prospectus." Now, I agree also with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that there is not sufficient evidence to shew that Mr M'Morland took his shares on the faith of the prospectus. I think one might go farther, and say that there is no evidence in support of

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

the view that he did so. That Mr M'Morland saw the prospectus in some newspaper is probable, but by no means certain. Still less is it certain that he ever read it or relied on it in applying for shares. My opinion on this matter is, that Mr M'Morland applied for shares solely on the ground that Mr M'Killop represented it to be, what he thought it was, an investment which promised favourable results. If that is so, then the first ground of action fails the pursuers equally with the second, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary indicates an opinion that the contract of 18th August 1892 was one that should have been disclosed had it not been that the promoters and directors of the company were themselves the disclosed vendors. How that circumstance may affect the duty to disclose imposed by the 38th section of the Act of 1867, I do not think it necessary to consider. But I reserve my opinion entirely on the question whether the contract referred to was one which in any case the promoters or directors were bound to disclose, and what, assuming the duty of disclosure to be affirmed, would have been the effect of Mr M'Morland's waiver in his letter of application for shares.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I think that the Lord Ordinary is right, and I am satisfied with the grounds on which he places his judgment. As to the ground of action founded on the 38th section of the Companies Act of 1867, I think it is not proved that Mr M'Morland took the shares on the faith of the prospectus. Mr M'Morland being dead we had not the advantage of his evidence; but it appears very clearly from the letters which he wrote to his agents on 17th and 23d November 1892, that in agreeing to take the shares he relied entirely upon his partner Mr M'Killop's declared confidence in the concern (the bona fides of which I see no reason to doubt), and the examination which he had personally made of the mines. In the latter letter he says,—“Had Mr Mac. not been interested and surveyed the mine for himself, I would not have put a penny into it, as I don't believe much in mining unless the subjects are good, from good authority, and also the management.” From his business relationship with Mr M'Killop, it is plain that Mr M'Morland must have known perfectly well what collieries Mr M'Killop was personally carrying on, and cannot have been influenced by the erroneous supposition that Mr M'Killop had been carrying on the Bryndu collieries previous to the formation of the company. Mr M'Killop says,—“He (that is, M'Morland) was led to associate himself with the company entirely through my individual position and connection with it.” So far as I can see from the evidence before us, that is the truth. It may be assumed,—I think it must be assumed,—that M'Morland saw the prospectus, but I do not think it is proved that he bought on the faith of it, or that he was induced to buy by misrepresentations made to him by any of the defenders.

In this view it is not necessary to consider the vexed question whether the minute of agreement of 18th August 1892 was or was not a contract of which notice should have been given under section 38 of the Companies Act of 1867, and I prefer to reserve my opinion upon that point, and also on the question whether, assuming that notice should have been given of the con-

No. 14. tract, Mr M'Morland's waiver, contained in his letter of application, was or was not effectual to free the defenders from liability. If the case depended on these questions, I think, looking to their importance and the great difference in judicial opinion in the English Courts, it would have been proper to submit the question to the whole Court, or a Court of seven Judges.

Oct. 29, 1896.
M'Morland v.
Trustees v.
Fraser.

THE COURT adhered.

KEITH R. MAITLAND, W.S.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15. JAMES DUNCAN M'INTOSH, Pursuer (Appellant).—Salvesen—J. Purves Smith.

Oct. 31, 1896.
M'Intosh v.
Waddell.

R. D. WADDELL, Defender (Respondent).—Ure—Cook.

Reparation—Negligence—Leaving horse unattended in street.—A brought an action of damages against B, averring that the servant in charge of a horse and van belonging to the defender had left the same unattended in a street in Glasgow, although the horse was known to the defender to be a spirited animal, and that the horse had bolted and dashed into the window of the pursuer's shop.

Held that the action was relevant.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

THIS was an action of damages raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by James Duncan M'Intosh, jeweller in Glasgow, against R. D. Waddell, sausage manufacturer there.

The pursuer averred that the defender was owner of a pony and spring van, that on 11th October 1895 the pony had bolted in Cameron Street, and dashed into the window of the pursuer's shop doing considerable damage, and that the accident was caused by the negligence of the defender's servant who was in charge of the van, and who left the pony unattended in the street, as should not have been done, especially as the pony was known by the defender to be a spirited animal.

The defender pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) allowed a proof before answer, and on appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

The defender objected, and argued;—No relevant ground of action was averred. It was not a fault in a vanman to leave his horse unattended for a few moments. He was entitled to do so for a proper reason, e.g. in order to deliver parcels and otherwise carry on his employer's business. Otherwise two attendants would have to be sent with every cart or van. To make his case relevant, the pursuer should have averred that the vanman had left the horse unattended for an unnecessarily long time, or for an improper purpose, such as going into a public-house.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—It was a risk to leave a horse unattended in a street, especially if it was a spirited animal, and any person who so left a horse took the risk of any damage that might follow.²

¹ Shaw v. Croall & Sons, July 1, 1885, 12 R. 1186; M'Ara v. Morison, March 6, 1896, 23 R. 564.

² Illidge v. Goodwin, 1831, 5 C. and P. 190, per L. J. C. Tindal, at p. 192.

If damage resulted from a servant's negligence in this respect, his employer was responsible.¹ No. 15.

Oct. 31, 1896.
M'Intosh v.
Waddell.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court think the case must go to trial.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved of an issue.

T. C. SMITH, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM FALCONER KING, Petitioner (Appellant).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson No. 16.
—Cook.

GEORGE BARNETSON, Respondent.—W. Campbell—Craigie.

Oct. 31, 1896.
King v.
Barnetson.

WILLIAM LAING'S TRUSTEES AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—
W. Campbell—Craigie.

Superior and Vassal—Buildings on feu—Approval of plan by superior—Servitude of light—Implied grant.—A feued a piece of ground in a street to B, the feu-contract bearing that B was "now erecting" on the ground feued "a tenement, the plan of which has been approved by" the superior's architect. A subsequently feued the adjoining ground to C, who applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect upon it buildings which, if built, would have entirely excluded the light of the back windows of B's tenement.

B opposed the application on the plea that the superior, having by his architect approved of the plan of his tenement, must be held to have conferred upon him a servitude of light over the adjoining ground for the windows shewn on the plan.

The Court repelled the plea, holding that the superior's approval of the plan did not bind him to warrant the lights of all the windows shewn thereon.

Superior and Vassal—Privilege conferred on vassal to use vacant ground adjoining feu—Reservation of right to curtail vacant ground by building thereon—Extent of reserved right.—A feued a building stance to B, with the privilege of using a piece of vacant ground behind it, which was bounded on one side by certain brick buildings facing C Street belonging to A. The feu-contract contained a declaration that, "as the brick buildings are more narrow from back to front than the permanent buildings in C Street to be built upon the site of the said brick houses will be when C Street is feued, the said back ground will thus be curtailed," and that B should have no claim against A for this restriction.

A subsequently feued the back ground and the ground on which the brick buildings stood to C, who applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to pull down the existing buildings and erect in their place permanent buildings of considerably greater depth than the original buildings. The plans shewed that the proposed new buildings would materially injure the lights and ventilation of the buildings on B's feu.

B opposed the application on the plea that the proposed buildings would be an unreasonable encroachment on his rights in the back ground.

The Court repelled the plea on the ground that B's title imposed no limitation on the depth of the permanent buildings, the erection of which it contemplated.

WILLIAM FALCONER KING, proprietor of certain subjects in Commercial Street and Prince Regent Street, Leith, presented a petition
1ST DIVISION.
Dean of Guild
Court of Leith.

¹ Fairweather v. Blacklock, Nov. 26, 1861, 24 D. 90; Baird v. Hamilton, July 4, 1826, 4 S. 790.

No. 16. to the Dean of Guild Court for a warrant to take down the existing buildings thereon, and to erect a tenement of dwelling-houses in their place, partly facing Commercial Street and partly facing Prince Regent Street.

Oct. 31, 1896.
King v.
Barnetson.

The application was opposed by the proprietors of adjoining properties, viz., (1) by George Barnetson, and (2) by the widow and trustees of the deceased William Laing.

I. Barnetson's case.—Barnetson's title was founded on a feu-contract dated in 1851 between John Archibald Campbell and George Green, the predecessor of the respondent, by which the former feued to the latter a piece of ground at the corner of Admiralty Street and Commercial Street, "on which ground or stance the said George Green is now erecting a tenement, the plan of which has been approved of by Patrick Wilson, architect in Edinburgh." The above title was prior in date to that of the petitioner, who acquired by feu-contract from the same superior in 1873.

The respondent Barnetson stated, inter alia;—(Stat. 4) "It was a condition of the contract between the respondent's author, the said George Green, and the petitioner's author, the said John Archibald Campbell, that in order to admit of light and air being introduced into the back rooms of said tenement the said George Green should be entitled to form windows in the back wall of his tenement overlooking the ground then belonging to the said John Archibald Campbell, upon which the petitioner now proposes to erect his new buildings. . . . The plan of said tenement shewing said windows was duly submitted to and approved of by the petitioner's author, the said John Archibald Campbell, and in order that said condition and agreement might be observed in all time coming, the said plan is specially referred to in said feu-contract. The respondent's author thereby acquired for himself and the proprietors of said tenement for the time being a servitude of light and air over said back ground now belonging to the petitioner. . . ." (Stat. 5) "Notwithstanding said agreement and the constitution of said servitude rights, as set forth in the preceding article, the petitioner now proposes to erect a tenement upon a portion of said back ground, one of the gables whereof is to be built close up against the back wall of the respondent's tenement, and will block up two windows on each flat. . . . The result would be to deprive eight rooms in the respondent's tenement of light and ventilation, . . . thereby reducing the value of his property to a very considerable extent."

The respondent Barnetson pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The respondent, having under his titles, and particularly under the feu-contract before mentioned and plan therein referred to, a servitude of light and air over the petitioner's back ground, . . . is entitled to prohibit the petitioner from erecting his proposed buildings in so far as they would interfere therewith.

II. Laing's case.—In 1863 Mr Campbell, in a feu-contract, disposed to William Laing a piece of ground on the north-west side of Admiralty Street, "bounded on the north and north-east partly by the ground belonging to the said John Archibald Campbell, lying behind the said piece of ground hereby disposed, to the use of which back ground the feuars and tenants of the said John Archibald Campbell in Admiralty Street, Commercial Street, Cromwell Street, and Prince Regent Street, have a mutual privilege, . . . together with a privilege in favour of the said William Laing and his foresaids, in common with the said other feuars of the said John Archibald Campbell's property in Admiralty Street, Cromwell Street, Commercial Street, and Prince Regent Street, to use the said back ground." After referring, inter alia, to certain brick houses in Commercial Street belonging to the said John Archibald Campbell, the feu-contract declared, "that as the said brick houses are only constructed for temporary purposes, and are more narrow from back to front than the permanent buildings in Commercial Street to be built upon the site of the said brick houses will be when Commercial Street is feued, the said back ground will thus be further curtailed, for both of which restrictions it is hereby declared that the said William Laing and his foresaids shall have no claim against the said John Archibald Campbell and his foresaids." It was provided that the houses to be built on the ground disposed to Laing should not exceed 36 feet or thereby from front to back.

No. 16.
Oct. 31, 1896.
King v.
Barnetson.

The feu acquired by the petitioner's author in 1873 included the brick houses in Commercial Street and the back ground referred to in Laing's feu-contract.

The respondents Laing's trustees stated, inter alia;—(Stat. 4) "The temporary brick houses referred to in said feu-contract front Commercial Street, and are the buildings facing that street for the removal of which warrant is craved by the petitioner. These temporary buildings are of the width of about 27 feet, and on the ground occupied by them, and on a strip of ground behind the same of the width of 10 feet or thereby, being part of the ground to which the said William Laing acquired a mutual right under said feu-contract, the petitioner asks warrant for the erection of a tenement of dwelling-houses of five storeys in height. Access to the dwelling-houses in said tenement is to be obtained by a passage through said tenement and a wide staircase behind it, with balconies connected with the staircase on each storey. Said staircase occupies a space of about 15 feet square behind said tenement, and the same and said balconies still further curtail said mutual back ground." (Stat. 6) "On a fair construction of the clause in the feu-contract in favour of the said William Laing, the petitioner, as the owner of the ground on which said brick houses fronting Commercial Street stand, is not entitled, in erecting permanent buildings on the site thereof, to encroach upon said mutual back ground to an extent greater than is required for the erection of a tenement of equal depth with the tenement belonging to the present respondents and to other adjoining feuars of the said John Archibald Campbell, or his successors, and he is not entitled in any event to erect a tenement of greater depth than is customary in tenements of that description. Nevertheless, the tenement proposed to be erected by the petitioner, including the staircase behind the same, is of the depth of 52 feet or thereby, being 16 feet in excess of the depth of the tenement belonging to the present respondents and to adjoining feuars, and greatly exceeds the depth of an ordinary tenement. Said tenement and staircase greatly curtail the said mutual back ground for the purposes for which it was intended, viz., light and ventilation of and back greens for the tenements to be erected by the feuars having right thereto. Further, said tenement and staircase will greatly damage the value of the said respondents' property, and in so far as they exceed in depth the respondents' and said other adjoining tenements, or at all events in so far as they exceed the depth of an ordinary tenement, they are

No. 16. an unwarrantable encroachment upon the respondents' rights as proprietors pro indiviso of said mutual back ground. . . .
 Oct. 31, 1896. The respondents Laing's Trustees pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Petitioner's said tenement being, to the extent condescended on, an unwarrantable encroachment upon the respondents' rights as proprietors pro indiviso of said mutual back ground, the warrant craved should be refused.
 King v.
 Barnetson.

On 8th July the Dean of Guild Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having visited the premises in the presence of the agents of the parties, and heard them upon, and having considered, the whole cause—Finds (1) as regards the respondent Barnetson, that the petitioner's intended buildings will close up or otherwise prejudicially interfere with eight windows in said respondent's property—two of which windows, being those of sitting-rooms in a public-house on the ground floor, and four, being the sole means of light to as many living rooms of dwelling-houses above, will be entirely blocked up,—the remaining two windows, being those of the attic flat, being but two feet back from the intended gable; and that, as the Court further finds, contrary to the legal rights of the said respondent: (2) As regards the respondent Laing, that on a fair construction of the titles the petitioner is only authorised to encroach with his tenement upon the back ground mentioned therein to the extent of admitting of his having a tenement of a reasonable width from the building line of Commercial Street: Finds that, in the circumstances, instead of a total width of 52 feet . . . a total width of 39 feet is fair and ample, and the utmost that can be allowed, without material prejudice to the lights of this respondent . . . Therefore refuses warrant in hoc statu, but allows the petitioner, if so advised, to amend his plans so as to shew the lights of Barnetson's tenement reasonably preserved, and the width of tenement restricted as aforesaid, and for this purpose continues the cause."

The petitioner having declined to amend his plans, the Dean of Guild Court, on the same date, refused the prayer of the petition.

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—(1) Barnetson's case.—The servitude claimed was a negative servitude, and such a servitude could only be constituted by express grant.¹ Here there was no express grant, nor was any grant necessarily to be implied from the superior's approval of the plan. (2) Case of Laing's Trustees.—The privilege conferred upon William Laing by the feu-contract in his favour was expressly made subject to the restriction which was to follow when permanent buildings were erected on the adjoining ground. The title imposed no limit on the extent to which the depth of the buildings might be increased, and the superior was therefore left with a free hand in this respect. A burden on property must be clearly expressed, and was to be strictly construed.² The burden here alleged was so ambiguous as to be incapable of enforcement.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) Barnetson's case.—A servitude of light could be conferred by implied grant, and such a servitude must, in the circumstances of this case, be held to have been conferred upon the respondents.³ The terms of the feu-contract established an agreement on the part of the superior to the vassal building according to a particular plan. The plan was not extant, but it was to be presumed that it shewed the windows of the tenement which was being built at the date of the feu-contract. The case was a strong one for holding that a servitude had impliedly been conferred, for the findings of the Dean of Guild Court shewed that the buildings proposed by the petitioner would practically destroy the value of part of the respondents' building as a heritable subject. (2) Case of Laing's Trustees.—There was here a grant by a superior, coupled with a reservation in the superior's favour. The grant must in such a case be construed reasonably, and the reservation strictly. The respondents' right in the back ground was one of common interest, and they had a title therefore to object to the reserved right being exercised unreasonably to their injury.¹ The respondents themselves were restricted in regard to the depth of the buildings to be erected on their feu to 36 feet, and a similar restriction was reasonably to be inferred as to the reserved right.

¹ Dundas v. Blair, March 12, 1886, 13 R. 759.

² Hood v. Traill, Dec. 18, 1884, 12 R. 362.

³ Heron v. Gray, Nov. 27, 1880, 8 R. 155.

No. 16.

Oct. 31, 1896.
King v.
Barnetson.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is convenient to consider the position of each respondent separately, in the order observed in the judgment of the Dean of Guild Court.

I do not doubt that, as is said in the interlocutor, the light of Barnetson's property will be prejudicially interfered with by the proposed building; but the question is, whether this interference is, as the Court below has found, contrary to Barnetson's legal rights? Now, the title of Barnetson's author confers no right of any kind in the back ground. Accordingly, what is said for Barnetson is that his title shewed that the plan of the house which was then being erected had been approved by the superior's architect, and that the plan not being extant, it must be presumed to have exhibited those windows, the light of which will be prejudicially affected by the petitioner's buildings. Now, even if all this could be taken for granted, I am afraid it cannot be held that such approval by the superior's architect committed him to warranting the lights of all the windows exhibited on the plan. Accordingly, I cannot find legal grounds for holding that (as it is expressed in the note to the judgment under review) the common author "practically conferred" a servitude of lights. I do not think that this results either from the terms of the title or from the title taken along with the actual existence of the windows.

The respondents Laing's trustees and Mrs Laing are able to point to a clause in their title giving them a privilege, in common with the other feuars (in the streets surrounding it), to use the back ground, which is also described as bounding Laing's property. Now, although it is rather vague, I do not think that this right is illusory, or that the back ground could be encroached on by the superior ad libitum. But then the title goes on to give fair notice that, to some extent, the existing back ground will be encroached on by the superior. The existing brick houses, the title says, are only temporary, and are more narrow than the permanent buildings in Commercial Street which will be built on their site when Commercial Street is feued, and, says the title, the back ground will be thus further encroached on, but for such curtailment the feuar shall have no claim.

¹ Johnston v. White, May 18, 1877, 4 R. 721.

No. 16.
Oct. 31, 1896.
King v.
Barnetson.

Now, the events here contemplated,—the feuing of Commercial Street and the putting up permanent buildings,—did not come about so soon as seems to have been expected, but they have come now, and the buildings now in question are the permanent buildings in Commercial Street contemplated in Laing's title. That being so, I am unable to find any further limitation on the right to encroach which was stipulated for by the superior as a condition of the vassal's title. It is not said against the proposed buildings that they are not bona fide in Commercial Street, and I cannot assent to the setting up some arbitrary rule as to their width, the parties to the title when treating on this subject having laid down no such limitation. Accordingly, I consider the Laings' case also to fail.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled both the interlocutors of the Dean of Guild Court dated 8th July, repelled the first plea of both respondents, and remitted to the Dean of Guild Court to proceed as should be just.

BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—JAMES PHILIP, S.S.C.—
MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17.
Nov. 4, 1896.
Grigor v.
Maclean.

JESSIE OR JANET GRIGOR AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Appellants).—
Jameson—C. D. Murray.
THOMAS MACLEAN, Defender (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—M'Lennan.

Property—Road—Servitude—Grant of access by passage within burgh—Right of owner of passage to diminish its breadth.—From 1728 onwards the titles of a house situated in a close or passage in Elgin contained the following clause, “with free egress and regress by the front passage from the High Street.” In 1896 this close was a cul-de-sac, entirely surrounded by walls, and of irregular breadth, varying from 6 feet 10 inches at the entrance from the street up to 9 feet 4 inches. The owner of the solum of the close having in that year proposed to diminish the width of the close for some distance from the entrance to 3 feet 9 inches, the owners of the house brought an action of declarator against him. It was proved that from time immemorial the close had been of the dimensions and character specified.

Held that the right of the pursuers was a right of egress and regress by the close, as it had existed from time immemorial, and therefore that the defender was not entitled to diminish its width.

2D DIVISION,
Sheriff of Inverness,
Elgin, and Nairn.

In July 1896 Jessie or Janet Grigor and Mrs Elizabeth Grigor or Shiach, who were proprietors each of a one-fourth pro indiviso share of a dwelling-house in the court or close No. 179 High Street, Elgin, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Elgin against Thomas Maclean, the proprietor of a house and shop at the entrance of that court or close, praying for declarator “that the court, passage, or entry in close No. 179 High Street, Elgin, extending between the property of the pursuers in said close and the High Street of Elgin, with the entry or passage leading thereto, is the common property of the pursuers, the defender, and others, and for their common use and enjoyment; or otherwise, that there is a right or servitude of access by, and use of, said court, close, passage, or entry, in favour of the property aforesaid, situated at No. 179 High Street, Elgin, belonging to the pursuers and others”; and for declarator that the defender is “not entitled, without the pursuers' express consent, to build on or over the said court, close, passage, or entry, or any part thereof, or to place stones, sand, lime, or rubbish, on said court, close, passage, or entry, or to obstruct or occupy the same in any manner of way so as to defeat or impede the pursuers' right as aforesaid"; for interdict against the defender doing so, and against his interference "with the pursuers' right of servitude and right of ingress and egress to and from the High Street of Elgin and the pursuers' said dwelling-house through the said court, close, passage, or entry, as possessed and exercised by them prior to the operations of the defender complained of"; and for decree ordaining the defender to remove such erections and obstructions.

No. 17.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Grigor v.
Maclean.

The pursuers' titles gave them a right of "free egress and regress to and from" their house "by the front passage from the High Street down the said close." A clause in identical terms appeared in all the titles from 1728 downwards.

The pursuers ultimately did not insist in their prayer for declarator of common property, and admitted that the solum of the close in question belonged to the defender. On the alternative prayer for declarator of a right or servitude of access, the pursuers averred:—(Cond. 2) " . . . The pursuers have acquired a prescriptive right of servitude through or over the close, and have the right of egress and ingress thereto, as it stood prior to the operations complained of, namely, a right of way for foot passage and for the passage of carts or other similar vehicles of at least eight and a-half feet wide."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said close, court, passage, or entry being a public road or passage, or at least the pursuers and their predecessors having possessed and exercised a servitude of right of way over the same, of the width condescended on, for forty years and upwards, have acquired a prescriptive right thereto, and are therefore entitled to decree as craved. (2) The pursuers and their predecessors having, by their titles, a right of ingress and egress over said close or court, and having used and enjoyed the same as it stood before the operations complained of were begun for forty years and upwards, the defender is not entitled to narrow or encroach on said close.

The defender admitted that there was a servitude of foot passage to and from the pursuers' dwelling-house over the close in question, but denied that they had any higher right.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The operations condescended on being for the substantial benefit of the defender, and not interfering with the sufficient and reasonable possession by the pursuers of their servitude of access through the property of the defender, the pursuers are not entitled to declarator and interdict as craved.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was largely directed to the question whether the pursuers had acquired a prescriptive right of servitude for vehicular traffic over the close in question, but as this ground of action was abandoned by the pursuers at the hearing before the Second Division, the evidence on the point need not here be further noticed. Upon the question whether the pursuers had under their titles a right of ingress and egress over the close as it existed prior to the defender's operations, an architect, adduced as a witness by the defender, deponed that the width of the close at its entrance from the High Street was 6 feet 10½ inches, and that during its course it varied at different points from that width up to 9 feet 4½ inches. The detailed dimensions spoken to by the witness are given in the interlocutor of the Court infra. The close was a cul-de-sac entirely

No. 17. surrounded by walls, and it was built over for some distance inwards from the High Street, the height of the portion thus enclosed being 8 feet. The evidence shewed that the close had been of these dimensions from time immemorial. The effect of the defender's operations would be to reduce the width of the close at its entrance, and for some distance inward, to a width of 3 feet 6 inches.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Grigor v.
Maclean.

On 22d July 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini) assolizied the defender, proceeding on the ground that the pursuers had failed to establish their claim to a servitude of way for vehicular traffic; and therefore that the defender's operations were not an encroachment on the pursuer's rights.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Ivory), on 15th September, adhered.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The question here was not as to the acquisition of a prescriptive right of servitude, but as to the construction of an express grant. The purpose of the proof was to identify the subject of the grant, not to prove the constitution of the right. If the passage as it existed before the defender's operations was the same as "the front passage," as it existed in 1728, then the pursuers were entitled to the use of the whole passage, because their titles gave them that right. Upon that question the proof was all one way. The pursuers did not dispute the doctrine that the owner of a servient tenement was entitled to require the servitude to be exercised in the way least burdensome to him; and had the passage here been over a field or unenclosed ground, the doctrine would have applied, but it had no application to the case of a grant of passage over a defined close within burgh.¹

Argued for the defender;—This was not a grant of the close in property. Had it been so, the pursuers' line of argument—that the evidence identified the subject of the grant—would have been legitimate. But it was a grant of a right of passage merely, and the only question was what did that right imply, looking to the prior use and to the whole circumstances. It was clear on the evidence, and was now admitted by the pursuers, that the only description of traffic for which this close was fitted was foot traffic. The pursuers' right, therefore, was a right of foot passage only, and defender was bound to leave a sufficient width of close for the exercise of that right. Quoad ultra, he might deal with the close as he pleased, in accordance with the ordinary rule, to which closes within burgh were no exception.² Ferrier v. Walker,¹ founded on by the pursuers, was only a possessory judgment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts in this case are these:—The pursuers have a title to a pro indiviso share of a property which is approached down a passage off the High Street of the burgh of Elgin. Their title gives them "free egress and regress to and from the same (i.e., their property) by the front passage from the High Street down the said close." Now, it is not disputed, and cannot be disputed, that, for a very considerable time prior to the operations complained of, the passage in question was a passage of a certain breadth. When we come to read the clause I have quoted from the title, we must take it that "the front passage," to free egress and regress by which the pursuers are entitled, means the passage which existed at the date when the title was granted. A right of access to a property is one thing, a right of access to a property by a certain passage is another. ^{No. 17.} ^{Nov. 4, 1896.} ^{Grigor v. Maclean.} Of course a right of access to a property may be over vacant ground, and it is clear that such ground may be enclosed by the owner of it, and the road by which access is given may be altered and diverted so long as he leaves an access by some way equally convenient. This is not such a case as that. This is a right of access by a particular passage defined by the line of buildings bounding it, which have been there for a very long time, indeed from time immemorial. The proprietor of the solum of that passage is not entitled, without making arrangements with the proprietors who have a right of access by it, to encroach upon it. It is not necessary to enter upon the question whether this passage has been used for carts or only for foot traffic. For foot traffic even a passage of 3 feet 6 inches wide is more inconvenient than one of 6 or 7 feet. It cannot be doubted that a purchaser would not give the same price for a property with an access 3 feet 6 inches wide as for one which has an access 6 feet wide. That such narrowing of the passage would hamper the pursuers in their right of access in many ways there can be no doubt. I think we should reverse the judgments of the Sheriffs, and find in accordance with the views I have expressed.

¹ Ferrier v. Walker, Feb. 11, 1832, 10 S. 317, per Lord President Hope, at p. 318, and Lord Gillies, at p. 319.

² Bruce v. Wardlaw, 1748, M. 14,524; Wood v. Robertson, March 9, 1809, F. C.; Allans v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, Dec. 18, 1801, 4 Pat. App. 269; Thomson v. Murdoch, May 21, 1862, 24 D. 975, 34 Scot. Jur. 482.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. It will be necessary to negative that part of the prayer which asks for a declarator of a right of common property in the passage. I think we should find that the pursuers have a right of access. I would not use the word servitude. It does not occur in the title. The expression used there is "free egress and regress to and from the same by the front passage from the High Street." That may be a servitude. It is certainly not a right of common property. But I am not inclined to use the word servitude when there is an express grant of a right of access to property by a particular existing passage. In one sense it is a servitude, because it is a right to make use of land which is feudally the property of another. That is the case with many of our public roads. The solum of the road may be private property, belonging feudally to an adjacent proprietor, but there is a right in the public to use the road sometimes by grant and sometimes by statute. Here there is a right by title to use the passage for access to the pursuers' property. I think we must find that from time immemorial the passage has been of a certain width (taking the exact dimensions from the evidence of the architect), that the defender proposes to reduce the width of the passage to 3 feet 6 inches, and in law that in so doing he is violating the pursuers' rights.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. There was here an express grant of a right of egress and regress by a particular passage from the High Street to the pursuers' property. The proof is only of value for the purpose of identifying the "front passage" referred to in the title, and defining its width. From the proof it clearly appears that from time immemorial the "front passage" has been of an average width of 6 feet 10 inches, and that it has been used in various ways. It also appears that by the operations of the defender it will be diminished in width by one half.

No. 17. This is clearly an encroachment upon the rights of the pursuers. I think the Sheriffs have taken a wrong view of the case, and have misapprehended the purpose of the proof led by the pursuers. They seem to have thought it was led in order to establish a right of way, whereas the object in view was to identify the passage referred to in the title, and to establish that it had been of a certain width from time immemorial.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Grigor v.
Maclean.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, sustain the same, and recall the interlocutors appealed against: Find that the pursuers are not entitled to a finding and declarator to the effect that the court, passage, or entry in the close No. 179 High Street, Elgin, extending between the property of the pursuers in said close and the High Street, is the common property of the pursuers, the defender Thomas Maclean, and others: Find that the defender is heritable proprietor of certain subjects at 179 High Street, Elgin, aforesaid, and that the pursuers are pro indiviso proprietors of subjects situated to the north of the defender's said property: Find that the pursuers, as proprietors pro indiviso foresaid, have a right of free egress and regress from their said property through the said property of the defender by the front passage from the High Street down the said close: Find that from time immemorial, and until the proceedings of the defender complained of, the said passage was of the following dimensions, viz., at the entrance from the High Street of said passage 6 feet 10½ inches in width, which width continues for a distance of 17 feet 3 inches, the height of the enclosed part of the said passage being 8 feet; that at a point 29 feet down the said passage it is 7 feet 9 inches in width; and at a point 58 feet down it is 8 feet 2½ inches in width; that at the south end of the pursuers' property it is 9 feet 4½ inches in width; that after continuing for a few yards said passage narrows to 8 feet 10 inches, and remains at this width ex adverso of the pursuers' property, and that at the foot of the close the said passage narrows to a width of 7 feet 1 inch: Find that the defender, by the operations complained of, has narrowed, or proposes to narrow, the said passage at its entrance, and for some distance down said passage to a width of 3 feet 6 inches: Find in law that the operations complained of are an encroachment upon and in violation of the said right of the pursuers: Therefore interdict the defender from erecting any building on or over the said passage or any part thereof, or in any way encroaching upon or narrowing the said passage or any part thereof, from obstructing or occupying the same in any way so as to defeat or impede the pursuers' right as aforesaid, and from interfering in any way with the pursuers' said right of free egress and regress by the said passage to and from the High Street of Elgin and pursuers' said property, as possessed and exercised by them prior to the operations of the defender complained of, and decern: Quoad ultra continue the cause: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—PHILIP, LAING, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

SIBSON & KERR AND MANDATARIES, Pursuers (Respondents).—

No. 18.

Ure—Aitken.

SHIP "BARCRAIG" COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—

Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Salvesen.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

Ship—Charter-party—Construction—Commission—Commission on freight payable to charterers.—By charter-party the owner agreed "on the chartering to arrive of" a vessel then on a voyage from New York to Shanghai for a voyage as follows:—"The said vessel shall after discharge of inward cargo or ballast be made ready, and shall receive on board at Portland, Oregon, and/or other loading-places as hereinafter provided, a full and complete cargo. . . . Should the vessel fail to arrive at Portland, Oregon, at or before 6 o'clock P.M. on or before 31st January 1896, charterers to have the option of cancelling or maintaining this charter on the arrival of vessel." The concluding clause of the charter-party was as follows:—

"A commission of three and three-quarters per cent shall be paid to charterers on the estimated gross freight in U. S. gold coin . . . on the completion of loading, or should vessel be lost."

The vessel was lost on the voyage from New York to Shanghai.

Founding on the last clause above quoted, the charterers raised an action against the shipowners for the amount of the commission on the estimated gross freight.

Held that it was a condition precedent of the whole contract that the vessel should arrive at the port of loading, and that as that condition had not been purified the defenders fell to be assoilized.

IN May 1896 Sibson & Kerr, merchants, Portland, Oregon, U. S. A.,^{2D DIVISION.} and Dewar & Webb, commission agents, London, their mandataries, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Greenock against The Ship "Barcraig" Company, Limited, Glasgow, and Thomas Wyllie Hamilton, shipowner, Port-Glasgow, liquidator of that company, praying for decree for £239, 1s. 1d. in name of commission alleged to be due to the pursuers under a charter-party dated London, 14th May 1895, and of which the following were the material terms, the portions printed in italics being in manuscript in the charter-party:—

"This charter-party this day made and concluded upon between Messrs Hamilton, Harvey, & Co., owners of the 'Barcraig,' steel, of Glasgow, of the measurement of 2061 tons register, or thereabouts, now on passage New York to Shanghai, and with liberty to take not exceeding 1500 tons cargo thence to loading port for owner's benefit, of the first part, and Messrs Sibson & Kerr, of Portland, Oregon, of the second part.

"Witnesseth, that the party of the first part agrees on the chartering to arrive of the whole of the said vessel (with the exception of the deck, cabin, and the necessary room for the crew and the stowage of provisions, sails, and cables), or sufficient room for the cargo hereinafter mentioned, unto the said parties of the second part, for a voyage as follows:—The said vessel being tight, staunch, strong, and in every way fitted and provided for said voyage, shall, after discharge of inward cargo or ballast, be made ready, and shall receive on board at Portland, Oregon, and/or other loading-places, as hereinafter provided, a full and complete cargo of wheat, in sacks . . . which the said parties of the second part bind themselves to ship, and being so loaded shall, upon receiving orders from the charterers therewith proceed to Queenstown or Falmouth, for orders to discharge at a safe port (as instructed by charterers' agents) in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, between Havre and Hamburg,

No. 18. both included, and there deliver the same as hereinafter provided, on being paid freight.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig," Co.,
Limited.

"If discharged at a port in the United Kingdom, as above, or at Havre, Antwerp, or Dunkirk, at the rate of 35s. say thirty-five shillings sterling.

"If discharged at a port on the Continent, as above, other than Havre, Antwerp, or Dunkirk, at the rate of 40s. say forty shillings sterling.

"If discharged at Hamburg, at the rate of 37s. say thirty-seven shillings.

"Freight payable in cash without discount, on true and faithful delivery of cargo at port of discharge (if on the Continent, at current rates of exchange on London) per ton of 2240 lbs., English gross weight, delivered.

"Charterers to have the option of ordering vessel from port of loading, direct to any safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, as above, in which case freight to be one shilling and threepence less per like ton.

"The act of God, perils of the sea, &c., excepted. . . .

"Vessel to be properly stowed and dunnaged; and certificate thereof, and of good general condition, draft of water, and ventilation, to be furnished to charterers from charterers' competent surveyor," with power to submit to arbiters. "Should the vessel fail to pass a satisfactory preliminary survey, or in case of submission to arbitration, should the decision be against the vessel, or should she be detained more than ten days for repairs, this charter to be void at charterers' option; such option to be declared at the expiry of said ten days. . . .

"After discharge of inward cargo and/or ballast has been finally completed, vessel to proceed to such usual loading-place, as may be ordered by charterers, at Portland and/or Astoria and/or loading-places in the Columbia and/or Willamette rivers, and there receive the cargo in manner customary, alongside afloat and/or from wharf. Charterers to have the privilege of additional moves, they paying towage. Bills of lading to be duly and promptly signed when required by charterers, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter-party, but at not less than chartered rate, unless any difference in freight be satisfactorily adjusted before signing.

"Charterers' liability to cease on completion of loading; owners to have a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage under this charter-party. Sibson & Kerr, or their agents, to do ship's inward and outward business at port of loading on current terms. Vessel to be cleared at custom-house at Portland and/or Astoria in the name of charterers. . . .

"Loading days not to commence before 1st December 1895, except at charterers' option. Should the vessel fail to arrive at Portland, Oregon, at or before six o'clock P.M. on or before 31st January 1896, charterers to have the option of cancelling or maintaining this charter on arrival of vessel. . . .

"A commission of three and three-quarters per cent shall be paid to charterers on the estimated gross freight, in U. S. gold coin (at the exchange of 48 pence) on the completion of loading, or should vessel be lost."

The pursuers set forth the clause last above quoted, and averred;—(Cond. 3) "The vessel was lost before reaching the port of loading, and a commission accordingly became due to pursuers under the above narrated provisions of the charter-party."

The defenders answered:—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the 'Barcraig' was lost on the passage from New York to Shanghai, never having been heard of after leaving New York. Quoad ultra denied, and explained that the vessel having been lost as aforesaid, the said commission sued for is not due." No. 18.

The pursuers pleaded;—Defenders being due and owing to pursuers the sum sued for as commission in terms of charter-party as condescended on, pursuers are entitled to decree as craved. Nov. 4, 1896. Sibson & Kerr v. Ship "Barcraig" Co., Limited.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The loss of the vessel having rendered fulfilment of the charter-party by either of the parties thereto impossible, its whole provisions were cancelled, and no commission is due to the pursuers. (2) The "Barcraig" having been lost before arrival at the loading port, no commission is in any case due to the pursuers under said charter-party.

On 19th June 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Begg) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) that by the said charter-party the defenders' company agreed 'on the chartering to arrive' of their vessel, the 'Barcraig,' therein described as then 'on passage New York to Shanghai' unto the pursuers, for a voyage as follows, viz., that the said vessel should, after discharge of inward cargo or ballast, be made ready and receive on board at Portland, Oregon, or other loading-place in the United States as therein provided, a cargo of wheat, and there-with proceed to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders to discharge at a safe port in the United Kingdom, or otherwise as therein expressed, and there deliver the said cargo on being paid freight, and, inter alia, to pay a commission of three and three-quarters per cent to the pursuers on the estimated gross freight in U. S. gold coin (at the exchange of 48 pence) 'on the completion of loading or should vessel be lost,' and (2) that the said vessel never reached her port of loading, having been lost on her said passage from New York to Shanghai: Finds in law that, on a sound construction of the said charter-party, the defenders are not in these circumstances bound to pay the said commission to the pursuers: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the prayer of the petition: Finds them entitled to the expenses of process," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The preliminary words 'on the chartering to arrive' seem to me to constitute a condition precedent to the whole obligations contained in the charter-party. The chartering which the parties thus referred to had not arrived at the execution of the document, but was 'to arrive' at some future time. At the date of execution the vessel was on a voyage from New York to Shanghai, so that necessarily a considerable time must elapse before she could be placed in any way at the disposal of the charterers at Portland or other loading-place in the United States. It thus seems clear enough that the chartering was not 'to arrive' till the vessel should be so placed at the disposal of the charterers, and in point of fact it never did arrive on account of the loss of the vessel on her voyage from New York to Shanghai. In these circumstances it is indisputable that the ordinary obligations contained in the charter-party are inoperative. The pursuers, however, maintain that an exception must be made of the clause on which they found their present claim, seeing that it specially provides for the case of the vessel being lost. Now, I quite agree that effect must be given to the words 'or should vessel be lost,' and that, having regard to the collocation in which they occur, they must refer to the loss of the vessel in some period of time before the completion of loading. But the clause is silent as to the length backwards of such period of time, so that the question comes to be which of two possible constructions is to be adopted, viz., the pursuers' construction that the period referred to runs from the date of the execution of the contract, or the defenders' construction that it runs from

No. 18.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

On appeal the Sheriff (Cheyne), on 11th July, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of date 19th June last: Finds that on a sound construction of the charter-party founded on, and the vessel therein mentioned having admittedly been lost after the date of the execution thereof, the defenders are bound to pay to the pursuers a commission of three and three-quarters per cent on the estimated gross freight that would have been payable had the contract been performed, and parties being at issue as to the amount of said commission, remits the cause to the Sheriff-substitute with a view to this being ascertained, and for such further procedure as may be necessary."*

Thereafter the parties lodged a joint minute by which they agreed to admit,—“Second, That if the pursuers were entitled to commission under the charter the amount of said commission was reasonably estimated at £225, 16s., and had the vessel been loaded under said charter-party in ordinary course the loading would have been completed by 13th February 1896.

the date when the vessel should be placed at the charterers' disposal. Now, after giving this question careful consideration, I prefer the defenders' construction as most consonant with the meaning of the contract as a whole, while giving sufficient meaning and effect to the words, 'or should vessel be lost.' Besides, if the clause is ambiguous it should be read contra proferentem.

“Further, I fail to see why the parties should have intended this single clause to be operative in the circumstances which have actually occurred. The commission referred to is not a brokerage payable to an intermediary for introducing the parties to each other, or for procuring the contract, nor is it liquidate damages for failure to supply a vessel to the charterers. From the mode in which the amount falls to be calculated, the commission seems to be of the nature of a discount or deduction from freight, though not contingent on the freight being payable. But in whatever light it may be regarded, I do not see that, in the circumstances which have occurred, the pursuers have done anything to earn it.

“There seem to be no decisions directly in point, but some light is thrown on the construction to be put on the words, 'on chartering to arrive,' by the cases with reference to the sale of goods 'on arrival,' mentioned in Benjamin on Sale, 4th edition, pp. 565 and 566, Bell's Com. (N. E.) i. 470, and Bell's Prin. sec. 108.”

* “NOTE.—The construction of the clause in question which the Sheriff-substitute has adopted, though unquestionably a possible one, strikes me as being a forced and unnatural one. It is no doubt true that under the terms of the charter-party the non-arrival of the vessel at Portland by a certain date relieved the charterers (in their option) from the obligation to supply a cargo, but it does not follow that her arrival at Portland was a condition precedent of the whole stipulations of the charter-party, and in my opinion the particular stipulation on which the pursuers found is an independent and separable covenant. The commission there referred to is plainly in lieu of brokerage; the consideration for it was the execution of the contract; and this being its nature, I find it more natural and reasonable to suppose that, while the parties saw fit to stipulate that except in the case of an earlier loss of the vessel it should not be payable till the completion of loading, they contemplated and meant to provide for its payment in any event, than to suppose that they meant the defenders' liability for it to depend on the arrival of the vessel at Portland, and intended by the adjection of the words 'or should vessel be lost' to provide only for the contingency—which is hardly likely to have been in their view—of the vessel's loss in port between the time she was ready to receive cargo and the time when the loading was finished.”

"Third, That the ship 'Barcraig' was at the time of making said charter-party on a passage from New York to Shanghai (from which latter port she was to proceed to the loading-place as provided in said charter-party), and that she was lost during said passage, never having been heard of after leaving New York on or about 25th April 1895. The ship's voyage would in ordinary course be via the Cape of Good Hope, and she would in ordinary course have arrived at Shanghai in or about September 1895.

No. 18.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

"In respect of which admissions they farther agreed to renounce probation."

On 23d September 1896 the Sheriff-substitute in respect of the foregoing minute of admissions and of the Sheriff's interlocutor of 11th July granted decree for £225, 16s.

The defenders appealed, and argued ;—The charter-party contained a single contract, and was to be construed as a whole. It did not contain two contracts—one of brokerage and the other of affreightment—with different incidents and conditions. That being so, if the vessel, which was the subject of the contract, was not in existence when the contract was concluded, the whole contract fell.¹ In the admitted circumstances it lay on the pursuers, who were founding on the contract, to shew that the vessel was lost after its date. This they had failed to do. Again the words "chartering to arrive of the whole of the said vessel" imported a condition precedent, not a warranty.² The exceptions of the act of God, perils of the sea, &c., were exceptions which being purified voided the whole. It was true that some meaning ought to be given to the words "or should the vessel be lost," but the construction adopted by the Sheriff-substitute was an intelligible one, and ought to be adopted. No freight having been earned, the amount of commission could not be determined; the admission on that point was merely an admission to save the expense of a proof.

Argued for the pursuers;—The clause relating to commission constituted a separate contract from the contract of affreightment constituted by the remainder of the charter-party. Had the commission been payable to third parties as brokers, that would have been clear, and it could make no difference that the commission was payable to the charterers. "Commission" might not be a very happy expression when used with reference to a payment to the charterers, but the meaning of the parties was simply this,—that as soon as the charter-party was signed a sum in name of commission became due by the shipowners to the charterers, which was not payable until the ship was loaded, if she ever was loaded, but payment of which, on the other hand, was not contingent on the risk of the vessel being lost. The expression "or should the vessel be lost" was to be construed in its widest sense, and as meaning "if the vessel was lost at any time before arrival at the port of discharge." It was the same as the clause "lost or not lost" in a policy of marine insurance. The clause did not constitute a condition precedent quoad the contract of brokerage. As to the amount due in name of commission, if in fact no freight was earned, that was a jury question.³ In any case the parties were here agreed as to the amount due.

¹ Couturier v. Hastie, 1856, 5 H. L. C. 673; Emerson's case, 1866, L. R., 1 Ch. 433; Paine v. Hutchinson, 1868, L. R., 3 Ch. 388.

² Johnson v. Macdonald, 1842, 9 M. & W. 600.

³ Hill v. Kitching, 1846, 3 C. B. 299; MacLachlan on Shipping (4th ed.), 198.

No. 18. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The clause which we are called upon to construe

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

here is somewhat extraordinary in its terms. It is difficult to read it in any intelligible sense. It says,—“A commission of three and three-quarters per cent shall be paid to charterers on the estimated gross freight in U. S. gold coin (at the exchange of 48 pence) on the completion of loading, or should vessel be lost.” Under the charter-party it was agreed between the parties that “should the vessel fail to arrive at Portland, Oregon, at or before six o'clock P.M. on or before 31st January 1896, charterers” were “to have the option of cancelling or maintaining this charter on arrival of vessel.” The fact is that the vessel was lost on the way to Portland, and never came to any port of loading at all. But it is maintained on the part of the charterers that as the transaction did not take place through a broker, and a commission of three and three-quarters per cent was to be paid to the charterers, on completion of loading, or should the vessel be lost, commission at that rate is now due, although no vessel ever appeared or was tendered at the port of loading. Their argument is, that this was just brokerage for arranging the charter, and that a broker would have got his commission whether the vessel arrived or not. Now, this is certainly not the case of a broker who gets his commission for introducing the parties and bringing them together. This is a special stipulation that on the completion of loading or should the vessel be lost the charterers are to receive a certain percentage on the gross freight. It was pointed out that the amount of the estimated gross freight would have come to depend on what was done when the ship came in, for the rate of freight provided for by the charter-party was different according to the port at which the vessel was ordered to discharge.

Without definitely giving any opinion about the meaning of the words “to arrive” in the first part of the charter-party, I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was right, and that his judgment ought not to have been reversed by the Sheriff. The clause which we have to construe may mean that the three and three-quarters per cent commission is to be payable if the vessel was lost between the time of her arrival and the completion of loading. This is a possible and reasonable reading of the clause. The Sheriff concurs in that view. Now, if there is a possible and reasonable way of reading this clause which is favourable to the opposite party, I think, as it was drawn up by the party who is now claiming under it, and as it must be construed contra proferentem, that reading is the one we must adopt. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion was the sound one, and that we should reverse the Sheriff's decision, and revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The clause founded upon by the pursuers is remarkable. It is difficult to comprehend the idea of a commission being paid by a shipowner to the charterer of his vessel. The word “commission” is plainly inapplicable. It was suggested that “brokerage” would have expressed what was meant better; but I have difficulty in following the idea that the word “brokerage,” which signifies remuneration for services rendered by a person carrying on a particular and well-known trade, could be applicable to such a thing, or to understand why a commission or a sum of money should be paid by a shipowner to a merchant who has chartered his vessel. But there is an obligation to pay a certain sum—it is called commission—to the shipowner on the completion of the loading of the vessel. Well, on the completion of the loading of the vessel you can estimate the gross freight for which the charterer of the vessel will then have incurred liability. But I do not understand the idea of a percentage being paid beforehand upon the freight to a person who is under no liability for freight at all. Therefore I should say that this clause in the charter-party assumes, to begin with, or as the condition of its application, that the merchant who is to be paid a certain percentage on the estimated gross freight is liable for that gross freight; and he is to be paid beforehand, curiously enough, something which will render his liability for freight upon the terms of the charter-party practically less. He will have eventually to pay the whole freight stipulated in the charter-party for which he has incurred liability so soon as the vessel is completely loaded; but then so much money—a percentage upon the estimated amount—is put into his pocket beforehand, so that it comes to be a reduction of the amount of his liability. I am therefore of opinion that one condition—the primary condition—of this singular clause being operative is, that there shall be liability for the freight, a percentage upon which is to be paid beforehand to the person liable in order to reduce the amount of his liability. Now, I think the condition of any liability on the part of the charterer of the vessel for freight is that the vessel shall arrive. That is the Sheriff-substitute's view. The words in the charter-party are "to arrive," which Mr Aitken very properly said he felt himself bound to concur in reading as the defenders here read them—on the arrival of the ship at the port of loading, or at the port to which it is under obligation to go in order to receive cargo. That is the primary condition of the charter-party coming into operation—that the ship shall arrive. Now, it never arrived, and consequently there never was an obligation upon the charterers to pay freight. It cannot be maintained that they ever were under liability to pay freight; and it is made more clear, if it is capable of being made more clear, by the two clauses in the charter-party to which I called attention during the debate. The first of them is, that upon the arrival of the vessel it shall be certified as in good seagoing condition to perform the obligations on the ship by the charter-party; and the charterers must be satisfied that it is. If they are not, and if it is not decided against them that they ought to be satisfied, the charter-party is void, and they are under no obligation at all. I do not need to read the words again—I read them while the case was in course of being argued. If the vessel does not arrive it cannot be certified as in a proper condition to fulfil the owner's obligations under the charter-party; and unless it is so certified and the charterers are satisfied with the certification to that effect, the charter-party is at an end, and there can be no obligation to pay freight. Then the other clause is, that if from any cause whatever—and the most obvious cause is the loss of the vessel—it does not arrive on or before the 31st January 1896, again the charter-party is at an end, unless the merchant, upon its subsequent arrival within a reasonable time thereafter, elect to go on although under no obligation to do so. Now, that could not be either. It did not arrive on or before the 31st of January, being at the

No. 18.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

No. 18.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

bottom of the sea. Thus the charterers are under no obligation to pay freight, and for the reasons which I have already explained, I think this clause, which is the foundation of the action, is not applicable where they are under no liability to pay freight. Against this the only argument is upon these words,—“Or should vessel be lost.” Now, I cannot in a clause so altogether novel as to be unprecedented read these words as meaning that if the vessel is lost and never arrives at the port of loading, there shall be this obligation on the part of the owners, that they shall be bound to pay to the charterers a certain percentage upon the freight. In the circumstances as they admittedly exist there is no obligation here upon either party under this charter-party. I therefore agree with your Lordship that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute ought in effect to be returned to, and that of the Sheriff recalled.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I also agree that we should revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. The clause upon which the pursuers rely is admittedly one of a novel and unusual character. I think it clearly lay upon them to shew that that clause will bear the construction which they seek to put upon it. The strength of their case is that it contains a provision that commission is to be paid in the event of the vessel being lost. We certainly are bound to give some effect to these words, but I think it lies upon the pursuers to shew very clearly that, whereas all the other conditions of the contract are dependent upon the arrival of the vessel at Portland, this condition is not, but applies to the case of the vessel never arriving at Portland at all. Now, I quite follow and appreciate the argument which Mr Aitken addressed to us that this was a separable contract for what was substantially brokerage—brokerage to be paid independently of the contract being carried out, upon the completion of the contract. But that is a very unusual kind of stipulation when made in favour of the charterers, and I think it lies upon the pursuers to shew distinctly that the words upon which they found entitle them to payment of this commission although the vessel never reached the port at all. I do not think they have succeeded in doing that; on the other hand, I think that the owners have suggested an intelligible explanation of these words which is consistent with their referring to a time subsequent to arrival in port. We see from the contract that although the vessel was to come to Portland in the first instance, the charterers had it in their power to order her to proceed to various other ports. And therefore after arrival she might have been lost on the way to one or other of those ports to which she might be destined by the charterers. That construction squares with the collocation of the words “or should vessel be lost” after the words “on completion of loading,” and therefore they may refer to the case of the vessel being partially loaded at one port and proceeding towards another, and being lost on the way.

On the whole matter I think the Sheriff-substitute has taken the sound view of the case, and that we should revert to his judgment.

LORD YOUNG.—Perhaps I should say that I rather approve of the view which was urged upon us in argument, leading to the same results as the view we have adopted—I mean the view that there being nothing to shew that the vessel was in existence at the date of this contract, but everything to suggest the reverse, the contract consequently was void altogether from the beginning, and never came into operation at all. No. 18.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 19th June 1896: Therefore of new assoilzie the defenders from the prayer of the petition: Find them entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court," &c.

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—WILLIAM B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

Nov. 4, 1896.
Sibson & Kerr
v. Ship "Bar-
craig" Co.,
Limited.

ALEXANDER S. PATERSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—T. B. Morison.

No. 19.

ALEXANDER KIDD AND OTHERS (William Kidd's Trustees),
Defenders (Appellants).—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Nov. 5, 1896.
Paterson v.
Kidd's
Trustees.

Reparation—Negligence—Defective floor in granary—Duty of inspection—Latent Defect.—A plumber employed by a farmer sustained injuries while crossing the floor of a granary, which at a particular spot gave way beneath him. In an action of damages by him against the farmer it was proved that the floor had been overhauled two years before the accident by a competent tradesman, and that it had been ever since in daily use by the defender and his servants, who were in the habit of crossing it with heavy weights, and that there was no reason to suppose it was in a dangerous condition.

Held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the accident was due to the fault of the defender.

Dolan v. Burnet, March 4, 1896, 23 R. 550, distinguished.

IN March 1896 Alexander S. Paterson, plumber, Musselburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, against the trustees of the late William Kidd, farmer, Pinkiehill, Musselburgh, concluding for £500 in name of damages. 1st Division. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

The pursuer averred that James Henderson, plumber, Fisherrow, in whose employment he was, had received orders from one of the defenders, who were carrying on the farm occupied by the late Mr Kidd, to fit a new kitchen boiler in the farm-house, and that the pursuer had been sent to do the work.

(Cond. 5) "While carrying out these instructions he entered a loft adjoining said farm-house and tenanted by the defenders for the purpose of shutting off the water supply, to enable a new kitchen boiler to be fitted in, and when walking over the flooring to that part of the loft where the water cistern therein was situated, the floor suddenly and without warning gave way. This was in consequence of its rotten state and want of timeous attention and repair on the part of the defenders, although it was in a sound and proper state when the subjects were let to them and the said deceased William Kidd. The pursuer had no warning of any danger, and relied, as he was entitled to do, upon the floor being in a sufficient condition to bear his weight. The defenders knew, or ought to have known, of the defective condition of said floor. In his endeavour to save himself, the pursuer instinctively threw out his hands, when his left hand came against a sharp hook, which was hanging near the place, with the result that his hand was severely lacerated, and one finger had to be amputated.

No. 19.

Nov. 5, 1896.
 Paterson v.
 Kidd's
 Trustees.

It was the duty of the defenders to have seen that the said flooring was in good order and repair."

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or others for whom they are responsible or represent, the pursuer is entitled to reparation as concluded for.

The defenders denied that they had failed in any duty to the pursuer, and they pleaded;—1. The averments of the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to support the prayer of the petition. 3. The defenders not having failed in any duty to the pursuer, are not liable as sued for. 5. (1) The injury to the pursuer having been accidental, the defenders are not liable for the consequences thereof.

A proof was allowed. It was proved that the pursuer had been injured in the manner stated on record. It was also proved that two years before the accident the late Mr Kidd had employed a joiner named Sandilands,* to overhaul the floor of the granary, and to do any repairs which he considered necessary; that the granary had been used constantly ever since by one of the defenders,† who managed the farm, and by his servants, who were in the habit of walking across it almost every day, carrying heavy bags of oats and beans, &c., and that there was no reason to suppose that the floor was in a dangerous condition.

On 2d July the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact, that the defenders, as representing the late William Kidd, are tenants of Pinkiehill Farm, near Musselburgh; that on 22d November last the pursuer, who was then in the employment of James Henderson, plumber, Fisherrow, was sent by his master to said farmhouse to put in a new kitchen boiler; that in connection with said work it was necessary to shut off the water from the cistern; that for that purpose the pursuer went up to the loft where the cistern was situated, and that, as he was walking towards the

* Thomas Sandilands deponed,—“I am a master joiner at Inveresk. About two years ago the late Mr Kidd employed me to do certain work in connection with the cistern in the granary at Pinkiehill. I was to strengthen the parts where the cistern was standing, and to repair the cistern as the plumber required, and I was to look over the floors and do any repairs that I considered were wanted. I thoroughly examined the floor then, and made repairs where I considered these were necessary. I renewed pieces of it here and there. It was a general repair. I know where the accident happened to the pursuer, near the water tank. It was where I joined the new wood to the old. I did the work on the flooring in a thoroughly tradesmanlike manner. I looked at it after it was executed. I was paid for my work by the late Mr Kidd.”

† Alexander Kidd deponed,—“I have occasion to be in the granary once a week, and sometimes oftener. I am almost daily in the coach-house. . . . I never saw anything the matter with the floor, from above or below. Roughly speaking, we have over twenty servants about the farm. No complaint was ever made to me by any one of them as to the condition of that floor. I never heard of any complaint being made by any one. I had no reason to suppose that floor was in a dangerous condition. The farm people would use the granary nearly every day, and not less than four times a week. It is a place where we have sometimes fifty or sixty bags of oats stored. We take three or four bags at a time down to the stables. There are also beans kept there. A bag of oats weighs 12 stones, and a bag of beans 20 stones, and men carry those over the floor in question regularly, certainly not less than four times a week.”

watercock, his foot suddenly went through the floor, which was rotten at that part; that in the endeavour to save himself from falling, he instinctively threw out his arms, when his left hand came upon a reaping hook which was hanging near the place, with the result that his hand was badly cut, rendering it necessary to amputate the second finger, while the power of moving the third finger has been almost entirely lost; that the said accident was caused by the rotten and unsafe condition of part of the said floor, which condition was due to the fault of the defenders or of the said William Kidd: Finds in law, that the defenders are responsible for said accident, and are liable in damages to the pursuer; therefore ordains the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £200 sterling." *

No. 19.

Nov. 5, 1896.
Paterson v.
Kidd's
Trustees.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—*Dolan v. Burnet*¹ was decided on specialties which did not exist here. In that case the general public were invited to the shop, while here they had no right of access to the granary. Then again the premises in that case were very old, and the portion of the floor which gave way had been repeatedly patched, and the defect could have been discovered by anyone going into the cellar below. In any view the case, and the other cases cited by the pursuer, were not authorities for the proposition that the tenant was necessarily liable for an accident happening in such circumstances. The measure of diligence required by the law on the part of the defenders was just the reasonable care which a prudent man should exercise in the use of his own property. *Moffat & Company v. Park*² was decided expressly upon the ground that the jury had affirmatively found that there was fault on the part of the defender. In Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock Sacking Company,³ it was held that looking to the nature of the premises the defenders were guilty of recklessly overloading their store and bringing down the building. In Brady v. Parker,⁴ the Court held that the exercise of reasonable care would have convinced the tenant that the hoist should have been fenced and not left open. *Francis v. Cockrell*⁵ was decided on the footing that there was unusual risk incurred by anyone setting up such a grand stand. The pursuer must establish that there was negligence on the defenders' part in the sense of failure to use reasonable precautions. Now, here, there had been no complaint made of the condition of the floor by those who were daily going across it with heavy weights, and only two years prior to the accident it had been overhauled by a competent tradesman.

Argued for the pursuer;—He was entitled to have an interlocutor

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute is unable to distinguish this case from the recent case of Dolan v. Burnet, as yet reported only in the Scottish Law Reporter, vol. 33, p. 397. If there is any difference between them the proof of fault on the part of the defenders is even stronger than it was in Dolan's case.

"As regards the sum decerned for, it is to be observed that the pursuer is now unable to work as a plumber, and that, after sixteen years' experience in that trade—he is now a man of thirty-four—he has to look out for other means of earning a livelihood."

¹ Dolan v. Burnet, March 4, 1896, 23 R. 550.

² Moffat & Co. v. Park, Oct. 16, 1877, 5 R. 13.

³ Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co. and Others, May 13, 1875, 2 R. 671.

⁴ Brady v. Parker, June 7, 1887, 14 R. 783.

⁵ Francis v. Cockrell, 1870, L. R., 5 Q. B. 501.

No. 19.
 Nov. 5, 1896.
 Paterson v.
 Kidd's
 Trustees.

containing similar findings to those in Dolan v. Burnet,¹ which was really a stronger case than the present; for the danger was latent there, while here it could have been detected if the defenders had duly fulfilled their duty of inspection. The proprietor of a house was at common law held to guarantee all persons whom he invited to enter it against anything of the nature of a concealed danger.² The defenders had failed to displace their liability by shewing that no reasonable inspection could have disclosed the rottenness of the floor. They were accordingly liable in damages.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriff-substitute has found that the accident "was caused by the rotten and unsafe condition of the floor, which condition was due to the fault of the defenders or of the said William Kidd." He has given a very brief statement of the grounds of his judgment, and he appears to have gone to a large extent on a consideration of the case of Dolan v. Burnet.¹

Now, when I look at the interlocutor in that case, I find that the judgment rests upon a finding of fault in the circumstances of that case, and therefore the decision cannot possibly absolve us from the duty of ascertaining whether there has been fault on the part of the present defenders in the circumstances of the present case.

The fault alleged is negligence,—the statement against the defender being that whereas the event proved that the floor of the granary in a particular spot was rotten, this ought to have been within the knowledge of the defenders, and should have been provided against by them by mending or removing the bad part.

We have to attend to the special circumstances of this case, and I must say that I am unable to come to the conclusion that the defenders are chargeable with fault. If the question be, in agreement with *Dolan's*¹ case, whether there was fault attributable to the defenders, then we must know specifically what fault they were guilty of.

Now, this building was a granary in constant use, and, if we take as the test what a prudent man would do for his own safety, it appears that Alexander Kidd, one of the trustees who lived on the farm, was constantly in the building walking across the floor just as the plumber did. But there is more than that—more also than the constant and unsuspecting use of it by other persons in his employment—because it appears that two years ago there had been occasion to employ tradesmen to overhaul the building, and we have the evidence of Sandilands, a master joiner, who went over the premises and made general repairs wherever necessary, reporting his work to Mr Kidd. Accordingly, if there is a duty of inspection of all premises, then this duty was fulfilled, for it can hardly be said that in the case of a granary in constant use there ought to be a skilled inspection more often than once in two years. Without laying down any general rule on the subject, the fact is that the building was overhauled by competent tradesmen, and from that time down to the occasion of the accident the occupiers of the premises shewed their belief in its sufficiency by using it. I cannot say that I think that any deliberating and well-thinking jury would find as fault that there was negligence attributable to these defenders, and, accordingly, where I differ from the Sheriff-substitute is, that I think he has been moved, by a construction of *Dolan's*¹ case which I cannot think well founded, to take a somewhat short cut to a conclusion of negligence on the defenders' part.

¹ 23 R. 550.

² Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, 21 R. 498, per Lord Young, 507; Campbell v. Kennedy, Nov. 25, 1864, 3 Macph. 121, 37 Scot. Jur. 62; Moffat & Co. v. Park, Oct. 16, 1877, 5 R. 13; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co. and Others, May 13, 1875, 2 R. 671; Brady v. Parker, June 7, 1887, 14 R. 783; Beven on Negligence, vol. 1, p. 500; Indemaur v. Daines, 1866, L. R., 1 C. P. 274, per Justice Willes, 287; Francis v. Cockrell, 1870, L. R., 5 Q. B. 501; Smith v. London and St Katherine Docks Co., 1868, L. R., 3 C. P. 326.

No. 19.

Nov. 5, 1896.
Paterson v.
Kidd's
Trustees.

I desire to say that I quite understand that, according to the nature of the defect, there may arise presumptions one way or the other, e.g., an occupier will have to account for ignorance of something apparent and obvious. But on the other hand where it is not obvious, and where we have a careful overhaul two years previously, and constant use thereafter, I cannot, as a jurymen, affirm that negligence has been proved.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer, who was temporarily employed by the defenders as plumber, had occasion to cross the floor of a granary in their occupation, and in doing so met with the accident for which he now claims compensation from them. Now, this is an action for damages in which fault must be proved, and I observe that the only plea set out on record is that the accident was due to the fault or negligence of the defenders, and that accordingly must form the issue which the pursuers are bound to prove.

I am not of opinion that there is any legal obligation on an owner or occupier towards a third person to guarantee that such person shall under all circumstances be kept free from accident. If an accident does happen, the question then arises whether there has been any fault or negligence on the part of the owner or occupier.

Now, there is no doubt that the fact of an accident having occurred may create a presumption of fault which, if not explained away, may cause liability. It is accordingly the duty of the defenders to take such reasonable and ordinary precautions as would any prudent man to provide for the safety of himself, his family, and his servants.

In the case of buildings, it may be the proprietor's duty to see that they are originally constructed in a safe manner, while, if they have been a long time built, there arises a duty of inspection.

The real question here seems to be, whether the defenders failed to use proper inspection to see if the floor was safe and fit for use. I think the evidence clearly proves the contrary. It was said by the pursuer that the floor was obviously rotten, but that is not borne out by the evidence. We have a skilled tradesman who testifies that two years before the accident he was employed to put the floor into a fit condition, and that having done so he informed the defenders, who were naturally satisfied. There may not

No. 19. have been sufficient inspection by him, but the defenders are not responsible for that, having employed a competent man to do the work ; and accordingly, up to that date, they are absolved from the charge of negligence. If that be so the question is, whether there is anything to shew subsequent neglect on their part, or that the state of the floor became so much worse during these two years as to be obviously dangerous. It was in daily use by the defenders and their men, and I agree with your Lordship that the pursuer has failed to prove any negligence on the part of the defenders.

Nov. 5, 1896.
Paterson v.
Kidd's
Trustees.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that it is an old and sound rule of law that when two people are brought into contact under an ordinary contractual relation, and one owes to the other a certain measure of care and diligence, the standard of diligence is that middle degree which would be exercised by a prudent man in the conduct of his own affairs. That rule seems to me to be particularly applicable to the circumstances here, where a workman, temporarily employed in executing repairs, is entitled, in going about the premises, to find such provisions for his safety as a prudent householder would make for that of himself and his family and servants. These provisions would be different according to the nature of the occupation of the householder. Thus, in a private house, one would expect to find substantial floors and a well-guarded staircase, while in an engineer's shop there might be planks leading from one gallery to another and temporary ladders. The floor in question was one built to carry heavy weights, such as sacks of corn and beans. I agree that, if it can be shewn that the tenants—the defenders—had good reason to think that it was in a sufficient state of repair for the occupation of themselves and their servants, they had fulfilled their obligation to the plumber. On the facts there is no reason to doubt this, because the floor was put in repair by a competent tradesman—on whose skill no imputation is cast—only two years before the accident, and it is impossible to maintain, in the absence of any suspicion of its soundness, that there was a duty of further inspection within so short a period. If the defenders had noticed that the floor was becoming unsound, then it would have been their duty to see the hole mended or fenced off, and workmen casually employed by them would be entitled to get warning of the danger, or to obtain pecuniary indemnity in respect of an accident caused by neglect of such precautions. But there is no evidence to support any suggestion of fault in that sense, viz., that Mr Kidd knew or ought to have known of the fact that part of the floor was unsound.

Accordingly, the case is one of pure misfortune, and however much we may deplore the accident, we cannot hold that it gives any ground for compensation from the pursuer's employers. I have only to add, that as regards the case of Dolan,¹ I find in it nothing inconsistent with the view stated by me as to the criterion of responsibility in actions of this kind. We are not concerned with the application of the principle to the facts of that case. We should have to know more of those facts before we could usefully discuss the case as a judgment on the question of fact.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

¹ 23 R. 550.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact that the pursuer has failed to prove that the accident causing him injury was due to the fault of the defenders, and in law that no liability attached to them: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 2d July 1896: Assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action," &c.

No. 19.
Nov. 5, 1896.
Paterson v.
Kidd's
Trustees.

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—FINLAY & WILSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER WOOD (Smith's Judicial Factor), Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Jameson—Macphail.

No. 20.

DAVID HUNTER AND OTHERS (Neill's Trustees).—John Wilson—Clyde.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

Succession—Vesting—Clause of survivorship.—A testator, by trust-disposition and settlement, directed his trustees "at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas making twelve months after my death, or as soon thereafter and from time to time as the same may be realised, to divide and pay over the residue of my estate equally amongst all my four children above named, their heirs or assignees respectively," and further provided,—“In the event of any of my said children dying leaving lawful issue, the provisions hereby made in their favour shall fall to such issue . . . and in like manner, should any of my said children die without being married or leaving lawful issue, then the provisions hereby made in their favours shall fall to and be divisible amongst my other surviving children, including the issue of anyone who may have died, such issue always coming in their parents' room.”

Held, on a construction of the deed as a whole (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy), that the presumption that a clause of survivorship referred to the period of distribution had been excluded by evidence of a contrary intention in the deed, and that the children's shares of residue vested in them a morte testatoris.

Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 314, distinguished.

DAVID NEILL, farmer, Mains of Ardestie, Fifeshire, died in 1847, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 5th September 1839, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the purposes therein set forth.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

By the third purpose he appointed his trustees "to lay out and invest a sum of £4000 on good heritable or personal security, or set aside funds or property out of my estate to that amount, or as nearly, less or more, as may be, and to continue the full controul and management of said fund ay and until my youngest daughter reach the age of twenty-one years, or if dead before that time, then at the period at which she would, if alive, have reached that age, on which event, or at all events at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter, I appoint my said trustees to apportion the said fund as follows, viz.:—To pay my son William £500, Robert £800, and my said daughter Margaret, but subject to the directions after mentioned, £1000, or the heirs and assignees of my said sons and daughter respectively; which legacies are granted in order to equalise the provisions of my said children with those already made to my daughter Susan through her mother's relations and me, and to complete the education of Margaret, and the balance thereof shall be equally divided amongst all my children, the said William and Robert Neill, my said daughter Susan, spouse of the said Peter Ballingall, and Margaret aforesaid, their respective heirs or assignees; and until the period of said division arrives, I appoint my said trustees to pay over

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

the annual interest or proceeds of the fund so to be invested to my said four children and their foresaids in the same proportions as the said capital sum is to be divided, each child drawing interest or proceeds according to the amount of his or her legacy and shares respectively."

The fourth purpose was as follows:—"Fourth, At the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas making twelve months after my death, or as soon thereafter and from time to time as the same may be realised, to divide and pay over the residue of my estate equally amongst all my four children above named, their heirs or assignees respectively, the share of my daughter Margaret, including her share and interest in the fund to be set aside under the preceding article, to be subject to the conditions after mentioned."

The fifth purpose was in these terms:—"Fifth, I appoint the whole provisions above mentioned in favour of my said daughter Margaret to be retained and managed by my said trustees, and lent out and invested, so far as not invested under article third, in their names on good heritable or personal security for her behoof until her marriage or attaining the age of thirty-two years complete; meantime to apply the annual proceeds thereof for her maintenance, and in particular to the completion of her education, for which purpose I have given her a larger legacy under article third, and therefore with power to encroach on her capital for that purpose to an extent not exceeding £200, with power to my trustees on the marriage of my said daughter (should that occur prior to her reaching the said age of thirty-two years), and after advancing her a reasonable outfit, to settle and secure the whole of her means and estate then remaining in their hands by contract of marriage or otherwise on herself and the heirs of the body; whom failing, her own nearest heirs or assignees, but expressly secluding the jus mariti of any husband she may marry, and declaring that the same shall not be subject to his debts or deeds; with power nevertheless to my said trustees, should they deem it expedient or the party be deserving, to lend to any husband she may marry any sum not exceeding one-third part of her free capital, taking security for the amount by life insurance or otherwise, as they may see fit; and with power also to my said trustees, if thought expedient, to create a trust under such contract of marriage, and to denude of my said daughter's funds under the directions above mentioned in favour of the trustees therein appointed; but in the event of my daughter Margaret not being married by the time she reached the foresaid age of thirty-two, then I direct my said trustees, should they deem it advisable and conducive to my daughter's comfort, to lay out a sum, not exceeding one-half of her free capital, in purchasing an annuity on her own life, and then to pay over to her the balance or the whole of her funds then in their hands, as the case may be."

The settlement provided lastly, as follows:—"Lastly, In the event of any of my said children dying leaving lawful issue, the provisions hereby made in their favour shall fall to such issue respectively in such shares as their parents may have appointed by any writing under their hands, which failing, equally among them; and in like manner, should any of my said children die without being married or leaving lawful issue, then the provisions hereby made in their favours shall fall to and be divisible amongst my other surviving children, including the issue of any one who may have died, such issue always coming in their parents' room."

The foregoing provisions were declared to be in full of the children's legal rights, with a clause of forfeiture in the event of repudiation of the settlement. No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

The testator's daughter Margaret was married to John Smith, farmer, Haughs of Kinnaird, in 1848, and by contract of marriage between her and her husband, to which her father's trustees were parties, these trustees, on the narrative of the powers conferred by the trust-disposition and settlement, conveyed to the marriage-contract trustees the whole fortune and provisions to which she was then or might thereafter become entitled under the trust-disposition and settlement, under deduction of such sums as should be advanced or allowed to her by them in name of outfit, with full power to the marriage-contract trustees to uplift, sue for, and discharge the same; and the testamentary trustees, as consenters to the marriage-contract, thereby bound themselves to pay over and transfer the whole funds and property falling to her under the trust-disposition and settlement to her trustees from time to time, as the same were realised.

In December 1895 William A. Wood, C.A., Edinburgh, judicial factor on Mrs Smith's marriage-contract trust-estate, brought an action, which raised the question of the period of vesting of the residue under David Neill's settlement, but which related only to a piece of ground with a house thereon, which Neill had purchased in 1847, taking the title as follows:—"To and in favour of Mrs Susan Laird Neill or Ballingall, residing at Bridge of Allan, widow of Peter Ballingall, farmer, Ayton, and Margaret Brand Neill, residing at Bridge of Allan, both daughters of the said David Neill, and the survivor of them, in liferent for their and her liferent use allenary, and declaring that the said Susan Laird Neill or Ballingall shall be entitled to the exclusive liferent use and enjoyment of the said piece of ground and others hereby disposed during the whole period of her lifetime, and to and in favour of the said David Neill, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, in fee."

The state of the testator's family was as follows:—He was survived by two sons William and Robert, and by two daughters Susan (Mrs Ballingall) and Margaret (Mrs Smith). All the children were dead at the date of the action, Margaret, the last survivor, having died on 9th September 1895. She and her two brothers left issue, who were alive at the date of the action, but Mrs Ballingall died without issue.

The action, to which the testamentary trustees and the other persons interested were called as defenders, concluded for declarator that the pursuer, as judicial factor foresaid, had right to one-fourth pro indiviso of the subjects purchased by the testator in 1847, or, alternatively, had right to one-fourth of the price of the said subjects in the event of the same being sold by the trustees, and for decree ordaining the said trustees to convey, or alternatively, to make payment accordingly.

The testamentary trustees lodged defences, in which they maintained "that on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased David Neill, read in the light of the destination in the said disposition of the heritable property in question, and especially in view of the survivorship clause contained in the said trust-disposition and settlement, vesting was postponed until the date of the death of the liferentrix, Mrs M. Neill or Smith, on 9th September 1895, and that in consequence of the testator's children having all predeceased Mrs Smith, the last liferentrix, the succession thereto has devolved on their issue per stirpes as conditional institutes.

No. 20. If the vesting was so postponed, the division of the proceeds of the property in question will be tripartite, and the pursuer will have no interest in the present case.”

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said Margaret Brand Neill or Smith having had right, as one of the four children of her said father, to one-fourth of the residue of his estate, the pursuer, as her assignee, in the circumstances condescended on, is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Vesting having been postponed as stated in the defences, the pursuer never acquired any interest in the property in question.

On 4th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the first plea in law for the defenders and assailing them from the conclusions of the summons.*

* “OPINION.—This case raises a question under the settlement of the late David Neill, who died so far back as the year 1847. The question is as to the date at which vesting took place in a certain part of his succession, viz., a house which he had bought at the Bridge of Allan. There is no doubt that, although subject to a liferent created by the deceased himself, that house formed part of the residue of his estate, and with respect to that residue, his settlement, which we have here to construe, contains the following provision:—His trustees are directed, ‘at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas making twelve months after my death, or as soon thereafter and from time to time as the same may be realised, to divide and pay over the residue of my estate equally amongst all my four children above named, their heirs or assignees respectively.’ Now, here it will be observed that there is, on the one hand, no gift of any share in the residue until the period of realisation. On the other hand, there is a destination-over, or what is called a destination-over, ‘to heirs and assignees,’ and therefore if this clause had stood alone there would have been room to argue, on the one hand, that there was vesting a morte—heirs and assignees being merely called as substitutes after vesting. There might, on the other hand, have been room to argue that the ‘heirs’ at all events were conditional institutes, and that therefore there was postponement of vesting until the period of realisation. How that question should have been decided had the clause in question stood alone, I do not think it necessary to inquire, because the settlement contains in its last purpose a further provision in these terms—(His Lordship quoted the clause). There is here, it will be noted, first a destination-over to issue, and then failing issue a clause of survivorship among the original legatees.

“Now, the question is, whether this destination-over and clause of survivorship can be read as referring to the event of predecease of the testator, or must, according to the general rule of construction, be read as referring to predecease of the period of distribution,—that is to say, in the case of this residue to the period of realisation.

“I am of opinion that there is nothing in this present case to take it out of the general rule—the general rule which I take to have been settled as far back as the case of Young v. Robertson. And the fact which I have pointed out, that there is here no gift prior to the period of realisation appears to me to create a special difficulty in the way of holding that vesting to this residue took place a morte testatoris.

“The pursuer no doubt founds on the third purpose of the settlement, which deals with the sum of £4000, as to which the direction is that the sum is to be set aside until the youngest daughter reaches the age of twenty-one, and then divided in certain proportions amongst the sons and daughters or their ‘heirs and assignees.’ It seemed to be argued that in this third purpose vesting was plainly a morte, and that the presumption is against

The pursuer reclaimed. The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.¹ No. 20.

At advising,—

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The testator's deed in this case is framed with a view to the division of the residue of his estate in equal proportions among his family, there being a separate provision for an unequal division of a special sum of £4000, this unequal division being declared to be for the purpose of equalising the provisions to the children, 'one daughter Susan having before his death received certain advantages, and one daughter Margaret requiring to have her education completed. The trustees were directed to retain this sum till the time when this latter daughter should, or would if alive, have attained majority, and then to apportion it in a certain manner. It was also directed that during the period they retained the capital they were to pay the interest to the children in the same proportions as those in which the capital sum was to be divided.

As regards the residue, the trustees were directed by the fourth purpose different periods of vesting as applicable to different parts of the fund. All I can say is, that it does not appear to me to be by any means clear that vesting under this clause was a morte. On the contrary, I think the question is practically the same question which arises with respect to the residue, and I see no more reason for holding that vesting took place under this clause before the period of distribution than I see reason for holding that the residue vested before distribution.

"The pursuer, however, also founds on the special provision in the fifth purpose of the settlement, which deals with the whole provisions (residue included) in favour of Margaret Neill, whose share, as it happens, is that specially in question. It is certainly true that the trustees are here directed to retain and manage the whole of Margaret Neill's provisions until she attains the age of thirty-two years or is married; and in the event of her marriage before she reaches thirty-two, to settle the whole of her means and estate then remaining in their hands by contract of marriage on herself and the heirs of her body. That is quite true, and, but for the provision in the last purpose of the settlement to which I have referred, I do not doubt that the result would have been to make Margaret's provisions vest at latest at the date of her marriage. But then I cannot leave the last clause out of view in construing this clause, any more than I can leave it out of view in construing the other clauses, and the scheme of the settlement being for vesting at the period of distribution, I am not able to hold that Margaret's provisions formed an exception. It is true that her whole means were directed to be settled at her marriage by marriage-contract, but I apprehend that there may quite well be a conveyance, by marriage-contract or otherwise, of unvested and contingent rights—a conveyance quite as effectual (or which may be quite as effectual) as a conveyance of absolute rights. Therefore I am not prepared to hold that the provisions with respect to the share of Margaret derogate from the general scheme of the settlement as expressed in the last purpose. I think that vesting took place only at the period of distribution, and that being so, I suppose what happens is that I assolzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons."

¹ Pursuer's Authorities.—Ferrier v. Ferrier, May 18, 1872, 10 Macph. 711, 44 Scot. Jur. 390; Scott v. Scott's Executrix, Jan. 27, 1877, 4 R. 384.

Defenders' Authorities.—Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 314, 34 Scot. Jur. 270; Howat's Trustees v. Howat, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 337, 42 Scot. Jur. 116; Bryson's Trustee v. Clark, Nov. 26, 1880, 8 R. 142; Marshall v. King, Oct. 30, 1888, 16 R. 40; Macdougall v. Macfarlane's Trustees, May 16, 1880, 17 R. 761.

No. 20.

Nov. 8, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

—(His Lordship read the fourth purpose); and by the fifth purpose certain directions were given as to Margaret's share, in view of education and marriage, which is there described as "her capital" and "her means and estate," and "her funds."

The last clause states—(His Lordship read the clause "Lastly"), and then followed a clause of forfeiture in the event of any of the children repudiating the settlement.

The question is whether the survivorship clause in the last clause is to be read as relating to any beneficiary predeceasing the testator or to any beneficiary predeceasing the period of distribution. It appears to me that the deed in its whole scope is against the idea of intention on the part of the testator to postpone vesting to some indefinite period occurring at an interval after his death. I cannot read the words of the fourth purpose as fixing a time for vesting by stating a time for division. They are a reasonable provision for giving a time to the trustees for realisation, quite common in such cases as this, and do not indicate an intention to postpone vesting. They do not make it necessary to read in the last clause such words as "before receiving payment," words which have occurred in testamentary writings, and to which effect has been given. The provisions relating to the disposal of the £4000 are, I think, not indicative of an intention to postpone vesting, for he speaks of the proportions payable respectively as "their shares," and appoints the interest to be paid pending the arrival of the period of payment. And if this provision thus vested a morte, it is difficult to see how there should be a different period of vesting for the residue, in regard to which the apportionment of this £4000 was to act as an equalising of provisions.

This view is confirmed by the fifth purpose, which relates to the share of the youngest daughter, Margaret. Many of the expressions point to a gift to her, to be held by the trustees "as her means and estate," "her free capital," and "her funds"—indeed it is treated as belonging to her, and they are empowered to secure it, and that at once, as being "her means and estate," she being entitled to receive the interest as her own. And if Margaret marries they are to secure to herself and the heirs of her body. That does not point to the security of a mere expectancy. It points distinctly to a provision made, to be secured on marriage to her.

Taking all these indications of intention along with the clause of declaration as regards legitim, and of forfeiture against repudiating children, I feel justified in holding the testator's intention to have been vesting a morte, and that the pursuer is entitled to prevail in regard to the property which forms the subject of the present litigation.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. From the first I had no doubt that under the provisions of this settlement there was vesting a morte testatoris. No reasonable argument against that view has occurred to me. It would be sufficient if it were shewn that this was so with reference to Margaret's provisions, but I think it is also true with regard to the provisions of all the children that vesting took place a morte testatoris. The question here is limited to a house purchased by the testator shortly before his death. The title is in the name of the trustees, and the property vested in them in trust at the testator's death. It seems to have been argued in the Outer-House—and the Lord Ordinary was apparently impressed with the argument—that as there is a direction to pay only twelve months after the testator's death, and a destination-over to the issue of children, and, further, a clause of survivorship in similar terms to that found in the case of Robertson,¹ vesting must be taken to be postponed till the period of distribution. The expression used in the deed is as follows:—"At the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, making twelve months after my death, or as soon thereafter and from time to time as the same may be realised, to divide and pay over the residue of my estate equally amongst all my four children above named, their heirs or assignees respectively." That is just the provision found in most wills, that trustees are to pay and divide as soon after the testator's death as the estate can be realised. It cannot well be paid and divided sooner. The law allows executors time for that purpose. The usual rule is that they have six months after the testator's death to realise, and that is also the usual provision in wills. The trustees are usually directed to divide at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, making six months after the testator's death, or as soon thereafter as the same may be realised. But it is a new idea to me that such a clause could postpone vesting. It is a novelty to me that the period allowed for distribution should be supposed to have anything to do with vesting. To postpone the period of distribution for twelve months would not postpone vesting, and neither would the postponement of distribution till the estate can be realised. With regard to the house, as to which the question in this case arises, there can be no difficulty as to realisation or distribution. It has stood on the same title since shortly after the testator's death. It was not turned into money. Neither is money in bank. But it was as much realised as anything else. The estate must be vested in something. This house as it stood, without being turned into money at all, was just as completely vested in the beneficiaries as anything could be. The proposition that vesting was to take place from time to time as it was found convenient to turn the various investments into money is extravagant. The intention of the testator as gathered from the deed,—and that is the only source from which we can ascertain his intention,—is perfectly clear. (His Lordship then quoted the fifth purpose above set forth.) In face of that language to express even a doubt that her share was vested in her and liable for her debts and deeds appears to me entirely without foundation. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be reversed, and that we must give decree in favour of the pursuer, and find and declare accordingly, in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons.

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary has held that this case is ruled by the case of Young v. Robertson.¹ In that view I cannot concur. In that case the truster conveyed his whole estate to trustees, directing them to pay the income to his wife if she should survive him (as was the case), and to account for, pay, and divide, or convey the residue after the death of the last liver of himself and his wife to certain

¹ 4 Macq. 314.

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

persons named, with a clause of survivorship; and it was held that under that destination no right vested in the beneficiaries until the period of distribution arrived, that is, until the death of the liferentrix. Now, if in this case, as is maintained by the respondents, and as the Lord Ordinary thinks, nothing vested till the estate was realised and payment of the shares actually made, the case of *Robertson*¹ would probably be in point. But the whole scope of the trust-deed before us is adverse to such a contention, and it is to the whole scope of the trust-deed that we must look for the truster's intention. There was here no liferent to be protected. The only interest to be protected by the creation of a trust was that of the persons to whom the fee was given. Not that a liferent would prevent vesting a morte testatoris, but it is a consideration to be taken account of in deciding questions of vesting. The trust here had nothing to protect but the interests directly conferred on the children. As regards the sum of £4000 dealt with in the third trust purpose, I think that it vested a morte testatoris. The legal presumption is in favour of vesting at that date. Moreover, here it is provided that during the whole period during which the £4000 is to be retained by the trustees, the whole income is to be paid to the children. Those who are to receive the revenue of a fund may generally be taken, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, to be the persons entitled to the capital from which the revenue arises. As regards the fourth purpose, I concur in what Lord Young has said as to the meaning, effect, and purpose of that clause, and have little, if anything, to add. Payment and division may be postponed without postponing vesting, and we are entitled to assume that it was so here. But that no postponement of vesting was intended may fairly be gathered from the terms of the fifth purpose, and with it we are now more immediately concerned. We find there a provision that the trustees are to retain and manage Margaret's share, and to invest it in their names for her behoof until her marriage, or attaining the age of thirty-two years, and meantime to apply the whole income for her maintenance and education. As she was to get the whole income, and no one else had anything to do with it, this indicates that she was then the proprietor of what was yielding the income. If she married before she was thirty-two—and she might very well marry long before that—what was to be done with the capital? The trustees are to settle it by contract of marriage or otherwise on herself and the heirs of her body, whom failing, her own nearest heirs and assignees, but expressly secluding the jus mariti of any husband she might marry. Did the truster mean that his trustees were by marriage-contract to settle upon his daughter and her heirs, and to protect from her husband, a mere expectancy? That is the view of the respondents, but I cannot think it was what the truster meant. His idea rather seems to be that his trustees were, on his daughter's marriage, to deal with Margaret's share (then in their hands) as her property. Whenever she married, however soon, the share was to be handed over for her behoof, under settlement, as being her estate. It is so described,—“the whole of her means and estate then remaining in their hands.” I cannot suppose that the testator meant by such language to describe a mere expectancy. The last trust purpose, on which the Lord Ordinary principally founds, provides,—“In the event of any of my said children dying leaving lawful issue, the provisions hereby made in their favour shall fall to such issue respectively in such shares as their parents may have appointed by any writing under their hands, which failing, equally among them; and in like manner, should any of my said children die without being married or leaving lawful issue, then the provisions hereby made in their favour shall fall to and be divisible amongst my other surviving children, including the issue of any one who may have died, such issue always coming in their parents' room.” That I take to be a declaration, that if any of the truster's children predeceased him, the legacy or provision in favour of that child should not lapse but descend to issue of the predeceaser, and failing such issue, then to the surviving children of the truster. On the whole matter, I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

¹ 4 Macq. 314.

No. 20.
Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

LORD MONCREIFF.—As a general rule of construction, in the absence of a fixed period of vesting, a survivorship clause in a family settlement, when payment is postponed, is held to relate to the period of payment or distribution. Such a clause is usually not required if it is intended that the bequest shall vest a morte testatoris.

But this presumption may be rebutted by evidence of contrary intention.

The property in question in the present case is part of the residue of David Neill's estate, the title to the subjects having been taken by him to his daughters in liferent, and himself, his heirs and assignees, in fee. Now, the directions as to the disposal of the residue of his estate in his settlement are—(His Lordship read the fourth purpose). In connection with this, we must consider the following provisions of the trust—(His Lordship read the clause “Lastly”).

The question we have to decide is whether in the clause last quoted after the word “dying” there are to be read in the words “before me,” or the words “before receiving payment.”

The question is a somewhat narrow one, on account of the presumption which I have mentioned. On the one hand there is the survivorship clause coupled with the fact that partly from express directions, and partly from the way in which the testator's funds were invested, realisation, division, and payment of the whole of the estate could not, in all probability, take place for some time after the testator's death.

But on the other hand, the settlement contains many indications that it was not the testator's intention to postpone vesting. It is to be observed that in the clause “lastly,” which I have quoted, the words “before receiving payment” do not occur, as was the case in Howat's Trustees v. Howat.¹ I would also observe that in the fourth purpose the language used may quite well be read as simply meaning that the trustees are to have a reasonable time for realising and making payment of the children's shares. We are therefore not hampered by considerations which influenced the Court in *Howat's Trustees*¹ and similar cases.

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Wood v.
Neill's
Trustees.

We proceed now to the evidence of intention. As regards the third purpose, I think it sufficiently appears from the terms of that clause, that although payment of the proportions of the sum of £4000 is postponed until the youngest daughter should reach the age of twenty-one years, it was not the truster's intention that vesting should be postponed. He makes the shares payable to the children or their heirs and assignees; he appoints the interest of the shares to be paid to the children, and speaks of the shares as being their shares, "his or her legacy and shares."

Now, if this provision vested a morte, it is improbable that there should be two periods of vesting, in the absence of exceptional reasons.

But further, the whole of the fifth purpose is in favour of immediate vesting. That purpose relates to the whole provisions "above mentioned in favour of my daughter Margaret." Now, these provisions were (1) her share of the £4000 under the third purpose; and (2) her share of residue, including her share of the property in the present case. Without examining the fifth purpose in detail, I may say that the whole of the language used is indicative of immediate vesting. The provisions are spoken of as Margaret's capital, and power is given to the trustees to make advances from this capital for certain purposes. Towards the close of the purpose it is provided that in the event of her reaching the age of thirty-two without being married, the trustees are to denude of her share in the way there described. The trustees are directed "to lay out a sum not exceeding one-half of her free capital in purchasing an annuity on her own life, and then to pay over to her the balance, or the whole of her funds then in their hands as the case may be."

One or two other points may be mentioned. If, as regards the property in question, vesting was postponed until the termination of the liferents, no right to the fee or capital could possibly vest in Margaret.

Lastly, the provisions are declared to be in full of legitim, which is an element in favour of immediate vesting in determining such questions.

On the whole matter I think the pursuer is entitled to declarator and decree in terms of one or other of the alternative branches of the summons.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for parties in the reclaiming note for the pursuer against Lord Kyllachy's interlocutor dated 4th July 1896, recall said interlocutor: Find and declare in terms of the alternative * conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

MELVILLE & LINDSAY, W.S.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 21.

JOHN DAVIS MILLER AND OTHERS (Miller's Trustees), First Parties.—W. Campbell—Hunter.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Miller's
Trustees v.
Findlay.

JAMES FINDLAY AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Shaw—J. Thomson.

Succession—Liferent and Fee—Power—Conveyance to liferentrix with power of disposal "during her life."—Certain heritable property was conveyed to M. for her liferent use only, and to her children in fee, with the declaration that "it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said M. by herself alone, during her life, to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose, onerously or gratuitously, of the said subjects as she may think proper." No. 21.

* The subjects in question were sold on 17th January 1896.

Held that the power did not entitle her to dispose of the subjects by a novis causa deed. Nov. 6, 1896.
Miller's
Trustees v.
Findlay.

In July 1851 Henry M'Dougall, portioner in Calton of Glasgow, executed a disposition of certain heritable subjects bearing to be granted in consideration of a price paid by Alexander Smith. The disposition further bore,—“And whereas the said Alexander Smith has requested me to grant these presents in the terms of the dispositive clause after mentioned: Therefore . . . I . . . have sold and disposed, as I do hereby . . . with consent of the said Alexander Smith, in token of his acquiescence in the destination herein contained . . . dispose . . . to and in favour of the said Alexander Smith in liferent, for his liferent use only, and after his death to and in favour of the said Mrs Isabella Parlan or Miller in liferent, for her liferent use only, and to Jean Smith Miller, John Davis Miller, and Robert Lockhart Miller, her children, equally among them, and failing any of them without lawful issue, then to the survivors or survivor of them, and their, his, or her heirs heritably and irredeemably in fee, All and Whole that piece of ground, &c., and I, . . . with consent foresaid, oblige myself to infest the said Alexander Smith in liferent, and after his death the said Mrs Isabella Parlan or Miller, also in liferent as aforesaid, for their liferent uses allenarly, and the said Jean S. say Jean Smith Miller, John Davis Miller, and Robert Lockhart Miller, her children, and their foresaids in fee . . . and I resign the said lands and . . . Moreover I, . . . with consent foresaid, desire any notary-public to whom these presents may be presented to give to the said Alexander Smith sasine in liferent, and after his death to the said Isabella Parlan or Miller also sasine in liferent, for their liferent uses allenarly as aforesaid, and to the saids Jean Smith Miller, John Davis Miller, and Robert Lockhart Miller, her children, and their foresaids, sasine in fee, of the lands and others above disposed under the reservation before referred to: But declaring, however, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said Alexander Smith by himself alone during his life, notwithstanding of the above destination, to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose of the said subjects either onerously or gratuitously as he may think proper; and also declaring that, in the event of the said Alexander Smith not exercising the above faculty, it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said Isabella Parlan or Miller by herself alone in like manner during her life to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose, onerously or gratuitously, of the said subjects as she may think proper.”

The said Alexander Smith died intestate, and without having exercised the power of disposal conferred upon him by the disposition. He was survived by Mrs Miller.

Mrs Miller died on the 1st day of June 1896, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement executed by her of date 1st April 1895, whereby she conveyed to John Davis Miller and others, as trustees, her whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to her at her death or of which she might then have the power of disposal in any manner of way. This trust-disposition and settlement did not specially mention the heritable subjects conveyed by the disposition of 1851.

A question arose as to whether Mrs Miller by her settlement

No. 21. validly exercised the power of disposal conferred upon her by the terms of the disposition of M'Dougall; and this special case was brought by (1) Mrs Miller's trustees; and (2) John Davis Miller and Robert Lockhart Miller, her surviving children, and James Findlay, the eldest son of her deceased daughter, Jean Smith Miller.

Nov. 6, 1896.
Miller's
Trustees v.
Findlay.

The questions of law were:—"1. Whether the said Mrs Isabella Parlane or Miller by her said trust-disposition and settlement validly exercised the power of disposal conferred upon her by the said disposition, and thereby conveyed the said heritable subjects to her testamentary trustees? Or 2. Whether said heritable subjects now belong to the second parties in virtue of the destination thereof contained in said disposition?"

Argued for the first parties;—Mrs Miller was fiae under M'Dougall's deed, and her deed disposed of the property. Alexander Smith was clearly intended to have power to dispose of the subjects during his lifetime and by mortis causa deed, and Mrs Miller was in the same position under the disposition. A liferent with reserved power to dispose at pleasure amounted to a fee.¹ (2) Even if the testatrix was only a liferentrix her deed was valid. A power of disposal was not inconsistent with the liferent in her and the fee in another.² An inter vivos deed was not essential; a mortis causa deed was a valid exercise.³ At the last moment of her life Mrs Miller might have gifted the entire estate. If so, it was too extreme a view that she could not execute a deed which would regulate the succession to it the moment after her death. [LORD MONCREIFF.—Are the words "during her life" mere surplusage, or do they mean that any deed of disposal is to be executed and take effect during her life? Are these not the only two possible views? Could the construction be supported—"disposal by deed to be executed during her life, but to take effect after her death"? Might not Smith have been willing that Mrs Miller should have power to gratify any desire as to the ownership of the property during her life, and yet not have wished that she should control the destination after her death?] Too much weight should not be placed on the words "during her life." They were not used to limit Mrs Miller's power; they applied to the date of the dispositive act.⁴ She must execute the power during her life. She could not hand it on to another. The law of deathbed still existed in 1851, and the words might be used to prevent objection on that ground.⁵

Argued for the second parties;—The case of *Bailie*⁶ was distinguishable; (1) Mrs Miller was not liferentrix by reservation; (2) her power of disposal was limited. She must execute it during her life. It was not enough to execute the deed. The power must be

¹ Bailie v. Clark, Feb. 23, 1809, F. C.; M'Laren on Wills, 3d ed. ii. 1088 and 2013.

² Stair, ii. 11, 7, iii. 2, 9; Bell's Prin. sec. 929.

³ Creditors of Mouswell and his Children, Jan. 6, 1677, M. 4102, Dec. 16, 1679, M. 4104; Anderson v. Young & Trotter, Dec. 24, 1784, M. 4128; Pringle v. Pringle, July 18, 1890, 17 R. 1229, per Lord Rutherford Clark, 1238; Sugden on Powers, 8th ed. 216, 217; Edwards v. Edwards, 1818, 3 Maddox, 197, later 1821, Jacob's Chancery Reports, 335.

⁴ Bucknell v. Blenkhorn, 1845, 5 Hare, 131.

⁵ Morris v. Tennant, June 7, 1853, 25 Scot. Jur. 432, aff. H. L. July 6, 1855, 27 Scot. Jur. 546.

⁶ Bailie v. Clark, Feb. 23, 1809, F. C.

fulfilled during her life.¹ She was limited to inter vivos deeds. A No. 21.
mortis causa deed was ultra vires.²

At advising,—

Nov. 6, 1896.
 Miller's
 Trustees v.
 Findlay.

LORD YOUNG.—The only question in this case is whether under the declaration in the disposition that it should be in the power of Mrs Miller during her life to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose, onerously or gratuitously, of the subjects as she might think proper, she had a right to deal with those subjects in her testamentary trust-disposition. I am of opinion that the power given to Mrs Miller (assuming that any power or faculty was legally given to her at all) was only given to her to be executed and acted upon during her life. It is clear enough that if she had during her life sold, burdened, or otherwise disposed of the subjects, they could not have been affected by her trust-settlement. She made a will with the apparent intention to substitute her will for the destination in the disposition of Alexander Smith. This I am of opinion she could not do. I propose, therefore, that we should answer the first question of law in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

I desire to avoid expressing any opinion except so far as is necessary for the decision of the case. But if it was Mr Smith's intention that he should have power given him in the deed to dispose of the subjects during his lifetime, and also by mortis causa deed, and that failing his exercising it Mrs Miller should have the same, that could have been very simply carried out by conveying the subjects to Mr Smith, whom failing to Mrs Miller, whom failing to the three children. This not having been done, I assume that he had no such intention, and that his intention was that Mrs Miller should only have power of disposing of the subjects by deeds operating during her life.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. My view is that Mrs Miller had a lifereit with a limited power of disposal, and that she never exercised this power.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The questions put to us in this special case depend upon whether the power of disposal conferred upon Mrs Miller was qualified or absolute. If it was absolute—if the words “during her life” are mere surplusage—she has effectually disposed of the subjects by her will. If on the other hand the true meaning of the words “during her life” is that she is only empowered to dispose of them by conveyance inter vivos, I do not think that there is room for contending that she was at any time fear of the subjects. The power conferred upon her was a power by constitution, not by reservation, and falls to be construed less liberally than a reserved power. It may be that during Mrs Miller's lifetime her creditors could have insisted on her exercising the power in their favour; but there being no question with creditors, I apprehend that the donee of the power could only exercise it according to its terms.—Bell's Prin. sec. 925.

As to the construction of the power, although the question is not free from difficulty, I am of opinion that the power conferred is limited to the ¹ Sugden on Powers, 8th ed. 209, 210.

² Ramsay v. Cowan, July 11, 1833, 11 S. 967, 5 Scot. Jur. 561; Sprot v. Pennycook, June 12, 1855, 17 D. 840, 27 Scot. Jur. 432.

No. 21.
 Nov. 6, 1896.
 Miller's
 Trustees v.
 Findlay.

disposing of the subjects by inter vivos conveyance. I think that it was intended that if Mrs Miller desired or required to alienate or burden the subjects, either in order to relieve her own necessities or to please herself during her lifetime, she should be at liberty to do so, but that if she did not divest herself during her lifetime the subjects should go according to the destination named in the disposition. I therefore think that it was not open to her to dispose of the subjects by mortis causa deed, and as she did not validly exercise the power, the subjects fall to the second parties in virtue of the destination.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

J. & J. GALLETTY, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER WYLIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 22.
 Nov. 7, 1896.
 Russell v.
 Macknight.

MRS JESSIE RUSSELL, Pursuer.—Comrie Thomson—A. M. Anderson.
 A. E. MACKNIGHT, Defender.—Dewar—Grainger Stewart.

Reparation—Landlord and Tenant—Defect in house accepted without complaint by tenant.—A tenant took a house entering from a common stair fenced by two walls, but having no hand-rail. He did not complain to the landlord of the want of a rail either when he took the house or subsequently. The tenant having fallen upon the stair and received injuries which resulted in his death, his widow raised an action of damages against the landlord, on the ground that the accident was due to his fault in not having provided a hand-rail. Held that, as the tenant had taken the house without objection, and had never afterwards complained to the landlord, there was no fault on the landlord's part in a question with the pursuer.

1ST DIVISION. ON 6th February 1896 Mrs Jessie Morison or Russell raised an action against Mr A. E. Macknight, Edinburgh, for payment of £1000 as damages for the death of her husband, John Russell, who had been tenant of a house in South Queensferry, belonging to the defender.

The pursuer averred that her husband had fallen on the common stair leading to his house, and had sustained injuries which resulted in his death, and that the accident had been caused by the defender's fault in not having the stair, which had a wall on each side, fitted with a hand-rail.

There was also an averment that the landlord was in fault in not having the stair lighted, and in not having a defect, caused by a knot in the wood, at the edge of the landing repaired.

The pursuer obtained an issue whether "the husband of the pursuer received injuries from which he died through the fault of the defender, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer," and the cause was tried before Lord McLaren and a jury on 20th July.

It was proved that the stair upon which the accident happened was a straight stair between two walls, and consisted of nineteen stone steps, and that there was no hand-rail on either side. There was a conflict of evidence on the part of skilled witnesses as to whether a hand-rail was necessary.

It was proved that the stair had been in the same condition when the house was taken by the pursuer for her husband as it was at the time of the accident, and that no complaint had been made to the factor of the want of a hand-rail.

It is not necessary to refer to the other allegations, as the pursuer's counsel admitted that the landlord was not responsible for the lighting of the stair, and as it was proved that the accident happened below the place where the defect in the landing was said to exist. No. 22.
Nov. 7, 1896.
Russell v.
Macknight.

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £120.

The defender asked and obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

Argued for the pursuer;—The tenant was entitled to expect a safe house to live in. There was evidence that the stair was not safe without a hand-rail, and the jury had taken that view. In the absence of a bill of exceptions by the defender, the verdict must stand. If this defect in the stair was patent to both landlord and tenant, then it was unnecessary for the latter to complain. The landlord ought proprio motu to have remedied it.

Argued for the defender;—No liability could attach to him, as the pursuer had accepted the defect in the stair when he entered into possession, and he had never complained to the defender. A tenant must give his landlord notice of a defect in his house, and if the landlord failed within reasonable time to remedy it, the tenant must leave the house or remain at his own risk.¹ The defender had stated this objection on record, and Lord M'Laren had directed the jury that failure on the part of the pursuer to complain must negative liability on the defender's part. The verdict must be set aside.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Now that this case has been explained to us, it really comes to a short point.

The facts fail the pursuer in his attack on the staircase, so far as the knot is concerned, because the pursuer's evidence shewed that the knot in the stair had not been reached by the deceased when he fell. The alleged deficiency of light is out of the case in consequence of Mr Thomson's admission, and therefore the only point remaining is the absence of a railing on the stair.

I could understand that there might have been a case for the tenant if, from complaint or remonstrances with the landlord against the continuance of the stair without a railing, it might have been matter of inference that the house was not accepted in its existing condition, but, as the facts came out, it appeared that no complaint had ever been made on this head. The house was taken by the deceased himself without any railing on the stair, and there is no evidence that it was any worse at the date of the accident than when he entered into the contract.

Therefore, when no evidence was offered on this head, I think that when the evidence was closed the case was one of which the jury could only dispose in one way.

Lord M'Laren, who tried the case, stated the point to the jury, and pointed out to them the condition of the evidence. It may be that his Lordship was entitled to go further and to give them a pointed direction on this head, but he placed the evidence before them, and it admitted of only one verdict—for the defender.

We are therefore in a position to judge that this verdict was contrary to the evidence.

¹ Webster v. Brown, May 12, 1892, 19 R. 765.

No. 22.

Nov. 7, 1896.
Russell v.
Macknight.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. This is not a case of an accident happening to a third person—an ordinary member of the public—but to the tenant of a house, and it is necessary to consider the evidence, keeping that in view.

Now, with regard to the knot, the evidence is to the effect that the deceased never reached within five or six steps of it, and accordingly if the jury took it into consideration, their verdict is clearly contrary to the evidence.

As regards the want of a hand-rail, as I understand, there is no universal obligation upon a landlord to put up such a rail, and accordingly his liability must depend upon the circumstances of the case. The deceased man became tenant of the house, and must have been satisfied at that time with the condition of the stair. There has been no alteration in it from that time, and accordingly I agree that it was his duty to complain to the landlord, and insist upon the rail being put in. There is no evidence that he did so complain, and I am therefore of opinion that the verdict of the jury, finding the defender liable, was contrary to the weight of the evidence.

LORD M'LAREN.—If the only point in this case had been the want of a hand-rail on the staircase, then, supposing the demand had been made at the end of the pursuer's case, I might have directed a verdict for the defender on the ground that there was no evidence of fault to go to the jury. The contract between the defender and the deceased was a contract to hire a house with no rail on the staircase. There was no illegality in making such a contract, and if a tenant hires a defective house he is in the same position as a workman, in the analogous contract of the hiring of labour, who accepts a known danger.

There were, however, other elements which did not amount to much. The lighting was plainly enough not the landlord's fault, because the lamp must be kept lighted by the tenant. There was, however, the point about the stair being out of repair, and no doubt it was the landlord's duty to repair it if he was made aware of a defect in it.

There was, therefore, a difficulty in withholding the case from the jury. But assuming that I gave the jury the proper direction—and I have no very distinct recollection as to what passed—I think that the jury ought to have found for the defender, because the case as to the condition of the stair failed, and the want of a hand-rail was according to the contract of the parties. I therefore agree that the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT made the rule absolute, and granted a new trial.

D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—HUGH MARTIN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 23. ANDREW ROBERTSON, Complainer (Reclaiming).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—M'Lennan.

Nov. 10, 1896. JAMES WALKER (Alexander Buchanan Hall's Trustee), Respondent.—Robertson v. Hall's Trustees. Lees—Cullen.

Sale—Right in Security—Sale or Security—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 61, subsec. 4.—In August 1894 Hall, who had a few days before purchased an engineer's business and plant for £2100, to be paid by instalments, obtained £400 to meet the first instalment from Robertson, a money-lender, Robertson and Hall at the same time executing the following deeds :—(a) A disposition by which Hall in consideration of the sum of £400 sold the plant, &c., as per inventory, with power to Robertson “to take possession thereof at any time he may think proper,” and also with power to him to sell the plant at such prices as he could procure, Hall admitting that the subjects were the property of Robertson, and “in my possession only on loan”; and (b) a back-letter by Robertson to Hall, setting forth that Robertson undertook to resell the subjects to Hall on being paid the price of £400, and any interest in the way of hire due as after mentioned; that so long as Hall delayed repurchasing he should pay Robertson, “by way of hire therefor,” interest on the £400 or such part thereof as remained unpaid, at the rate of 20 per cent per annum; that Hall should pay Robertson £60 every six months until the whole £400 should be repaid; that failure to make said payments should entitle Robertson to enforce the disposition, all prior payments being forfeited; and lastly, that any other sums advanced by Robertson to Hall should be repaid by Hall within a month, otherwise Robertson was to be entitled to enforce the disposition and treat all prior payments as forfeited.

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustee.

Hall's estates were sequestrated on 31st November 1895. He had not made any payments to Robertson in terms of the back-letter, but Robertson had not entered into possession of the subjects.

In a competition between Hall's trustee and Robertson, who maintained that the plant, &c. had been sold to him by Hall, held (diss. Lord Young, aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the terms of the deeds and the whole circumstances shewed that the parties intended the transaction to operate as a security, and not as a sale, and therefore that the claim of Robertson fell to be repelled.

Observations per Lord Moncreiff on the effect of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 61, subsec. 4, on the authority of M'Bain v. Wallace, Jan. 7, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

By offer and acceptance, dated respectively 30th May and 4th June 1894, it was agreed between Alexander Buchanan Hall, engineer, Edinburgh, and James Carrick & Sons, engineers and crane-makers, Dalry Iron Works, Edinburgh, that Hall should purchase the business carried on by Carrick & Sons at the Dalry Iron Works, with the goodwill of the business, and fixed and other plant in the premises, at a price to be ascertained by valuation, and to be paid £300 on 18th June and the rest by equal instalments, for which bills were to be granted; and it was also agreed that Hall should get a lease of the premises, which belonged to Carrick & Sons, for ten years at a rent of £100 a year.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

As Hall had not £300 available, he entered into negotiations with Andrew Robertson, money-lender in Edinburgh, who agreed to pay him £400 on the footing of the transaction after mentioned. On 21st August Hall received £400 from Robertson—that is to say he actually received only £360—the difference being retained by Robertson (according to his evidence in the action subsequently raised) as the first half year's hire in terms of the back-letter to be quoted immediately. Out of the £360 so received, Hall paid £300 to Carrick & Sons, and afterwards took possession of the business.

The following deeds were executed as embodying the transaction between Hall and Robertson :—

On 29th August 1894 Hall executed a disposition in favour of Robertson, in these terms :—

“I, Alexander Buchanan Hall . . . in consideration of the

No. 23. sum of £400 sterling, paid to me by Andrew Robertson . . . the receipt of which I hereby acknowledge, do hereby sell, assign, convey, dispose, and make over to and in favour of the said Andrew Robertson, his executors or assignees whomsoever, All and Whole the fixed plant and articles enumerated in the inventory and valuation thereof, and situated in Dalry Engine Works, Edinburgh, which, with the receipt thereto annexed for the price of the same, paid by me to Messrs James Carrick & Sons, from whom I have purchased the same, is here referred to, and held as repeated brevitatis causa, and is herewith delivered up and signed by me as relative hereto; surrogating and substituting the said Andrew Robertson and his foresaids in my full right and place in said fixed plant and whole articles, with power to him or his foresaids to take possession thereof at any time he or they may think proper, and that without any warrant or authority other than these presents: Also with power to sell, use, and dispose of said fixed plant and whole articles, in such portions, and at such prices as he can procure, and give delivery thereof to the purchaser or purchasers, to receive and discharge the price or prices, with the application whereof the purchasers shall have no concern: And I bind myself during the period I may be permitted to retain possession of said fixed plant and articles, to take proper care thereof in every respect, and, on the said Andrew Robertson or his foresaids demanding delivery, I bind myself to give him delivery, otherwise he shall be entitled to take delivery as above stated: And so long as said fixed plant and articles remain in my possession, I hereby recognise and admit that they are the property of the said Andrew Robertson, and that they are in my possession only on loan: In witness whereof," &c.

The value of the plant, &c., set forth in the inventory annexed was £2112, 14s. 8d.

On 1st September 1894 Robertson sent the following back-letter to Hall:—

"Dear Sir,—With reference to the disposition granted by you to me, on the 29th ult., of the fixed plant and articles situated in Dalry Engine Works, Edinburgh, as per inventory and valuation thereof, referred to in, and subscribed as relative to, said disposition, for the sum of £400 sterling, it is covenanted and agreed on between us as follows:—

"1st. That I resell you said plant and articles at the price of £400, and I undertake to do so on being paid that sum, and any interest in the way of hire due, at the rate after mentioned.

"2nd. That till repaid said sum and interest as hire, you are to retain possession of said plant and articles, but that only on loan.

"3rd. That, so long as you delay re-purchasing said plant and articles, you are to pay me, by way of hire therefor, interest on said sum, or whatever part thereof may be unpaid, at the rate of £20 per centum per annum.

"4th. That you pay me £60 every six months, commencing the first payment on 29th February 1895, and continuing the payments till said £400 be fully paid.

"5th. That you shall pay me, every six months, the hire above stipulated for, calculated on whatever part of the £400 may remain unpaid.

"6th. Failure to make said payments shall entitle me to enforce said disposition, and should I have to do so, all payments made shall be forfeited as if they had not been made.

"7th. Any other sums I may advance you are to be repaid within a month after the advance, otherwise the condition in article 6th hereof shall be enforceable by me.—I am," &c. No. 23.

Hall never made any payments to Robertson in terms of the back-letter, but Robertson did not enter into the subjects, although he threatened to do so. Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

On 31st November 1895 Hall's estates were sequestrated, and on 13th December James Walker, C.A., was appointed trustee.

On 23d December Robertson presented a note of suspension and interdict to have Walker interdicted from working, selling, or removing the plant, &c. within the Dalry Engine Works.

The complainer stated,—(Stat. 2) "On 21st August 1894, the said Alexander Buchanan Hall sold to the complainer, in consideration of the price of £400, then paid by the complainer to him, the whole fixed plant and articles then situated within the said Dalry Iron Works, which are particularly enumerated in the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict. In implement of an obligation undertaken by him prior to said date the said Alexander Buchanan Hall executed and delivered to the complainer, on 29th August 1894, a disposition and conveyance in the complainer's favour of the said fixed plant and articles, . . ." (Stat. 3) "After purchasing the said fixed plant and articles as above mentioned, the complainer agreed with Hall, to give him the use of these upon a hiring agreement, with the option of purchasing them on refunding the purchase price, and any other sums which he might be due to the complainer. The terms of the said agreement are embodied in a letter adopted as holograph, delivered by the complainer to Hall. . . . The said agreement constituted the sole title upon which the said Alexander Buchanan Hall has had possession of the said fixed plant and articles, or any of them, since the complainer's purchase. The complainer has truly had possession of the said plant and articles since 21st August 1894."

The respondent answered,—(Ans. 2) " . . . Denied that there was any bona fide sale to the complainer of the machinery and other articles in said inventory, the value of which is stated in the inventory at £2112, 14s. 8d. Explained and averred that the sum of £400 mentioned was a loan. Only £360 was, in point of fact, paid over to the bankrupt, the remaining £40 being retained by the complainer in payment of six months' interest in advance. . . . Explained and averred that said back-letter does not represent the true relation between the complainer and the bankrupt in regard to the possession had by the bankrupt of the articles purported to be lent to him."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The plant and other articles enumerated in the prayer of the note, being the property of the complainer, and the respondent having unwarrantably interfered therewith, and having threatened to dispose thereof, interdict should be granted as craved.

The respondent pleaded;—(5) The transaction between the complainer and the bankrupt not having been a bona fide sale, but a device to create a security over moveables which remained the property and in the possession of the bankrupt, is ineffectual to create any right in the complainer in competition with the respondent. (6) In respect the complainer never obtained delivery or possession of the machinery and other articles in question, the property thereof remained in the bankrupt, and is now vested in the respondent as trustee on his sequestrated estate.

A proof was allowed. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.

No. 23. On 14th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) That the fixtures and other plant, the sale of which the complainer seeks to interdict, belonged to the bankrupt at the date of sequestration, and passed to the respondent, as trustee on the sequestered estate: (2) That the complainer's title thereto was a title in security only: (3) That it was not completed by possession, actual or constructive, or by intimation, and is insufficient to exclude the title of the respondent as trustee foresaid: Therefore refuses the prayer of the note, and decerns: Finds the respondent entitled to expenses," &c.*

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

* "OPINION.—This action, involving questions of law which I have found to be of very great difficulty, regards the effect of a transaction consisting of the advance of money by Robertson, the complainer, to Hall, now represented by the respondent, his trustee in bankruptcy, and the disposition by Hall to Robertson of fixed and other plant on the premises in which Hall at the date of his bankruptcy carried on the business of an engineer and crane-maker, under the name of James Carrick & Son, accompanied by a back-letter by Robertson. It is a case about a security over moveables retenta possessione. I speak throughout for convenience of Hall as the bankrupt, it not being material that the business was carried on in the name of Carrick & Son.

"The question is raised in the form of a note by Robertson, craving interdict against the sale by Hall's trustee of the fixed and other plant on the premises. The crave in the petition has been limited by a minute, and I consider that it has been ascertained that all the articles against the sale of which interdict is now asked can be identified as having been included in the disposition by Hall to Robertson.

"The opinion which I have ultimately formed is in favour of the trustee, although I cannot say that I entertain it with much confidence. Whatever difficulty there may be as to the law, there is little, if there be any, as to the facts, which are as follows:—

"Hall was desirous of acquiring the business of James Carrick & Son, carried on by them at Dalry Iron Works, of which they were proprietors; and, by offer dated 30th May 1894, addressed to them, and acceptance by them, dated 4th June 1894, it was agreed that Hall should purchase from Carrick & Son, at a price to be ascertained by valuers, and to be paid by instalments, the business carried on by Carrick & Son at Dalry Iron Works, with the goodwill of the business, and the fixed and other plant on the premises, and also that Carrick & Son should grant to Hall a lease of the premises for ten years at the rent of £100. The contract between them rested on this letter and acceptance.

"There seems some variance in the evidence about the date when Hall took possession, but he did take possession, and carried on business on the premises, continuing the name of James Carrick & Son until his bankruptcy on 15th November 1895.

"Hall had no money, and was unable to pay any part of the price. He required (apparently before he could get possession) to pay Carrick & Son £300, and accordingly he applied, through his agent, to several people, and ultimately to the complainer Robertson for a loan. Robertson, who carries on the business of a money-lender, made the necessary advance. Hall thereupon executed a disposition in favour of Robertson, which is dated 29th August 1894. That deed bears that Hall, in consideration of £400 paid to him by Robertson as the price of the subjects, sold and disposed to Robertson 'the fixed plant and articles enumerated in the inventory and valuation thereof, and situated in Dalry Engine Works.' In the inventory and valuation the articles are valued at £2112, 14s. 8½d., said to be 'based as a going concern.' The disposition is absolute in its terms, and confers power on Robertson to take possession at any time he might think proper,

Low Young
[Handwritten notes and signatures in the left margin]

The complainer reclaimed.¹

At advising,—

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustee.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complainer is a money-lender in Edinburgh, and entered into a transaction with one Alexander Buchanan Hall in the following circumstances. Hall was desirous to purchase a crane-making business, with the machinery, plant, and stock of materials belonging to Messrs Carrick & Son, crane-makers in Edinburgh. He had no capital, and Messrs Carrick were willing to take a sum of a few hundred pounds down, and Hall's acceptances for the remainder, the price of the whole being £2100. Hall agreed with Messrs Carrick to purchase at that price, and applied to his agent Mr Broatch to endeavour to raise the cash required, and Mr Broatch applied to Mr Robertson, who was also a client of his. Mr Broatch advised that the transaction must be by a sale by Hall to Robertson of the whole subjects, the price being the amount of the cash which he was to receive from Robertson for payment of the money instalment to Messrs

'and that without any warrant or authority other than these presents,' and also power to sell. Further, Hall admits by the deed that, 'so long as said fixed plant and articles remain in my possession, they are the property of the said Andrew Robertson, and that they are in my possession only on loan.'

"Nevertheless, the difference between the price, £400, and the value in the valuation embodied by reference in the disposition—£2112, 14s. 8½d.—requires special attention. The deed really says that £400 is the price paid and accepted for articles worth more than £2000. Further, the disposition discloses that delivery was not contemplated, and also that it was contemplated that the subjects of the sale were to be used by the seller, and that some of them were, as shewn by the inventory, of the nature of fungibles necessarily exhausted by use.

"The complainer Robertson granted a back-letter dated 1st September 1894, which is printed in the record. By this back-letter he agrees to resell the articles to Hall for £400, with interest,—and it is to be noted that the words 'hire' and 'interest' are used as synonymous,—that no term is expressed for the endurance of the contract of hiring,—that the interest or hire is not to be proportionate to the subjects hired, but is to be twenty per cent on the £400, or on the portion of it unpaid. There is an obligation in article 4 to pay £60 every six months until the sum of £400 was fully repaid, which seems susceptible of direct enforcement, but there is no other obligation to pay the £400. Then there is the curious but significant clause, viz, clause 7, to the effect that any other sums advanced by Robertson should be repaid within a month, otherwise he should be entitled to enforce the disposition, which certainly suggests that £400 was not the true price.

"It is not pretended that Robertson ever took actual physical possession of the articles. These remained in the possession of Hall, and were used by him in his business.

"Now, in cases of this kind, and they have been not infrequent, the ¹ Authorities cited.—Sym v. Grant, June 3, 1862, 24 D. 1033; M'Bain v. Wallace, Jan. 7, 1881, 8 R. 360, aff. July 27, 1888, 8 R. (H. L.) 106; Robertson v. M'Intyre, March 17, 1882, 9 R. 772; Allan & Co.'s Trustee v. Gunn & Co., June 20, 1883, 10 R. 997; Darling v. Wilson's Trustee, Dec. 16, 1887, 15 R. 180; Liquidator of West Lothian Oil Co. v. Mair, Nov. 18, 1892, 20 R. 64; Liddell's Trustees v. Warr & Co., July 18, 1893, 20 R. 989; Pattison's Trustees v. Liston, June 7, 1892, 20 R. 806.

No. 23. Carrick, and that Robertson was to grant a back-letter undertaking to hire the subjects of the sale to Mr Hall, and to reconvey on getting repayment of the price. This transaction was accordingly carried through. Hall granted a disposition, and Robertson granted a back-letter, the disposition bearing that Hall recognised and admitted that the machinery, plant, &c., were the property of Robertson and that "they are in my possession only on loan," and Robertson in the back-letter stating that Hall was to retain possession, but only on loan, and undertook to resell at the same sum on receiving that sum and "any interest in the way of hire due," at the rate of £20 per cent per annum. There was a stipulation in the back-letter that £60 was to be paid every six months, until the whole sum was paid up, and the hire to be paid proportionally on the balance, failure in making the payments to entitle Robertson to "enforce the disposition" and forfeit all previous instalments. And lastly, the back-letter declared that "any other sums I may advance you are to be repaid within a month after the advance, principal question which has hitherto arisen has been whether the deed in favour of the lender was a true deed of sale, effectual without delivery, in respect of the provision of the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, or only a disposition in security, ineffectual without delivery—and to that question a large part of the discussion in this case was directed—although, since the repeal of the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, that question has lost much of its importance. But in all, or almost all of the cases of this class, there has been inquiry by parole about the true character of the transaction, as to which the deeds have never been held to be conclusive, and accordingly a proof has been led in this case which leaves very little room for doubt about the facts. The transactions between Hall and Carrick & Son and Hall and Robertson may be regarded as really simultaneous, although some time, it is true, elapsed between the dates of the contract with Carrick & Son and of the disposition to Robertson. They were carried out at the same time. There is no doubt that Hall desired to acquire and also to retain the property of the articles. He wished to carry on a business with them and to use them, and in some cases use them up in his business. It is at least difficult to hold that he contemplated the acquisition of them for his business and the sale of them by simultaneous transactions. His need of a loan initiated the whole affair. Robertson, again, who advanced the money, desired to obtain security for repayment with interest, which, although high, may not have been exorbitant, or otherwise than commensurate with the risk he ran. It was a transaction in the ordinary course of his business as a money-lender. He depones, frankly and honestly, that if he should sell the articles and obtain more than £400 with the stipulated interest he would pay the balance to the trustee. He did not admit that he was under any obligation to do this, but I must believe that there was an understanding between the parties to that effect, and I cannot hold that Robertson meant that he would make this payment out of pure charity or goodwill for Hall. I cannot doubt that the motive and object of the disposition and back-letter were that repayment of the advance should be sufficiently secured to Robertson, while at the same time Hall should retain the possession and use of the articles. They were advised by their common agent to carry out the transaction in that fashion. In short, these two deeds constituted a device by which it was thought that Robertson might obtain a security which he could not obtain by a bond with an assignation of the plant without delivery.

"When I use the word 'device' I do not use it in any invidious sense. I do not suggest that the transaction was tainted by any fraud, dishonesty, otherwise the condition " as to enforcing the disposition and the forfeiture No. 23.

was to come into operation.

Following on this arrangement £400 was found by Mr Robertson and paid to Messrs Carrick. Hall got, and retained, possession of the whole subjects, the fixed machinery remaining in situ, and the materials being used up by him as necessary for the conduct of the business. There was no delivery either actual or by formality to Robertson, and no intimation of an assignation of any right to sever the fixed machinery. Subsequently Hall became bankrupt, and the trustee appointed entered into possession under section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act. Robertson now desires by suspension to restrain the trustee from dealing with the subjects of the transaction between Hall and him as falling under the bankruptcy.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

It is plain from the whole history of the case that what Hall required was a loan of money. He desired to become the owner of certain property or undue concealment. I see no reason to think that it was. The whole transaction seems to have been quite fair and above board. Parties endeavoured to get over a difficulty created by the law. What they intended and attempted to effect was that Robertson should be duly secured. There is nothing to be condemned in such an intention and attempt, and I confess that my inclination would be to sustain this transaction according to its true intent if the law would permit that result.

"There have been a considerable number of cases of this class, all of them of the nature of attempts to effect a security over moveables without delivery. In some of these cases the attempt has been successful—the legal writs devised have been held sufficient for that effect—among which I may quote as probably the most important cases:—M'Bain v. Wallace, 7th January 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 106; Robertson v. M'Intyre, 17th March 1882, 9 R. 772; Liquidators of West Lothian Oil Company v. Mair, 8th November 1892, 20 R. 64; and Liddell's Trustees v. Warr & Company, 18th July 1893, 20 R. 989. In other cases, which may no doubt be distinguished from them, although the distinction is narrow, the attempt has been unsuccessful, and of these The Heritable Securities Company v. Wingate, 1880, 7 R. 1094, and Puterson's Trustees v. Liston, 14th June 1893, 20 R. 806, are probably among the most notable recent examples. I am disposed to think that a conveyance of moveables has been sustained to the effect of constituting a security for an advance where the transaction has been in reality a pure sale, although the whole object of it has been to effect a security, and although there may be an understanding that the ownership shall revert to the borrower when that purpose has been served, and it seems to me that the rule of law that an assignation of moveables without delivery is totally ineffectual has not as yet been relaxed by decisions to any greater extent. That seems to have been the express ground of judgment in M'Bain and in Liddell. It appears to me that Lord Young in several opinions has gone further, and has been disposed to sustain a conveyance of moveables as a security wherever the form adopted has been an absolute disposition or a contract of sale, where the lender, as in one case he expresses it, has received a proprietary title. But I think there is as yet no decision going that length. Following the judgments, as I understand them, I think the question here is whether there was any true sale in this case or any true contract of hiring; and I, although with much hesitation, answer that question in the negative. It was argued that Liddell's Trustees was in point and ruled this case, and I admit the similarity of that case. At the same time the circumstances were different. Counsel for the respondent pressed, inter alia, two distinctions,—first, the great dis-

No. 23. that he might carry on a manufacturing business, and it was for the purpose of getting such a loan that he applied to Mr Broatch for assistance. But Nov. 10, 1896. Robertson v. Hall's Trustees. the question is whether by the form in which the transaction was put Robertson was placed in a better position than that of a lender of money who does not obtain delivery of the property constituting the security for the loan, and is now proprietor of the articles and in such a position in law in regard to them that he can prevent their being realised as part of the bankrupt's estate for the benefit of all the creditors.

In considering the question it is necessary to keep in view that the first clause of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act has been repealed by the Sale of Goods Act of 1893, and that accordingly a party who has by purchase a right to goods, but has not received delivery, actual or constructive, is no longer in a position to vindicate his right as against other creditors of the sellers, as he might have done previously, unless he can do so under the Act crepancy between the sum advanced and the value, a feature which did not exist in Liddell's case; and, secondly, the fact that some of the subjects said to be sold in this case were fungibles to be used in the borrower's business. I am especially impressed by the first of these distinctions, and think it hardly possible that an absolute sale for £400 of subjects valued above £2000—although no doubt not as at a break-up value—was really contemplated; and I think that the evidence of Robertson was almost tantamount to an admission to that effect. I keep in view that the mere circumstance that there was an understanding that any surplus on a sale should be paid to the borrower, although material, cannot be regarded as in itself conclusive, bearing in mind that that specialty, or something like it, occurred in M'Bain v. Wallace. I think the whole history of the transaction is also against the view that there was a real sale or a true contract of hiring, and that the provisions of the back-letter to which I have referred can hardly be reconciled with any definite contract of hiring. I think that the whole transaction of the parties was in truth a loan, with an ineffectual attempt to create a security over moveables without delivery.

"As I have indicated, I am not certain that it is of much importance whether the transaction be regarded as importing an absolute conveyance of moveables or only a disposition in security. It was of vital consequence in the cases referred to. But between their dates and the date of the transaction under consideration the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act has been repealed by sec. 60 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71; and at common law an absolute sale of moveables without delivery is just as ineffectual as a disposition of moveables in security. It is true that under sec. 17 of the Sale of Goods Act delivery is not essential to the passing of property in moveables under a sale in the sense of that Act. But then subsection 4 of sec. 61 provides that 'the provisions of this Act relating to contracts of sale do not apply to any transaction in the form of a contract of sale which is intended to operate by way of mortgage, pledge, charge, or other security'; and I cannot doubt that the disposition by Hall, if it imports a sale, falls clearly within these words, and therefore was not a sale falling under the Sale of Goods Act.

"Be it, then, that this disposition expressed an absolute sale of these moveables, it would be ineffectual unless it could be shewn that possession had followed on it. Actual physical possession did not follow. Robertson threatened, indeed, to enter on possession, but admittedly he never did so, unless it could be held that he was constructively in possession, in virtue of the possession of Hall, under the contract of hiring said to be expressed in the back-letter.

"On this question of constructive possession there are not many authoriof 1893. The provisions of that Act, however, relating to contracts of sale do not apply to any transaction in the form of a contract of sale which is intended to operate by way of security.

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustee.

Now, the conduct of the parties here seems to me to be most correctly described by the Lord Ordinary when he says that the form of the transaction "constituted a device by which it was thought that Robertson might obtain a security which he could not obtain by a bond with an assignation of the plant without delivery." Mr Broatch, the agent who advised the form of the transaction, is constrained to admit that it was just a money-lending transaction. A loan was its sole intent, and the form it took was only a straining after a mode of securing the loan, the actual circumstances making the ordinary mode of security practically impossible. The whole transaction was for an inadequate price, and with the intention, not that the complainer should receive the thing purchased, but that the seller should remain in possession, and even use up that considerable part of the subject of the transaction which consisted of materials, being under no obligation to replace them. In the original back-letter there was a simple stipulation for interest on the sum handed by Robertson to Hall—a stipulation quite inconsistent with the idea of a true sale—and the effort was made to get rid of this difficulty by interpolating the words "by way of hire therefor." Then by the fifth article it is made plain that what is called "hire" is just instalments of repayment, for the hire is to be paid on whatever part of the £400 shall remain unpaid. And lastly, there is a stipulation as to "any other sums to be advanced," thus making the subject which the complainer professed to have bought a security to him for future advances.

Taking into consideration the conduct of the parties, and the whole circumstances of the case, I feel it impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that to which the Lord Ordinary has come, and I would move your Lordships therefore to affirm his judgment.

ties, for so long as (in respect of the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act) possession by a buyer was not necessary at all, it was needless to raise the question of constructive possession, and the Court has generally proceeded on the former ground. The leading case on this point is, I think, still Orr's Trustees v. Tullis, 2d July 1870, 8 Macph. 936. It has, however, been followed in Robertson v. M'Intyre, 17th March 1882, 9 R. 772; Darling v. Wilson's Trustees, 16th December 1887, 15 R. 180; and in the recent case of Mitchell's Trustees, 27th February 1894, 21 R. 567. I am of opinion that these cases do not apply. They cannot apply if the true right of Robertson was merely that of a security holder. In that point of view Hall's possession is to be attributed to his proprietary title, and not to any subordinate title, and his possession must be regarded as his own possession, not Robertson's. But even if Robertson's title were that of owner, I doubt whether these cases could be held applicable. The circumstances in all of them were materially different. When these cases are examined they appear to be special, and to amount to this, that in the particular circumstances the possession of one person was attributed to another who authorised the possession. They were all cases in which it was held that the only intention was to confer a proprietary title, and that all the possession followed which was possible in the circumstances, or at least which could reasonably be expected. The rule has never been applied where the whole object of the transaction was only to secure a loan. . . . "

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that the disposition of 29th August 1894 being delivered by Hall to Robertson in return for the sum of £400, constituted a contract of sale of the property specified in the prayer of this suspension, and must have effect accordingly. The legal capacity of the parties to contract is not in question, and on the evidence, documentary and parole, I see no reason to doubt that they intended a contract of sale on the terms specified, intelligibly enough, although inartistically or even clumsily, in the disposition. Nor is there a suggestion or ground for suspicion of unfairness by either party to the other, or that either was ignorant of anything material to the contract, known to the other. Then if sale was the contract intended, it follows that the relation intended to be thereby constituted between the parties was that of buyer and seller, and that the title of the buyer to the subject sold was a title of property. That sale was the contract intended I should have held on the terms of the disposition, which I think admits of no other construction. But it is on the parole evidence too distinctly proved to admit of dispute that Mr Hall was distinctly informed, and quite understood, that he could not have the money he desired from the complainer on a contract of loan, or otherwise than on a contract of sale, whereby he should as buyer become owner of the inventoried property. The complainer's reason for declining to pay his money on any other terms is good, and certainly intelligible, and that Mr Hall understood it and so agreed to the terms and took the money upon them is, as I have said, not doubtful as matter of fact.

The complainer being thus the owner of the goods on a valid property title was in a position to contract with respect to them as he did by the back-letter of 1st September 1894. And if what I have said of the contract of sale effected by the disposition be well founded, this letter was thereafter Hall's title of possession. He had no other. What was its character? I think clearly enough a contract of hire on specified terms, unless and until he should avail himself of an option thereby given him to repurchase the goods within a specified time and on specified terms. I did not understand it to be maintained that this was an unlawful contract for the owner of property to make with anyone who was willing to agree to it, or that there was any exceptional ground to hinder him making it with the former firm when he had himself purchased it.

I think this case is governed by the judgment of the House of Lords, affirming that of this Court, in the case of M'Bain v. Wallace,¹ and by that of this Court in the subsequent case of *Liddell's Trustees v. Warr & Co.*² The judgments of the noble and learned Lords in the case of *M'Bain v. Wallace*¹ deal with the subject exhaustively. Nor do I think that the authority or application of these decisions is affected by the repeal of sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, or by sec. 61, subsection 4, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It is in my judgment clear, that as a matter of fact it was absolutely contrary, not merely to the understanding but to the distinctly expressed intention of both parties, to make a contract of loan and to create between them the relation of lender and borrower—making the complainer the holder of a “mortgage, pledge, charge, or other security.”

¹ 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

² 20 R. 989.

It is certain that as a mortgagee, pledgee, or security holder, or, indeed, otherwise than as proprietor, he could not have made the contract expressed in the back-letter of 1st September, and equally so that this was known and understood by both parties. They both knew thoroughly well what they were doing, and in my opinion what they did was lawful and ought to have effect.

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

LORD TRAYNER.—The material question of fact in this case is, whether the transaction between the complainer and Mr Hall was a sale or a security. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the transaction was not a sale, and that, notwithstanding the form which it took, it was intended to operate as a security and nothing else. The circumstances were, shortly, these: Mr Hall purchased from Messrs Carrick & Sons the business then carried on by them as engineers and crane-makers, with their machinery, stock, and plant, at a price of something over £2000. Of this sum, according to their bargain, Mr Hall was to pay to Messrs Carrick £300 in cash, and the remainder by bills. Mr Hall had no money whatever, and to enable him to pay the £300, payable at once in cash, he went to his law-agent, to whom “he mentioned that he wanted a loan of money.” This agent applied to another of his clients, the complainer, who agreed to give the money (I refrain from saying at present to lend the money) on certain conditions, which I shall immediately notice. Mr Hall having got £400 from the complainer settled the transaction with Messrs Carrick, and got possession of their works, machinery, stock, &c. Thereafter the transaction between the complainer and Mr Hall took this form. Mr Hall executed a disposition by which, in consideration of the payment of £400 to him by the complainer, he sold and assigned to the complainer the whole machinery, plant, and stock which he had purchased from the Messrs Carrick. This disposition, although not signed for a few days after the settlement with the Carricks, by which Hall became proprietor of their works, was intended to be signed the same day, and was practically executed simul et semel. A back-letter was granted by the complainer on 1st September and delivered to Hall. The form of the transaction therefore was a sale by Hall to the complainer. The reason why the transaction took this form is clear from the evidence of the law-agent, who acted for both the parties. He says—“When he (Hall) came first, he mentioned that he wanted a loan of money. I asked him what was his security, and he told me that he had none. He said that he was going to make this purchase (i.e., from the Carricks), and I told him that the only way in which he could form a security was by his purchasing the stock and then reselling it to Mr Robertson.” Accordingly, what was wanted was a security, and the law-agent thought and advised that this could be done in the way he describes. I do not leave out of view that the complainer denies that he gave the money to Hall on loan, and repeats “that it was an out-and-out transaction of sale.” But the complainer is, to say the least, an interested witness. I prefer to consider the documents which were exchanged at the time as shewing what was the real character of the transaction; the evidence they afford is, in my opinion, the best we have.

Before considering these documents, however, I may advert for a moment

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustee.

to certain circumstances which appear to me to make it very improbable that the transaction which we are considering was one of sale. The complainant did not want to buy the business nor the stock and machinery necessary for the business of an engineer and crane-maker. What he did want was a security that the money he was advancing to Hall to enable him to make such a purchase would be duly repaid. Nor is it probable that Hall, after all the trouble he had taken to acquire the business, should be disposed to sell it to another the very day or two or three days after he had bought it. Still less likely is it that Hall should sell for £400 what he had just bought at a price of over £2000. Mere inadequacy of price, I need not say, would be far from conclusive against such a transaction being a sale, but it does forcibly suggest that the transaction was something else, and something short of sale. Another extraordinary feature in this transaction is this:—Hall, the supposed seller, not only remains in full possession of the whole subject of sale, but was entitled to use the stock for his own purposes and his own profit without being under any obligation to pay for or replace the same. In short, the seller was entitled to use what he had sold as if it had not been sold but remained his own property. The statement of the complainant, therefore, that the transaction was one of "out-and-out sale" appears to me to be a very improbable story. But turning now to the documents, the disposition and back-letter, I think it is made clear that this story, antecedently improbable, is not correct in point of fact. Keeping in view the circumstances, as I have stated them, under which this deed was granted, it is curious to find in a deed which purports to be a conveyance to a purchaser, the provision that he should have power to take possession of the subject sold "at any time he may think proper, and that without any warrant or authority other than these presents." If the complainant bought the things specified, he could take possession (having already paid the price) without any such "power" being granted by the seller. The clause is quite inappropriate to a conveyance in pursuance of a sale. Its value and significance are apparent if the transaction was not sale but security. Again, the deed under consideration authorises the complainant to "sell, use, and dispose" of the plant and other articles conveyed "in such portions and at such prices as he can procure, and give delivery thereof to the purchaser, to receive the price and discharge the same, with the application whereof the purchaser shall have no concern"—authority to sell what he had bought—that is, authority to sell what was his own—and the purchaser to have no concern with what he did with the price paid to him. This is mere nonsense in a contract of sale, but a provision familiar enough and appropriate enough in deeds conveying subjects, heritable or moveable, in security. Turning now to the back-letter, I find in it also evidence of the real character of the transaction. I do not go over all its articles, but notice (first) that it contains an obligation on Hall to repay the £400 he had received from the complainant by instalments of £60 every six months—quite an intelligible obligation if the £400 was a loan to be repaid, but absurd if the £400 was the price paid for goods sold and delivered; (second) interest at the rate of 20 per cent was to be paid by Hall to the complainant on the sum of £400 or "whatever part thereof may be unpaid." This also shews that the £400 was a loan, for interest could

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

not be exacted and would not be paid as a price for which goods had been sold. No doubt the words are introduced "by way of hire." But these words cannot conceal what was the true nature of the transaction, nor even divert attention from it. I venture to think that while 20 per cent on £400 may be regarded as a very good return by way of interest, the complainer would hesitate considerably before he let out subjects belonging to him which would necessarily deteriorate and be to some extent consumed in the use, and which cost over £2000, for £80 a year "by way of hire." Lastly, the concluding article of the back-letter indicates that the conveyance was a security, although in form an absolute conveyance, as under that article the complainer is authorised to use the conveyance practically as a security to cover future advances.

If I am right in holding, as I do without hesitation, that the transaction in question, although in the form of a contract of sale, was intended to operate as a security, and nothing but a security, then the goods over which the security was intended to be given having remained in Hall's possession, no effectual security was constituted. The provisions of the Sale of Goods Act have, in that view, no application to the case. I need not go over the authorities which were cited to us on either side of the bar. The cases are divided into two classes, one class being those cases in which it was held that a bona fide sale had been intended and completed (no matter what the motive which led to it), and the other class consisting of the cases where it was held that security, and not sale, was the contract or bargain. It depends, of course, on the circumstances and proof in each case to which of these classes it belongs. The case of *M'Bain v. Wallace*¹ was much referred to, but little aid is obtained from it in deciding the present case. I think it probable that the complainer, in carrying through the transaction in question, had that case before him, and perhaps had not sufficiently before him the terms of section 61, subsec. 4, of the Sale of Goods Act. But the case of *M'Bain*¹ does not aid the complainer. It did not decide that a security in the form of a sale was effectual in a competition with creditors where the subject of the security was left in the debtor's possession. The decision in that case proceeded distinctly on the ground that the transaction then before the Court was a bona fide sale, and Lord Watson remarked—"The Lord Ordinary" (whose judgment was reversed) "seems to have held that the agreement in reality was one for a loan upon security, and not for a sale and purchase, and if that view were well founded the judgment of the Lord Ordinary undoubtedly is equally so." If the Court of Session or the House of Lords had been of opinion that in that case the contract was not sale but security, the decision would no doubt have been other than it was.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be adhered to.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion with the majority of your Lordships that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right and should be affirmed. The true nature of the transaction between the bankrupt and the complainer

¹ 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

No. 23. Andrew Robertson, by which the former professed to sell to the latter the fixed plant and other articles in Dalry Engine Works, was that of a security, and not an out-and-out sale. It was a transaction in the form of a contract of sale, but it was intended to operate by way of security for an advance of £400. Admittedly there was no actual delivery of the goods to Robertson; they remained in the possession of Hall just as before. If, however, there was truly a contract of sale, and the intention of the parties—as ascertained from the terms of the contract, the conduct of parties and the circumstances of the case—was that the property should pass, the property passed to Robertson without delivery—sec. 17 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. But sec. 61 (4) of that Act provides,—“The provisions of this Act relating to contracts of sale do not apply to any transaction in the form of a contract of sale which is intended to operate by way of mortgage, pledge, charge, or other security.” This is in effect a statutory declaration that a pledge of or security over moveables cannot be created merely by completion of what professes to be a contract of sale. If the transaction is truly a sale, the property will pass without delivery. But the form of the contract is not conclusive. The reality of the transaction must be inquired into; and if, contrary to the form of the contract, and even the declaration of the parties, it appears from the whole circumstances that a true sale was not intended, it will be held that the property has not passed and that no effectual security has been acquired.

I gather from the cases of Beckett v. Tower Assets Company, Limited,¹ and Madell v. Thomas & Company,² that the same latitude of inquiry is permitted in England, where the question is, whether what bears to be a sale followed by a contract of hiring and purchase is not truly a bill of sale requiring for validity registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882.

The argument which was unsuccessful in those cases was precisely the argument which was addressed to us on behalf of the complainer, viz. that the intention of parties is to be ascertained by the legal effect of the instruments which have been executed; that if a transaction can be legally carried out by means which do not come within the terms of the Bills of Sale Acts, there is nothing to prevent the parties from so carrying it out, although when completed the same result would be produced as if there had been a bill of sale; and that in the absence of fraud or mistake inducing the contract, the Court is not at liberty to disregard the legal effects of the document and ascertain the intention of parties aliunde.

In the present case I assume that in the “disposition” executed by Hall everything was done which could be done by form of words to represent the transaction as truly a contract of sale. I agree that there is no reason to doubt the good faith of the parties. They both, no doubt, intended to take effectual steps to exclude the diligence of Hall’s creditors, and thought that they had done so. But for all that, the transaction, in substance, was not a sale. It had not the characteristics of a sale, and it had the characteristics of a security, or an attempt to create a security, not only for past, but also for future advances. The back-letter by itself, apart from the actings and admissions of parties, shews the real nature of the transaction. The sum advanced was only £400, whereas the value of the goods was above £2000. Interest was to be paid on the loan, and the capital was to be repaid by instalments; and if further advances were made, it was provided that the transaction should apply to them also. In short, the back-letter discloses, not a loan or hire of the goods, but a loan of £400 on the security of the goods, to be repaid by instalments. There was no proper loan of goods, no proper contract of hiring. Hall's position after the alleged sale was that of undivested proprietor. He was not merely left in possession of the whole of the goods, machinery, and plant, but on Robertson's own admission he was entitled, in carrying on his business, to use up the stock of timber and iron, and was under no obligation to replace it; and he was entitled to use the machinery, plant, and tools just as if they belonged to himself. He had absolute control over them.

¹ L. R. [1891], 1 Q. B. 638, reversing Cave, J., L. R. [1891], 1 Q. B. 1.

² L. R. [1891], 1 Q. B. 230.

No. 23.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Robertson v.
Hall's Trustees.

I do not propose to examine the series of cases, beginning with Orr's Trustees v. Tullis,¹ and including M'Bain v. Wallace & Company,² in this Court and in the House of Lords, which are referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note. On the cases alone, the decision of this case would have been more difficult. The distinction between some of them is extremely narrow; it is hard to reconcile them; and there are judicial observations, especially in M'Bain v. Wallace & Company,² which, taken by themselves, go far to support the complainer's argument. Notwithstanding this, I think I should have come to the same conclusion on the decided cases alone, because only in those cases was the transaction sustained to the effect of excluding the alleged seller's creditors where on the facts the Court was satisfied that a true contract of sale had been entered into. But these cases were all decided before the passing of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and I cannot doubt that sec. 61 (4) of that Act was enacted in view of these decisions, and, in particular, of the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in M'Bain v. Wallace & Company.² Without saying that the statute wholly destroys the authority of that case, it at least establishes the competency of contradicting a formal contract of sale by evidence of contrary intention whenever this is necessary to ascertain the true nature of the transaction. In the present case, as I have said, the evidence, when examined, makes it quite clear that the true intention of parties was to create a security only, although, no doubt, they intended to effect that result through the form of an out-and-out sale.

THE COURT adhered.

ROBERT BROATCH, L.A.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

LAURENCE LAURENSEN, Appellant.—Balfour—Galloway.
THE COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE OF LERWICK, Respondents.—
J. G. Stewart.

No. 24.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Laurenson v.
Police Commissioners of Lerwick.

Police—Maintenance of foot-pavement—Order by Police Commissioners—Process—Appeal—Competency—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 143, 339.—Section 143 of the Burgh Police Act,

¹ 8 Macph. 936.

² 8 R. 360, and 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

No. 24. 1892, enacts that, "as regards the making, altering, paving, or causewaying, and maintaining streets and foot-pavements, it shall be lawful for any person whose property may be affected, and who thinks himself thereby aggrieved, to appeal to the Sheriff. . . ."

Nov. 10, 1896. Laurenson v. Police Commissioners of Lerwick.

Section 339 enacts that "any person liable to pay or to contribute towards the expense of any work ordered or required by the Commissioners under this Act, and any person whose property may be affected, or who thinks himself aggrieved, by any order . . . of the Commissioners made or done under any of the provisions herein contained, may, unless otherwise in this Act specially provided, appeal either to the Sheriff or the Court of Session. . . ."

Held that the right of appeal to the Sheriff given by section 143 was limited to cases where the appellant's property was affected, and therefore that it was competent for an owner of property within a burgh, who had been called upon by the Police Commissioners to repair a foot-pavement which bounded but was not upon, and did not affect, his property, to appeal to the Court of Session under section 339, in respect that, his property not being affected, he had no right of appeal under section 143.

1st Division. On 26th August 1896 the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Lerwick served a notice upon Laurence Laurenson, draper, Law Lane, Lerwick, calling upon him, in terms of section 142 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, "to have the foot-pavement before your property in Law Lane . . . to a width extending outwards from the boundary of your property, half the breadth of said street . . . put in a sufficient state of repair. . . ."

Laurenson appealed under section 339 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, against the above order as ultra vires of the Police Commissioners and illegal, and craved the Court to quash it.

He stated,—"(2) The said Law Lane is a public street within the meaning of the foresaid Act, and is one of the leading thoroughfares from Hillhead to Commercial Street, which is the principal street in the town of Lerwick. The foresaid lane or street, like all the old streets in Lerwick, including Commercial Street, is paved over its whole surface. It is without footpath, kerb, or gutter, and said street forms the only available way for traffic of all kinds. The said lane or street is so narrow that no proper footpaths could be constructed along its sides, and it is used for all kinds of traffic across its whole breadth. (3) The maintenance of the said lane or street as one of the public streets of the burgh is imposed on the respondents by the foresaid Act. Section 142 of the Act under which the said notice professes to be given applies only to the foot-pavements along the sides of streets, and it does not apply to carriage-ways or to such streets as Law Lane, which are used for all kinds of traffic across their whole breadth, and in which it is impossible, or at least impracticable, as in some parts of Commercial Street, to form foot-pavements along the sides. The order or requisition contained in the foresaid notice is ultra vires of the respondents and is illegal and oppressive. The appellant respectfully appeals against the same in virtue of the provisions of section 339 of the said Act, and craves the Court to order a copy of this appeal to be served on the clerk to the said Commissioners, and to appoint him within six days after such service to lodge answers thereto; and thereafter, on resuming consideration hereof, with or without answers, to quash the foresaid order or requisition, and to find the appellant entitled to expenses."

The Police Commissioners of Lerwick lodged answers, in which, inter alia, they objected to the competency of the appeal. They did not aver that any part of Law Lane was situated on the property of the appellant. No. 24.

Argued for the respondents;—The order complained of being an order to put a foot-pavement in repair, the appellant had a right of appeal to the Sheriff under section 143 of the Act, and that special right of appeal given by that section excluded the general right given by section 339. (The sections are quoted in rubric.) Nov. 10, 1896.
Laurenson v.
Police Commissioners of Lerwick.

Argued for the appellant;—The primary intention of section 143 was to provide a right of appeal regarding a question of work actually proceeding, and the quality of the grievance which might be made the subject of an appeal was injury to the appellant's property. No such injury was complained of here, and accordingly the appellant's right of appeal was not under section 143, but section 339. Even assuming that the appellant might have appealed under section 143, it did not necessarily follow that he had no right of appeal under section 339, for the appeal given by the former section was nowhere said to be exclusive, and it was appropriate that the large question of liability should be capable of being taken by appeal to the Court of Session.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—(After stating the facts, and citing sections 143 and 339 of the Burgh Police Act, his Lordship proceeded)—The question, therefore, is whether an appeal is competent under the 143d section. That the appeal under section 143 relates to the subject-matter of this case is clear enough. But then it is necessary to see to whom appeal is given in such cases, and it will be observed that the appeal is given to "any person whose property may be affected, and who thinks himself thereby aggrieved," and not as in section 339, where appeal is given to any person whose property is affected, or who thinks himself aggrieved. Therefore, it appears to me that, for an appeal to be competent under this 143d section the appellant must be a person whose property is affected. Now, it is nowhere set out in the proceedings here that the appellant's property is affected. The notice bears that the foot-pavement which is to be repaired "extends outwards from the boundary of your property." Therefore, it is quite clear from the order in question that no part of the appellant's property is taken or affected by this order. His purse is affected undoubtedly, but not his property.

Suppose, then, that in this case the appellant had brought an appeal under the 143d section, he would be met with the plea of incompetency in respect that his property was not affected; and I confess I do not see what answer he would have had. I can quite understand that an appeal under that section would have been competent if, for example, the accesses to his property had been interfered with by altering the levels of the street, or otherwise; but I do not see in this case anything of that sort,—where the appellant's property is not touched, and all that is done is to order him to repair a foot-pavement outside his property altogether,—how it can be said in the sense of the Act that his property is thereby affected I do not see. It therefore appears to me that the appeal specially provided in section 143, and referred to in section 339, does not apply to this case, for I do not think it was an appeal open to him. Therefore, the conclusion I arrive at is that the appeal under the 339th section is right, and accordingly that the objection to the competency must be repelled.

No. 24.
Nov. 10, 1896.
Laurenson v.
Police Commissioners of Lerwick.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am always disposed to put a liberal construction on clauses in general or local Acts of Parliament giving an appeal to this Court on questions of construction. Such clauses may be liberally interpreted, because it is convenient for those who are to administer the Acts that their clauses should be interpreted by the highest authority. Coming to the consideration of this prejudicial plea with a certain bias in favour of sustaining the right of appeal, and keeping in view the peculiar character of the streets of Lerwick, I agree with Lord Adam that the objections to the competency of the appeal may be repelled. I think that in the case of the burgh of Lerwick there are grounds for the contention that this is not a mere question of fact, because the streets of Lerwick are not constructed for vehicular traffic, and there is no distinction of footway and causeway. Again, it is said that the whole streets are the property of the burgh, and that this is merely a question of assessment. At the same time I do not wish to be understood to say that in any burgh where the streets are of the ordinary character, the householder, by merely saying that the pavement is not his property, can exclude the jurisdiction of the Sheriff and obtain the benefit of the appeal to this Court. That will have to be considered if the question should arise.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam for the reason he has given. I think the 339th section provides an appeal generally to various classes of persons, persons who may be "liable to pay or to contribute towards the expense of any work ordered by the Commissioners," and persons "whose property may be affected" by the order of the Commissioners, or who may "think themselves aggrieved by such order," though not called upon to pay or contribute towards the expense. Now, I assume that if the present appeal could be shewn to fall under section 143, it would be incompetent by reason of the provision that the appeal given in section 339 shall be open only if it is not otherwise specially provided in the Act. But I agree with what Lord Adam has said that the 143d section gives an appeal, not to persons who complain of an order on the ground that they may be wrongfully called upon to contribute towards the expense of its execution, but only to persons whose property may be affected by such an order, and who think themselves thereby aggrieved. Now, the appellant does not complain upon that ground. He does not allege that the footpath to be repaired is his property, nor that the repair will in any way affect the property belonging to him, and bounded by the footpath. On the other hand, the Commissioners do not allege that the footpath is the property of the complainer, but on the contrary they call upon him to contribute to the expense of a footpath bounding his property. And therefore I cannot find anything to disclose a complaint that the order in question affects the property of the appellant. I think it is a complaint upon another ground, and therefore within the 339th section.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not differ.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency of the appeal.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—IRONA, ROBERTS, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE MIDDLE WARD OF THE COUNTY OF No. 25.

LANARK AND OTHERS, Complainers (Respondents).—Salvesen—
Cook.

JAMES MARSHALL, Respondent (Reclaimer).—C. J. Guthrie—
Constable.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

Lease—Power to resume lands—Feu of lands resumed—Liability of feuor to compensate tenant—County Council—District Committee—Hospital—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 39 and 116.—By lease of a farm dated in 1886 the landlord, inter alia, reserved power “to take off such part of the lands hereby let as may be considered expedient for the purpose of feuing . . . it being hereby provided that the annual value of any ground thereby taken from the said lands shall be paid to the tenants” at the rate of £4 an acre.

In 1893 the landlord resumed five acres of the farm, and by private agreement feued the land so resumed to the County Council. Thereafter the District Committee of the County Council erected a hospital on this land under the powers of section 39 of the Public Health Act, 1867.

In 1896 the tenant, who had since the resumption been receiving from the landlord an abatement of rent equal to £4 an acre for the land resumed, served a notice on the District Committee in which he claimed compensation for unexhausted manure, &c., and, founding on section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867, took proceedings for having the amount of such compensation settled by arbitration.

In a note of suspension and interdict brought by the District Committee, held that the proceedings for arbitration fell to be interdicted in respect that the tenant's only right to compensation, if he had any, was against his landlord.

Question, whether the claim to compensation, assuming it to be otherwise well founded, had properly been made against the District Committee and not against the County Council.

Opinions that section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867, did not apply.

Title to Sue—Joint Right—Lease—Assignment pendente processu.—One of two persons who ex facie of a lease were joint tenants of a farm sent a notice of a claim to compensation to the County Council, which had taken a feu of part of the farm, the landlord having power to resume under the lease. In a suspension of proceedings for having the claim determined by arbitration the County Council pleaded, inter alia, that the claimant being only a joint tenant was not in titulo to insist in the claim. The claimant answered that he had the whole real interest in the farm, and lodged pendente processu an assignation in his favour by the other tenant setting forth that fact.

Opinions (contra the judgment of Lord Pearson) that the claimant had a good title.

By lease, dated 5th July and 26th August 1886 between Lord 2^d Division.
Hamilton of Dalzell (then Mr Hamilton of Dalzell) on the one part, Lord Pearson.
and James Marshall and David Marshall, farmers at Airbles, on the other part, Lord Hamilton let “to the said James Marshall and David Marshall and their heirs, but expressly excluding assignees and subtenants, legal and voluntary, unless specially approved of by the landlord in writing, All and Whole the said farm of Airbles and others as recently tenanted by the heirs of the late John Marshall,” for the period of nineteen years, from Martinmas 1881 as to the arable land, and from Whitsunday 1882 as to the houses and grain, reserving to the proprietor the mines and minerals, with power to

No. 25.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

work, win, and carry away the same, and to sink pits, "allowance being always given to the said tenants and their foresaids for the ground so to be resumed for the above purposes, or for any surface or other damage which may be done to the said lands by the said operations at the rate of £4 sterling per imperial acre for all ground so to be resumed or damaged to the west of the Muckle Burn, and at the rate of £3 sterling per imperial acre for all ground so to be resumed or damaged to the east thereof, as also reserving to the proprietor and his foresaids full power, liberty, and privilege, at any time during the currency hereof, to take off such part of the lands hereby let as may be considered expedient for the purpose of feuing or letting out on building leases, making excambions, planting, making roads or erecting public works, straightening or making alterations of the marches of the said lands and those adjoining, or for any other purpose that may be thought proper; it being hereby provided that the annual value of any ground thereby taken from the said lands shall be paid to the tenants and their foresaids at the foresaid rates." For which causes, and on the other part, "the said James Marshall and David Marshall hereby bind and oblige themselves, their heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, all conjunctly and severally," to pay the sum of £246, 10s. as rent.

By minute of agreement dated 9th November 1893 the County Council of Lanark agreed to feu five and a-half acres of the farm of Airbles on, inter alia, the following condition:—"The feuar on entry to pay to the tenant of the land for the time being such damage (if any) as the latter may sustain in consequence of the feuar taking possession, such as for loss of crop, manure, &c.," the County Council being also "bound to pay annually during the first nine years of the feu the sum of £20 as compensation to the present tenant of the farm of Airbles for the loss of the land."

Thereafter Lord Hamilton granted a feu-charter in favour of the County Council, dated 17th November 1893, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 10th July 1894, with entry at Whitsunday 1893. The feu-charter did not contain a clause binding the County Council to pay damages, or to pay £20 as compensation to the tenants of Airbles.

The County Council acquired this land in order that the District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire might erect a hospital thereon, and the District Committee proceeded to erect a hospital accordingly.

The Marshalls, as tenants of Airbles, made no objection to their landlord resuming this five and a-half acres, and they annually received from him an abatement from their rent equal to £4 an acre for the land resumed, that being the rate specified in the lease for that part of the farm.

On 24th March 1896 James Marshall, as "the lessee and occupier of the farms and lands of Airbles," sent to the District Committee a notice setting forth that the District Committee, "in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Health (Scotland) Acts, and the Acts incorporated therewith, and the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, erected a hospital on the said farm and lands of Airbles, and entered upon and took part of the same for and in connection with the erection of said hospital at or about the term of Whitsunday 1893," and claiming "compensation in respect thereof, videlicet:—For unexhausted manure and improvements on the portions of the said farm taken as

No. 25.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

aforesaid ; for ploughing and labour which had been incurred in connection therewith ; for severance damages and inconvenience ; for loss of crops and pasture ; reforming headriggs and loss of ground and crops,—both on the portion of ground taken from said farm and on the ground adjoining the same, the sum of £180," with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from the term of Whitsunday 1893. The notice further bore, that in the event of the District Committee not being willing to pay the compensation claimed, the claimant desired to have the same settled by arbitration, in terms of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.*

Marshall followed up this notice by serving upon the District Committee a nomination and appointment of an arbiter, and the District Committee, under protest, made a similar nomination and appointment.

The District Committee then, with consent and concurrence of the County Council, presented a note of suspension and interdict to have Marshall and the arbiters interdicted from following out the reference.

The complainers averred :—(Stat. 3) "The said lands were feued by the County Council for the purposes foresaid, not in virtue of any compulsory or other special powers contained in the Public Health or other Act or Acts administered by them, but as a matter of private and voluntary agreement with Lord Hamilton, which he might have refused to enter into if so disposed. . . ."

The respondent Marshall answered :—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the lands were feued by agreement. Explained further, that the said lands were feued and purchased in terms of the provisions of these Acts with respect to the purchase of lands by agreement, and that if the parties had not come to an agreement in terms of these provisions the complainers might, and would, have taken the lands compulsorily under section 90 of the Public Health Act."

The complainers further averred :—(Stat. 4) "At the time when the said feu-charter was granted the farm of Airbles was let under lease, dated in 1886, between Lord Hamilton and the said James Marshall and David Marshall, farmers, Airbles, for nineteen years from Mar-

* The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), enacts, section 39,—“The Local Authority may provide within their district hospitals or temporary places for the reception of the sick for the use of the inhabitants. Such authority may build such hospitals or places of reception provided the board approve of the situation and construction thereof, or they may make contracts for the use of any existing hospital or part of an hospital, or for the temporary use of any place for the reception of the sick.” There is no provision in the Act for the compulsory acquisition of land for the purpose of building hospitals.

Section 116 enacts,—“Full compensation shall be made out of any fund or assessment applicable to the purposes of this Act to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, except when otherwise specially provided ; and in case of dispute, if the sum claimed do not exceed the sum of £50 sterling, the same may be ascertained on a summary application by either party to the Sheriff, whose decision shall be final, and not subject to review, unless when pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute, in which case it may be reviewed by the Sheriff on appeal, and when the sum claimed exceeds £50 sterling such compensation shall be ascertained and disposed of in terms of the Lands Clauses Acts.”

No. 25.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

tinmas 1881 and Whitsunday 1882 respectively, and it is believed and averred that they are both still tenants of said farm.

The respondent denied this averment, and "explained that, though the lease purports to be granted in favour of the present respondent and his brother David Marshall, the name of David Marshall was inserted simply for family purposes. He went abroad shortly after the lease was granted, and has not resided at Airbles since. He is engaged in business in England on his own account, and neither had nor has any interest in the lease. The present respondent is the sole tenant of the farm, and has the sole interest therein."

The complainers also averred:—(Stat. 7) " . . . The tenants' rights under their lease in respect of the resumption of ground for feuing purposes are limited to £4 per acre, which has been allowed, and will doubtless continue to be allowed, by the landlord by way of abatement from the rent." To which the respondent answered:—(Ans. 7) " . . . According to the lease itself, and the intention of the parties as interpreted by their actings since the lease was granted, the said stipulation does not restrict this respondent's compensation to £4 an acre for all damage suffered. During the respondent's tenancy a large number of feus have been given off the farm by the landlord. In every case the feus were given on the same general conditions as those" in the agreement of 9th November 1896, "and in every case in accordance with said conditions, the respondent received, in addition to an abatement of rent equivalent to £4 an acre for the land taken off, compensation for such items of damage as those embraced in his present notice of claim."

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The complainers are entitled to suspension and interdict as craved in respect (a) that no claim for damages to the respondent the said James Marshall in consequence of the acquisition of said feu lies against the complainers the District Committee; (b) that no claim lies against either the District Committee or the County Council in respect that they have no contract with said respondent, and that his remedy, if any, is against his landlord; (c) that as the feu was acquired by agreement and not by the exercise of the powers of acquisition conferred by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, the said respondent cannot insist upon arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act; (d) that any claim competent to the said respondent under his lease, in respect of the resumption of ground for feuing, is met by the allowance or abatement of rent made by the landlord in terms of said lease; (e) that the claim now preferred is not a proper claim for compensation within the meaning of the Lands Clauses or Public Health Acts; and (f) that any proceedings that might be competent under the Public Health Act are barred by section 118 thereof. (3) The respondent the said James Marshall, being only a joint tenant of the lands, is not in titulo by himself alone to make, or proceed with, said claim. (4) No question of disputed compensation having arisen between the parties, the complainers are entitled to suspension and interdict as craved.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(2) This respondent having sustained damage by reason of the complainers' exercise of the powers of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, the complainers are bound, in terms of section 116 of the said Act, to make compensation therefor under the Lands Clauses Acts, and the note should be refused, with expenses to the respondent.

During the hearing in the Procedure Roll the respondent was allowed to lodge in process an assignation, dated 10th July 1896, whereby the respondent's brother David Marshall, on the narrative of the facts averred in answer 4, assigned to the respondent his (David's) whole interest (if any) in and to the lease, with power to uplift claims connected therewith.

On 3d August 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) granted interdict as craved.*

No. 25.
Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

* "OPINION.— . . . The tenant's claim is founded on section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867. That section provides (inter alia) that 'full compensation shall be made, out of any fund or assessment applicable to the purposes of this Act, to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act.' It further provides that 'when the sum claimed exceeds £50 sterling, such compensation shall be ascertained and disposed of in terms of the Lands Clauses Acts.'

"This seems simple enough, but the tenant is met with an array of pleas, founded partly on the lease and partly on an anxious criticism of the statutory provisions, intended to shew that his claim fails for want of relevancy, and that proceedings on it should be stopped on that ground. These pleas are set forth in heads b, c, d, and e of the complainers' second plea in law. It does not appear to me that any or all of them afford sufficient ground for withdrawing this claim from arbitration on the score of irrelevancy or incompetency. Indeed, in point of law, my opinion upon all of them is against the complainers; but it is not necessary for me to deal with them, as I hold the complainers are entitled to succeed on other grounds.

"There are other three pleas stated for the complainers which deserve attention.

"One is, that the respondent, being only a joint tenant of the lands, is not in titulo to proceed with the claim by himself alone. The lease is taken in favour of 'James Marshall and David Marshall, both farmers at Airbles,' and their heirs, but expressly secluding assignees and subtenants, legal and voluntary, unless specially approved of by the landlord in writing; and the tenants' obligations are undertaken by James Marshall and David Marshall 'and their heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, all jointly and severally.' There is nothing in the lease to suggest that they are not equally interested in the tenants' part of the lease. This being so, I think that, both on principle and as a matter of ordinary fairness, the Public Health Authority are not bound to have the amount of compensation settled in a proceeding to which only one of the co-tenants is a party.

"The respondent, however, avers in answer 4 that the name of his brother David was inserted simply for family purposes; that David Marshall went abroad shortly after the lease was granted, and has not resided in Airbles since; and that he is engaged in business in England on his own account, 'and neither had nor has any interest in the lease.' It was urged that these are averments of pure fact which it is for the arbiters to inquire into and dispose of. But I see no reason why the complainers should be forced into a prejudicial inquiry of this nature before the arbiters, when the difficulty can be obviated by a joint claim on the part of both tenants, in conformity with the lease which is their only title. I do not say there may not be cases where a tenant in the respondent's position would be allowed to claim alone, as (possibly) where his co-tenant has disappeared and cannot be found. But so little difficulty has the respondent on that score, that, in conformity with a request made by him during the discussion, he has been allowed to lodge an assignation (dated 10th July 1896), whereby his brother, David Marshall, on the narrative of the facts

No. 25.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The objection to the respondent's title to insist in the present claim was ill-founded. A joint tenant, if he could shew that the whole real interest was in him, was in titulo to enforce such a claim, without the necessity of obtaining the concurrence of his co-tenant.¹ The assignation now produced established that the respondent had the sole real interest in the farm. It was not a case to which the rule pendente lite nihil. innovandum applied. The assignation was lodged not to strengthen the respondent's title, but to prove a fact. (2) The respondent did not dispute the validity of the complainers' feu-contract. It was open to the landlord to feu as much of his estate as he pleased; only, before the respondent could be dispossessed the conditions of the lease must be fulfilled, and they were not fulfilled merely by payment of £4 an acre for the ground feued. The respondent might not be entitled to found on the prior agreement of 9th November 1893 as giving him a right against the District Committee or the County Council, but it shewed very clearly that the landlord recognised that the respondent was entitled to compensation beyond £4 an acre—that the one was as much a condition of dispossessing the respondent as the other. (3) It was true that the County Council took the ground by private contract, and not compulsorily; but the right to have the amount of compensation settled by arbitration was not confined to averred in answer 4, assigns to the respondent his whole interest (if any) in and to the lease, with power to uplift claims connected therewith. While this comes too late to be of any avail in this process, it shews that the respondent has, and has all along had, the means at hand of presenting a claim in accordance with the terms of the lease.

"The other two pleas for the complainers are not, I think, well founded. The one is, that the County Council, and not the District Committee, is the body on which the claim should have been served, and with whom issue should have been joined in the arbitration. If this be so, the correspondence which preceded this suspension, and which was carried on at intervals for nearly two years, was most misleading, for it was carried on by the District Committee through their clerk without any hint that the claim was not at their disposal. But if this should be insufficient to commit a statutory body, I may say further, that I think the Public Health Authority is the proper respondent in a claim such as this, grounded on an administrative act within the scope of their statutory powers.

"As the complainers say in statement 2, the feu was acquired by the County Council 'for the purposes of the District Committee in the administration of the Public Health Acts within their district.'

"The other plea is that, assuming the claim to be otherwise competent under the Public Health Act, the proceedings are barred by section 118 thereof. That section, under the rubric 'Local Authority or Board not liable for irregularity of their officers,' bears, inter alia, that 'every action or prosecution against any person acting under this Act on account of any wrong done in or by any action, proceeding, or operation under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen.' But in my opinion the 'actions or prosecutions' there referred to are of a different class altogether from the claims for compensation allowed by section 116.

"I sustain the third plea in law for the complainers, and in respect thereof, grant suspension and interdict as craved, with expenses to the District Committee against the compearing respondent."

¹ Kilpatrick v. Kilpatrick, Nov. 27, 1841, 4 D. 109, 14 Scot. Jur. 46; M'Vean v. M'Vean, June 4, 1864, 2 Macph. 1150, 36 Scot. Jur. 577.

cases in which the land was taken compulsorily.¹ (4) The District Committee, not the County Council, was the proper body to be served with such a notice as the present.² The Peterhead case¹ was unaffected on this point by the case of Forbes.³

No. 25.
Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall.

Argued for the complainers;—(1) The Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment was well founded.⁴ (2) The respondent's right to compensation, if he had any, was a right ex contractu, and his claim, therefore, ought to be against his landlord, and not against the complainers, with whom the respondent had no contract. (3) Assuming that the respondent was right in bringing his claim against the complainers, it ought to have been enforced by ordinary action, not by arbitration. Section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867, did not apply to lands taken by private bargain. (4) If the claim was otherwise unobjectionable it was the County Council, not the District Committee, which should have been served with the notice of claim.⁵

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary in this case has sustained the third plea in law for the complainers. That is the plea which is based on the fact that the respondent is only joint tenant of the lands in regard to which he claims compensation from the complainers. The difficulty caused by this fact could have been easily got rid of, for although for family reasons, which do not appear, the name of the respondent's brother was put into the lease, the whole substantial interest was in the respondent only. But even were it otherwise I should not be inclined to decide the case upon such a narrow ground. But the respondent here, Marshall, even supposing him to be the only person interested in the lease, proposes to have an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act as to a claim for damages caused to him by the taking of part of the lands leased to him, for the purpose of feuing it to the County Council in order that they might build a hospital. The circumstances in which that land was resumed were these: The lease contains a very distinct clause to the effect that the proprietor shall have power at any time during the currency of the lease (and curiously enough without apparently giving the tenant any notice) to take off such part of the lands let as may be considered expedient for the purpose, inter alia, of feuing, it being provided that the annual value of any ground taken should be paid to the tenants at certain rates, in this case £4 per acre. The County Council by private agreement with the landlord obtained a site for a hospital, which in pursuance of their powers they desired to erect. In order to carry out the agreement the landlord, in exercise of the

¹ Peterhead Granite Polishing Co. v. Parochial Board of Peterhead, Jan. 24, 1880, 7 R. 536; Burgess v. Northwich Local Board, 1880, L. R., 6 Q. B. D. 264; Brierley Hill Local Board v. Pearsal, 1883, L. R., 11 Q. B. D. 735, and 1884, L. R., 9 App. Cas. 595.

² Northern District Committee of County Council of Ayr v. Knox, March 20, 1895 (Outer-House), 2 S. L. T. 568; Local Government Act, 1889, secs. 11 and 17.

³ Commissioners of Peterhead v. Forbes, July 4, 1895, 22 R. 852.

⁴ Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95; Symington v. Campbell, Jan. 31, 1894, 21 R. 434.

⁵ Local Government Act, 1889, secs. 11, 17 (2) (a), and 25.

No. 25.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

power reserved to him by the lease, resumed five and a-half acres of the land leased to the respondent. The County Council then acquired the land by private agreement with the landlord. They had no power to acquire land compulsorily for this purpose. If they had not been able to obtain it by private agreement they would have had to adopt the procedure of obtaining a Provisional Order. Now, the compensation which was to be paid to the tenant for the loss of the land leased to him and resumed by the landlord for feuing was settled by the lease. It may be that more was due to the tenant than the £4 per acre which is expressly mentioned, but in any view the compensation is compensation due to the tenant for land resumed into the landlord's hands, by the act of the landlord, proceeding on the reserved power contained in the lease. It is compensation due by the landlord to the tenant in respect of resumption. It is difficult to see how a clause relating to compulsory purchase of land under statutory powers can be held to apply to such a case.

The respondent's counsel quoted some cases indicating that although land has been obtained by a public authority by private agreement, and not compulsorily, a claim by a party injured by their taking the land, or their operations thereon when taken, may be settled by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act. The cases quoted are all cases where the public authority had taken something from the owner of land. The *Peterhead*¹ case is a strong instance of this. There the water, to which an inferior heritor had right, was taken away from him in consequence of the operations of the public authority on lands which they had acquired by private bargain. The lower heritor was thus injuriously affected by their proceedings. They had no agreement with him. They had no right to do what they did, nor to divert the water flowing down to him, except under their compulsory powers. These cases have no bearing upon the present.

I do not wish to give any judgment upon the question whether the claim was validly made against the District Committee of the County Council, or whether it ought to have been made against the County Council itself. That question would require careful consideration. Although the County Council has the ultimate control financially and otherwise, and is consequently the party ultimately responsible, it may still be that the District Committee can be claimed against or sued as having the direct local authority over the hospital. However, I give no opinion upon that point.

The Lord Ordinary's judgment will not be altered in the result. I arrive at the same conclusion as his Lordship, but on somewhat different grounds.

LORD YOUNG.—The facts here are simple. The lease under which the respondent possesses is in favour of himself and his brother. The brother was only put in for family purposes, and he has now left the country, and the respondent has the whole substantial interest in it.

By the lease which the respondent Marshall holds, he is tenant of his farm till the beginning of next century. The lease is for nineteen years. It contains a clause which reserves power to the landlord to resume parts of the farm for feuing at certain specified rates per acre. It is stated that at Whitsunday 1893 the landlord exercised this power by taking $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres off No. 25. the respondent's farm. The landlord took the land for the purposes of feuing it to the Local Authority, and he did feu it to them, with entry at Whitsunday 1893. It is admitted that this was a good exercise of the power. The feu was granted, and the feuar entered into possession. I put the question "Is there any objection to the complainers' feu-charter?" and I got the answer, "No, there is none." There is no objection, then, to the complainers' title. The feu was well granted. If that be so, the tenant can have nothing to say. The Local Authority thus having obtained their feu entered on possession of the land. It does not occur to me that it can make any difference between this tenant's relation to this feuar as compared with his relation to any other feuar, that this feuar was the Local Authority. It does not signify to the tenant who the feuar is if the landlord has power to resume for the purpose of feuing. The lease provides that if land is resumed for feuing he is to be paid compensation for ground taken "at the foresaid rate." In this case "the foresaid rate" is £4 per acre, and £4 per acre has been paid to him every year since the land was taken. Thus the condition on which the landlord was entitled to resume has been fulfilled. The tenant has been paid, and till the end of his lease will be paid, all that he is entitled to under the lease. But in this year 1896 he makes a claim for £180 and interest, mainly for unexhausted manure and improvements, and the claim is made not against the landlord but against the feuar, and he wishes to have that claim settled by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act. Now, neither the County Council Act nor the Lands Clauses Act nor the Public Health Act have anything to do with the case, any more than they would have to do with a similar claim against any other feuar. There is no relation between the landlord and the tenant except the lease, nor between the landlord and the feuar except the feu-charter. There is nothing in either of these deeds about the three Acts mentioned. It was suggested in the course of the argument that it would be open to any member of the public to object to anything which was proposed to be done at variance with the statutory powers conferred upon the County Council or the Local Authority. It was not suggested that it was beyond their power to take this feu. I am very clearly of opinion that so long as the landlord observes the conditions of the lease, and the landlord and the feuar observe the conditions of the feu, there can be no claim by this tenant against anyone. But apart from that, I think there can be no doubt that if the tenant has a claim against anyone it must be against his landlord, with whom alone he has any contract. On the merits of the case, apart from the complainers' third plea, I think the case is too clear for argument.

With respect to the question whether the District Committee or the County Council itself should have been claimed against, I think it is too trifling for serious consideration. If there had been any real claim, and a mistake had been made as to the proper party to be claimed against (although I do not say that a mistake was made here), we would have aided the tenant to bring the whole County Council forward. On the whole matter, I think the suspension was well founded, the respondent's claim being ill founded.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the
Middle Ward
of Lanark v.
Marshall.

No. 24.

Nov. 10, 1896.
Laurenson v.
Police Commissioners of Lerwick.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am always disposed to put a liberal construction on clauses in general or local Acts of Parliament giving an appeal to this Court on questions of construction. Such clauses may be liberally interpreted, because it is convenient for those who are to administer the Acts that their clauses should be interpreted by the highest authority. Coming to the consideration of this prejudicial plea with a certain bias in favour of sustaining the right of appeal, and keeping in view the peculiar character of the streets of Lerwick, I agree with Lord Adam that the objections to the competency of the appeal may be repelled. I think that in the case of the burgh of Lerwick there are grounds for the contention that this is not a mere question of fact, because the streets of Lerwick are not constructed for vehicular traffic, and there is no distinction of footway and causeway. Again, it is said that the whole streets are the property of the burgh, and that this is merely a question of assessment. At the same time I do not wish to be understood to say that in any burgh where the streets are of the ordinary character, the householder, by merely saying that the pavement is not his property, can exclude the jurisdiction of the Sheriff and obtain the benefit of the appeal to this Court. That will have to be considered if the question should arise.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam for the reason he has given. I think the 339th section provides an appeal generally to various classes of persons, persons who may be "liable to pay or to contribute towards the expense of any work ordered by the Commissioners," and persons "whose property may be affected" by the order of the Commissioners, or who may "think themselves aggrieved by such order," though not called upon to pay or contribute towards the expense. Now, I assume that if the present appeal could be shewn to fall under section 143, it would be incompetent by reason of the provision that the appeal given in section 339 shall be open only if it is not otherwise specially provided in the Act. But I agree with what Lord Adam has said that the 143d section gives an appeal, not to persons who complain of an order on the ground that they may be wrongfully called upon to contribute towards the expense of its execution, but only to persons whose property may be affected by such an order, and who think themselves thereby aggrieved. Now, the appellant does not complain upon that ground. He does not allege that the footpath to be repaired is his property, nor that the repair will in any way affect the property belonging to him, and bounded by the footpath. On the other hand, the Commissioners do not allege that the footpath is the property of the complainer, but on the contrary they call upon him to contribute to the expense of a footpath bounding his property. And therefore I cannot find anything to disclose a complaint that the order in question affects the property of the appellant. I think it is a complaint upon another ground, and therefore within the 339th section.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not differ.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency of the appeal.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—IRON, ROBERTS, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE MIDDLE WARD OF THE COUNTY OF LANARK AND OTHERS, Complainers (Respondents).—Salvesen—Cook. No. 25.

JAMES MARSHALL, Respondent (Reclaimer).—C. J. Guthrie—Constable.

Nov. 10, 1896.
District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall.

Lease—Power to resume lands—Feu of lands resumed—Liability of feuair to compensate tenant—County Council—District Committee—Hospital—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 39 and 116.—By lease of a farm dated in 1886 the landlord, inter alia, reserved power “to take off such part of the lands hereby let as may be considered expedient for the purpose of feuing . . . it being hereby provided that the annual value of any ground thereby taken from the said lands shall be paid to the tenants” at the rate of £4 an acre.

In 1893 the landlord resumed five acres of the farm, and by private agreement feued the land so resumed to the County Council. Thereafter the District Committee of the County Council erected a hospital on this land under the powers of section 39 of the Public Health Act, 1867.

In 1896 the tenant, who had since the resumption been receiving from the landlord an abatement of rent equal to £4 an acre for the land resumed, served a notice on the District Committee in which he claimed compensation for unexhausted manure, &c., and, founding on section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867, took proceedings for having the amount of such compensation settled by arbitration.

In a note of suspension and interdict brought by the District Committee, held that the proceedings for arbitration fell to be interdicted in respect that the tenant's only right to compensation, if he had any, was against his landlord.

Question, whether the claim to compensation, assuming it to be otherwise well founded, had properly been made against the District Committee and not against the County Council.

Opinions that section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867, did not apply.

Title to Sue—Joint Right—Lease—Assignment pendente processu.—One of two persons who ex facie of a lease were joint tenants of a farm sent a notice of a claim to compensation to the County Council, which had taken a feu of part of the farm, the landlord having power to resume under the lease. In a suspension of proceedings for having the claim determined by arbitration the County Council pleaded, inter alia, that the claimant being only a joint tenant was not in titulo to insist in the claim. The claimant answered that he had the whole real interest in the farm, and lodged pendente processu an assignation in his favour by the other tenant setting forth that fact.

Opinions (contra the judgment of Lord Pearson) that the claimant had a good title.

By lease, dated 5th July and 26th August 1886 between Lord Hamilton of Dalzell (then Mr Hamilton of Dalzell) on the one part, and James Marshall and David Marshall, farmers at Airbles, on the other part, Lord Hamilton let “to the said James Marshall and David Marshall and their heirs, but expressly excluding assignees and subtenants, legal and voluntary, unless specially approved of by the landlord in writing, All and Whole the said farm of Airbles and others as recently tenanted by the heirs of the late John Marshall,” for the period of nineteen years, from Martinmas 1881 as to the arable land, and from Whitsunday 1882 as to the houses and grain, reserving to the proprietor the mines and minerals, with power to

2^d DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

No. 26.

Nov. 13, 1896.
Burr v. Commissioners of Bo'ness.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—He was entitled to a salary of £20. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the salary had been validly increased, unless the increase was conditional and the pursuer had assented to the condition. But there was no such condition. It was a simple increase of salary, and as it was legal the defenders had no right to reduce it. It was not necessary to intimate it to the pursuer. The transaction was complete by intimation and approval of the Board of Supervision, and the pursuer at once acquired a jus quæsitum to a salary of £20. The two resolutions of 13th August were separate and distinct, and did not stand or fall together. The pursuer's objection to Thorburn's appointment did not involve objection to the increase of salary.

Argued for the defenders ;—The alleged increase never took effect. It was part of a scheme for the reorganisation of the sanitary affairs of the burgh. It was intended that the pursuer should act as an assistant to Thorburn, with a larger salary. The two things hung or fell together. The pursuer objected to one ; he could not claim the other. The minute of meeting made no contract between the pursuer and defenders, and there was no such intimation to the pursuer as to vest in him any jus quæsitum for an increase of salary. An informal conversation was not equivalent to a communication from the defenders. Even if the resolution of the 13th August was valid, it was validly cancelled by the resolution of 10th September.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question is, whether the pursuer is entitled to £20 per annum as salary instead of the £10 per annum he formerly received. It appears that the Burgh Commissioners, who are the Public Authority did was not to reduce the inspector's salary, but to cancel a previous minute, which I think they could not have done if the previous resolution had been nothing but a resolution to increase the pursuer's salary.

"But then the resolution was not of that simple character ; for, at the same time, the Commissioners appointed Mr Thorburn to be chief sanitary inspector, and they thereby reduced the position of the pursuer to that of an assistant or subordinate. Whether they had power to do that without the consent of the Board of Supervision or Local Government Board may be open to question ; but the Board of Supervision took no exception, and by letter, dated 25th August 1894, addressed to the pursuer, the secretary of the Board of Supervision intimated that 'the Board considers the appointment of a chief sanitary inspector quite legitimate.' The additional salary, therefore, appears to have been given only on condition that the pursuer agreed to act in subordination to Mr Thorburn. It was substantially a modification of his appointment, and it appears to me that it could not be effectual without his assent. Now, it is certain that, up to the date of this action, the pursuer never admitted the position of Mr Thorburn. In his letter of 11th October, addressed to the Local Authority, he states that he holds that he is 'still the chief sanitary inspector, and entitled to be recognised as such.' Hence I consider that when the question came up for consideration on 10th September, the Local Authority was not bound by the resolution of 13th August in relation to the pursuer's salary, because the pursuer had not assented to the condition on which the addition to the salary was conceded.

"I am not considering what it would have been fair and reasonable for the Local Authority to do, but only the extent by which they are bound in law by what they have done. . . ."

No. 26.

Nov. 13, 1896.
Burr v. Commissioners of Bo'ness.

Health Local Authority of Bo'ness, passed a resolution that the pursuer was to receive a salary of £20. But this was only done as part of an arrangement which involved the appointment of a superior officer to the pursuer. The resolution came to his knowledge, but no official intimation of increase of salary was ever given to him. At the next meeting of the Commissioners the resolution was rescinded. I think this was competent, unless anything had been done giving the pursuer a jus quæsitum to enforce the increase of his salary. In my opinion nothing was done giving him such a right. I think the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the pursuer is not entitled to compel the defenders to give him a salary of £20. It is very remarkable that he himself held that the meeting of the Commissioners which granted the increase was an illegal one, his reason being that it had not been formally constituted as a meeting of the Local Authority, but even if the competency of the proceedings at the meeting be assumed, I am of opinion that the pursuer has not established his right to an increase of salary.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have come to the same result. The view which the Lord Ordinary takes is a narrower ground than that now proposed as the ground of our judgment, and I am not prepared to assent to it. I think a sufficient ground of judgment is that the resolution of the Local Authority was never intimated to the pursuer. He has therefore no jus quæsitum. I am of opinion that the defenders must be assolizied, on the ground that the pursuer never acquired any right to an increase of salary, no increase ever having been intimated to him.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree in the result arrived at. I rest my opinion on the ground that the pursuer has no jus quæsitum to enforce a rise of salary, the resolution of the Local Authority never having been intimated to him, and having been rescinded mainly in consequence of his own objections. As at present advised, I do not agree in the grounds on which the Lord Ordinary rests his judgment, but I agree in the result at which he arrives.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—WADDELL & M'INTOSH, W.S.—Agents.

MRS JESSIE MACLEAN AND OTHERS (Macleish's Trustees), Petitioners. No. 27.

—Lorimer.

Nov. 14, 1896.
Macleish's
Trustees.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Recall—Declarator that sequestration at an end—Nobile Officium.—The estates of a deceased person were sequestrated, and an abbreviate of the sequestration was recorded in the Register of Inhibitions, and an abbreviate of the trustee's confirmation recorded in the Register of Sequestrations. The estates consisted in part of a heritable property burdened with a bond and disposition in security. This property was vested in the bankrupt's testamentary trustees, and they having paid to the trustee the value of the reversion obtained a discharge of all claims at his instance. The sequestrated estates were then divided and the trustee was discharged. The testamentary trustees thereafter presented a petition to the Court praying for recall of the sequestration, or otherwise for decla-

No. 27. ~~Nov. 14, 1898~~ ~~Macleish's Trustees.~~ rator that the sequestration was at an end and the trustees reinvested in the property in question, and to appoint and grant warrant authorising the judgment to be entered in the Register of Sequestrations and in the Register of Inhibitions. The Court, holding that it was inappropriate to recall a sequestration which had run its course, granted the alternative prayer of the petition.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a petition by the testamentary trustees of John Meiklem Macleish for recall of the sequestration of Mr Macleish's estates, or otherwise for declarator that the sequestration was at an end.

The estates of Mr Macleish were, after his death, sequestrated on 13th August 1888, on the petition of the trustees of Mr John Shearer.

An abbreviate of the sequestration was recorded in the Register of Inhibitions.

Mr James Martin, accountant, Glasgow, having been appointed trustee, and duly confirmed on 3d September 1888, an abbreviate of his confirmation was recorded in the Register of Sequestrations.

The sequestrated estate consisted, in addition to certain sums due to Mr Macleish, of two heritable properties, one of which was mortgaged to Mr Shearer's trustees under a bond and disposition in security for £3500, and the other, a villa called Balfunning, was held by Mr Macleish's testamentary trustees, but was also burdened with a bond for £1100. Mr Shearer's trustees entered into possession of the property over which they held a bond.

The trustee in the sequestration, having realised the rest of the sequestrated estate, entered into a compromise with the bankrupt's testamentary trustees by which they, in 1889, paid to him £200, which represented the value of the reversion of the Balfunning property, in full of all claims against them, and the heirs and representatives of the bankrupt.

The only creditors who claimed in the sequestration were Mr Shearer's trustees. They were ranked for £914, and after meeting the expenses of the sequestration the trustee paid over to them in dividend the balance of the estate, amounting to £226.

Thereafter, on 6th September 1889, the trustee was discharged.

Mr Macleish's testamentary trustees subsequently sold the Balfunning property, and requiring, in order to give the purchaser a good title, to clear the record, they presented this petition stating the foregoing facts, and praying the Court, after service on Mr Martin and publication in the Gazette, "to pronounce judgment recalling the sequestration of the estates of the said deceased John Meiklem Macleish, or otherwise to declare the said sequestration at an end, [and the petitioners reinvested in the said villa of Balfunning, Helensburgh, described in the titles as follows . . .], and to appoint and grant warrant authorising such judgment to be entered in the Register of Sequestrations and on the margin of the Register of Inhibitions."

The petition was presented with the consent, "so far as he can do so," of Mr Hutton, C.A., Glasgow, judicial factor on Mr Shearer's estate, the trustees having resigned office.

At the hearing the petitioners were allowed to amend the prayer of the petition by the addition of the words given within brackets, supra.¹

¹ The petitioners referred to Anderson, March 13, 1866, 4 Macph. 577, 38 Scot. Jur. 304.

THE COURT expressed the view that, as the sequestration had run its full course, a judgment recalling the sequestration was inappropriate, and pronounced this interlocutor:—"Declare the sequestration of the estates of the deceased John Meiklem Macleish, designed in the petition, awarded by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills on 13th August 1888, at an end, and the petitioners, the trustees of the said John Meiklem Macleish, re-invested in the subjects described in the prayer of the petition: Grant warrant for recording this deliverance in the Register of Sequestrations and in the Register of Inhibitions, and decern."

No. 27.

Nov. 14, 1896.
Macleish's
Trustees.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S., Agents.

ANDREW GEMMELL (Cuming's Marriage-Contract Trustee), Pursuer and Real Raiser (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Grainger Stewart.
MRS MARY CUMING AND OTHERS, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Johnston T. B. Morison.

No. 28.

Nov. 14, 1896.
Cuming's
Trustees v.
Cuming.

GEORGE RONALDSON CUMING OLDEN, Claimant (Respondent).—D. Dundas—W. E. Mackintosh.

Marriage-contract—Vesting—Vesting of provision to children—Clause of survivorship—Power of appointment—Acceleration of vesting by deed of appointment.—By antenuptial marriage-contract an intended wife assigned the whole estate then belonging to her, or which she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, to trustees for the purposes after specified, viz., for payment of the interest or proceeds of the estate to the spouses and the survivor, "and after the death of the longest liver" of the spouses the trustees "shall be bound to denude of the said trust, and pay over or convey the said trust-estate . . . to the child or children of this intended marriage in such shares or proportions, if more than one child, as may be appointed by" the spouses "or the survivor of them, by any writing under their hands; and failing such writing, then the said trustees shall be bound to pay or convey the same to the said children equally, and to the issue of such child or children as may have predeceased." In case of there being no children of the marriage, or if children, in case of their predeceasing their parents, the trustees were directed to pay over or convey the estate to the wife, her heirs and assignees whomsoever.

The wife survived her husband, and executed a deed appointing two daughters of the marriage to the fund. The daughters and their mother then called upon the trustees to denude.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson) that the persons entitled under the marriage-contract to the fee of the estate conveyed by the wife, in the event of the power of appointment not being exercised, were the children alive at the death of the longest liver of the spouses, and the issue of such as might have predeceased that date; that these persons were the sole objects of the power of appointment; and therefore that the trustee under the marriage-contract was bound to hold the estate conveyed by the wife until her death.

By antenuptial contract of marriage entered into in June 1845 by George Ronaldson Cuming and Mary Skirving, the latter assigned to the trustees named in the deed "all sums and other estate, heritable and moveable, now belonging to her, or to which she may acquire right by succession, bequest, or in any other manner, during the subsistence of the intended marriage, for the purposes after specified, videlicet, for payment of the interest or other yearly profits or proceeds of the sums and other estate hereinbefore conveyed to them in trust to the said Mary Skirving and George Ronaldson Cuming during 1st Division.

Lord Pearson.

No. 28. their joint lives, and on the death of either to the survivor of them, and after the death of the longest liver of the said Mary Skirving and George Ronaldson Cuming, the said trustees shall be bound to denude of the said trust and pay over or convey the said trust-estate, with any interest or other profits thereof remaining in their hands unapplied, to the child or children of this intended marriage in such shares or proportions, if more than one child, as may be appointed by the said Mary Skirving and George Ronaldson Cuming or the survivor of them, by any writing under their hands; and failing such writing, then the said trustees shall be bound to pay or convey the same to the said children equally and to the issue of such child or children as may have predeceased, such issue having only the share to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life, and in case of no children of the marriage, or if children, in case of their predeceasing their parents, then and in either of these events the said trustees shall be bound to pay over or convey the said trust-estate to the said Mary Skirving, her heirs and assignees whomsoever."

Nov. 14, 1896.
Cuming's
Trustees v.
Cuming.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mr Cuming in January 1890. He was survived by two daughters, Mrs White and Miss Cuming, and by a grandson, George Olden, the son of a predeceasing daughter. There were other children of the marriage, who predeceased their father.

On the 18th of January 1895 Mrs Cuming executed a deed of appointment, which bore to be in virtue of powers to that effect conferred by the marriage-contract, and by which she appointed to her daughters, Mrs White and Miss Cuming, equally between them, the whole sums or others settled by the said contract on the children of the marriage.

In virtue of this deed of appointment Mrs Cuming, Mrs White, and Miss Cuming, called upon Andrew Gemmell, the sole surviving trustee under Mr and Mrs Cuming's marriage-contract, to denude of the trust, and hand the trust-estate over to them, whereupon Andrew Gemmell raised an action of multiplepinding for the determination of the rights of parties to, inter alia, the whole estate which belonged to Mrs Cuming at the date of the marriage, or had been acquired by her during its subsistence.

Claims were lodged by (1) the trustee under the marriage-contract; (2) George Olden; and (3) Mrs Cuming, Mrs White, and Miss Cuming.

The trustee claimed to be preferred to the whole fund in order that he might administer it in terms of the contract.

George Olden claimed that the estate settled by Mrs Cuming should remain in the hands of the trustee until the death of Mrs Cuming.

Mrs Cuming, Mrs White, and Miss Cuming claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund.

On 2d June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) repelled the claim of Mrs Cuming and others, and quoad ultra ranked and preferred the claimant Andrew Gemmell as trustee foresaid, in terms of his claim.*

* "OPINION.—. . . In my opinion the settlement of the wife's estate, which follows, presents a case of suspended vesting. After the death of the surviving spouse the trustees are to denude and to pay and convey the estate

No. 28.

The claimants Mrs Cuming and others reclaimed, and argued ;— The usual rule in the case of marriage-contract provisions to children was that they vested at the dissolution of the marriage,¹ and there was nothing in the destination of the wife's estate to make that rule inapplicable. If the rule applied, then the widow and surviving daughters together, having the whole interest in the liferent and fee of the provisions, were entitled to immediate payment. But even if vesting would not have taken place under the marriage-contract, in the event of no deed of appointment having been executed until the death of the longest liver of the spouses, that was not the case now that a deed of appointment had been executed, and the deed was within the power of appointment conferred by the marriage-contract. The clause of survivorship in the marriage-contract did not apply to the event of the power of appointment being exercised, and accordingly the power of appointment was not limited to the survivors of the children. Further, a power of appointment must be held to include the power of anticipating the period of vesting applicable to the event of its not being exercised, just as it included the power of selecting among the objects of the power. On either ground these claimants were entitled to prevail.

Nov. 14, 1896.
Cuming's
Trustee v.
Cuming.

Argued for the claimants, Andrew Gemmell and George Olden ;— (1) There was no gift to children other than the direction to convey, and that direction did not take effect until the death of the widow, who had the liferent of the fund. (2) There was a clause of survivorship referable to the period of division. (3) The power of appointment could be exercised by the survivor of the spouses. Vesting was therefore postponed until the death of the widow.² The period of vesting fixed by the contract could not be accelerated by any exercise of the power of appointment, for (a) the objects of the power were the survivors at the period of distribution, and (b) a power of appointment could not be used to accelerate the vesting of provisions to which it related—at least there was no authority for holding that it could, and the opposite view had been assumed to be the sound one in Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn.² The fund must therefore be retained and administered by the trustee until the death of the widow.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—With reference to the fund brought into settlement by Mrs Cuming, the trustees are directed to pay the income of it to the spouses and to the survivor, and after the death of the survivor to pay over the trust-estate to the child or children of the marriage, in such shares or proportions, if more than one child, as may be appointed by the spouses, or to the children, and the issue of such as may have predeceased. These words are, I think, all referable to the period prescribed for denuding and payment, and their effect does not appear to me to be taken off by the words that follow, which are applicable to two events which have not happened. . . .

¹ Romanes v. Riddell, Jan. 13, 1865, 3 Macph. 348, 37 Scot. Jur. 167 ; Rogerson's Trustees v. Rogersons, March 10, 1865, 3 Macph. 684, 37 Scot. Jur. 343.

² Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn, March 20, 1896, 23 R. 698 ; Laing v. Barclay, July 20, 1865, 3 Macph. 1143, 38 Scot. Jur. 95 ; Vines v. Hillou, July 13, 1860, 22 D. 1136, 32 Scot. Jur. 666 ; Muirhead v. Muirhead, May 12, 1890, 17 R. (H. L.) 45, per Lord Watson, p. 49 ; Fyfe's Trustees v. Fyfe, Feb. 8, 1890, 17 R. 450.

No. 28.

Nov. 14, 1896.
Cuming's
Trustee v.
Cuming.

the survivor of them, by any writing under their hands, and failing such writing to pay the same to such children equally, and to the issue of such children as may have predeceased, such issue having only the share to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life, and then there is a gift over, failing children, to Mrs Cuming, her heirs and assignees.

It appears to me that the objects of the power of appointment here specified are the children alive at the period of payment,—that is, the death of the longest liver of the spouses,—and the issue of such of the children as may have predeceased that period. Until that period shall arrive it is impossible to say who will be entitled to take, or among whom the appointment would have to be made. For example, neither of the daughters, the appointees under the present deed of appointment, may be alive and entitled to share at that period, and the deed can confer no present right upon them. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary that this portion of the fund must remain under the administration of the trustee.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DALGLEISH & DOBBIE, W.S.—P. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1896.
Burnet v.
Gow.

THOMAS KYLE BURNET, Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—T. B. Morison.
GEORGE GOW, Defender (Reclaimer).—M'Lennan—F. J. Thomson.

Reparation—Slander—Veritas—Counter Issue.—The pursuer in an action of damages for slander obtained an issue whether at a certain time and place "the defender falsely and calumniously said to . . . that the pursuer was a man of immoral character, and kept a mistress. . . ." The defender on record pleaded veritas, and averred that "the pursuer is a man of immoral character, and during the last two years has associated and has committed adultery with" A, but he only averred two occasions prior to the date of the alleged slander on which adultery had been committed.

Held that the defender's averments did not entitle him to the counter issue "whether, during the period of two years prior to the raising of the action, the pursuer has repeatedly committed adultery with" A.

Opinion (per Lord Kincairney) that the defender in an action of damages for slander may obtain a counter issue of veritas although he denies having uttered the slander complained of.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

THIS was an action of damages for slander at the instance of Thomas Kyle Burnet, commercial traveller, Ealing, against George Gow, Scotch tweed-merchant in London and Galashiels.

The pursuer averred (cond. 2) that, "in or about the latter half of July 1895," the defender falsely, maliciously, and calumniously stated to certain parties named at places specified "that the pursuer (who is married and has a family of seven children) was a man of immoral character, that he kept a mistress; that he had on one occasion . . . lived a fortnight with this mistress, pretending to his wife that he was out of town. . . ." (Ans. 2) "Admitted that the pursuer's name was referred to, and his conduct commented on, in conversation with the parties named. Quoad ultra denied."

The defender, in answer 4, averred,—“The pursuer has not sus-

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1896.
Burnet v.
Gow.

tained any loss, injury, or damage for which the defender is responsible. The pursuer is a man of immoral character, and during the last two years has associated, and has committed adultery with a young woman named Miss A B, sometime residing at . . . The said woman repeatedly called for the pursuer at the business premises of George Gow, Son, & Company. On several of these occasions the pursuer went away with her, and on returning after an absence of an hour or more, informed Arthur Gibson, warehouseman in the employment of said firm, that he had had sexual intercourse with said woman. On one such occasion he also gave the same information to Archibald M'Lellan, cashier to said firm. The pursuer further committed adultery with said woman in a temperance hotel at Paddington Railway Station, London, in or about the month of March 1895, at the Stork Hotel, Birmingham, in or about the said month of March 1895, and at a hotel at Teignmouth, in or about the month of August 1895. He also committed adultery with her at his office at 14 Golden Square, London, in or about the month of April 1896, and on other occasions. Further, he has committed adultery with her in various other places and at other dates to the defender unknown."

The defender pleaded veritas.

The pursuer proposed two issues, of which the following may be taken as an example:—"1. Whether, in or about the latter half of July 1895, the defender falsely and calumniously said to Thomas Haig, one of the partners of Messrs Bertram & Haig, clothiers, within their shop at No. 12 Maitland Street, Edinburgh, that the pursuer was a man of immoral character, that he kept a mistress, that he had on one occasion, while in the employment of the defender or his firm, lived for some time with this mistress, pretending to his wife that he was out of town, or did use and utter words of the like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?"

The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"Whether, during the period of two years prior to the raising of the action, the pursuer has repeatedly committed adultery with A B?"

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved of the issues for the pursuer, and disallowed the counter issue proposed for the defender.*

* "OPINION.—There is no question in this case about the pursuer's issue. But the pursuer maintains that no counter issue of veritas ought to be allowed, because the defender denies on record that he uttered the slander averred. The pursuer maintains that the defender cannot both deny the slander and justify it. I am indeed of opinion that here no issue of veritas should be allowed, but not on that ground. As at present advised, I see no objection to such pleading. It is not inconsistent to say, I never said the words alleged, but, at anyrate, they are true; and a defender may have a legitimate interest in so providing for the possible event of the jury being of opinion, contrary to his own assertion, that he did utter the slander. I think there is no sufficient authority for the pursuer's contention. In the rubric of Harkes v. Mouat, 4th March 1862, 24 D. 701, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglist) is said to have observed,—'That in an action of damages for slander a defender cannot obtain an issue in justification without admitting the libel as alleged by the pursuer.' But, as I read the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, he says nothing of the sort. What he does say is, that an issue of justification must proceed on the assumption that the defender not only used the words alleged but used them in the sense innuendoe. But that is quite different from the rubric, which appears to be entirely

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1896.
Burnet v.
Gow.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The defender's averment was quite specific enough to entitle him to the counter issue which he proposed. He averred in the first place that the pursuer was of immoral character, and had during the last two years associated and committed adultery with a person named, and to this general charge was added a sufficient statement of particular instances in which adultery was said to have been committed. The case was distinguished from Milne v. Walker,¹ because the mere statement that a man had committed adultery was a grave slander, while the charge in *Milne's*¹ case was not of that character. In similar cases counter issues had been allowed on averments no stronger than those made in this case.² At anyrate the averments were sufficient to justify a counter issue to part of the slander alleged by the pursuer, namely, that he was of immoral character, and a counter issue to that effect should be allowed.³

unauthorised. In Fraser v. Wilson, 18th Dec. 1850, 13 D. 289, also referred to by the pursuer it was held that a defender could not be allowed an issue of privilege, if he denied the use of the words libelled, and did not give the words used. But that is obviously a different matter. On the other hand, in Mason v. Tait, 10th May 1851, 13 D. 1347, an issue in justification was allowed, although the defender denied the acts of defamation libelled. As at present advised, I should not have disallowed the counter issue, if there had been no other reasons against it except the defender's denial that he had uttered the slander. In my opinion, however, the counter issue falls to be disallowed, because the record does not afford materials for an issue of veritas. The charge made is that the defender said of the pursuer that he was a man of immoral character, and that being a married man he kept a mistress. The defender seeks to justify this assertion, supposing it made, by alleging two acts of adultery,—and two only,—before the date of the alleged libel. But it appears to me that proof of these two acts would not justify the general accusation said to have been made; and that the counter issue, limited by the record, falls short of the pursuer's issue to a material extent.—See Milne v. Walker, 24th November 1893, 21 R. 155. Our practice does not allow a counter issue, which may tend to palliate, but does not justify the slander. On the record averments are made of acts of adultery after the date of the slander. But these could not justify it. Then there is an averment that the pursuer himself had said that on certain occasions he had had sexual intercourse with a woman mentioned. But then the defender would not aver (I hardly know why)—the point was pressed on his notice—that on these occasions sexual intercourse actually took place. If he had made that averment the case might have been different. As it is, the averment has no bearing whatever on the issue of veritas, and must be held wholly irrelevant. I do not object to the general terms in which the proposed counter issue is couched. That appears to be quite right, and to follow the recent case of Hunter v. Macnaughton, 5th June 1894, 21 R. 850. But I think the instances averred on record are too few to justify the general issue. The defender maintained that he could attack the pursuer's character at the trial without a counter issue. That point does not arise at present, and I express no opinion about it."

¹ Milne v. Walker, Nov. 24, 1893, 21 R. 155.

² Carmichael v. Cowan, Dec. 19, 1862, 1 Macph. 204, 35 Scot. Jur. 95; Mason v. Tait, July 10, 1851, 13 D. 1347, 23 Scot. Jur. 670; M'Ivor v. McNeill, June 28, 1873, 11 Macph. 777, 45 Scot. Jur. 510; McLeod v. Marshall, March 20, 1891, 18 R. 811.

³ McNeill v. Rorison, Nov. 12, 1847, 10 D. 15, at pp. 25-26, 19 Scot. Jur. 662; Paul v. Jackson, Jan. 23, 1884, 11 R. 460, at p. 468.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender made no sufficient averment of systematic immorality against the pursuer prior to the date of the alleged slander to justify his counter issue.¹ The instances of alleged adultery subsequent to that date were quite irrelevant. There was no authority for allowing a counter issue to part of a case.

No. 29.

Nov. 19, 1896.
Burnet v.
Gow.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I must own that this record is in a very unsatisfactory position, and I regret, in the reasonable interests of this defender, that we should have to dispose of the case on the present footing. But the question before us is, whether the Lord Ordinary has done right with this record in refusing the counter issue, and I am sorry to say that I think he has. I am astonished, I must say, that after repeated suggestions the counsel for the defender have deemed it necessary to adhere to their existing record. If the defender had said that the pursuer kept the lady mentioned in answer 4 as his mistress, and if he had relevantly averred four instances instead of only averring two, while in the plainest terms insinuating two more, then there might have been a very good reason for giving a counter issue, either in the frank language used, whether he kept this woman as his mistress, or "whether he repeatedly committed adultery with her," which would probably do. But, obliged as I am by the action of the defender to consider this counter issue on this record, I think the Lord Ordinary right.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think the averments in the fourth answer would have entitled the defender to a counter issue if the answer had been amended in the manner suggested by your Lordship. It contains the elements of a relevant averment, though wanting in precision of statement. But, seeing that the defender declines to state his case more precisely, I think that we should disallow the counter issue, because, as I read the record, the defender's averment is nothing more than that on two occasions the pursuer had been guilty of sexual immorality, which is not a counter case to the charge as averred by the pursuer.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that a slight alteration of the record would have made the averment in answer 4 perfectly relevant to support the counter issue. The defender was perfectly right not to make that alteration if he was conscious, as we must assume he was, that he could not bring the case up so far as to justify an averment which would have entitled him to a counter issue. That being so, we must dispose of the case on that footing, and I agree that we should not allow the counter issue.

THE COURT adhered.

KIRK MACKIE & ELLIOT, S.S.C.—WILLIAM GUNN, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ Milne v. Walker, Nov. 24, 1893, 21 R. 155; Fletcher v. Wilsons, Feb. 21, 1885, 12 R. 683.

No. 30. THE GLASGOW, YOKER, AND CLYDEBANK RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D. Dundas—Grierson.

Nov. 20, 1896. ALEXANDER DUNN MACINDOE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).
Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co.
—Jameson—C. J. Guthrie.

COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE OF CLYDEBANK.

Burgh—Natural Water-course—"Sewer"—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), sec. 215.—Section 215 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, enacts,—“All sewers and drains within the burgh, whether existing at the time when this Act comes into force or made at any time thereafter (except private branch drains . . .), shall vest in and belong to, and be entirely under the management and control of, the commissioners.”

A railway company which, under compulsory powers, had taken a piece of ground in a burgh, brought an action against the proprietor and the Police Commissioners for declarator that a burn which passed through the land was a sewer vested in the Police Commissioners, and that the company was not bound to pay compensation for it. The proprietor alone lodged defences.

It was proved that the burn was to some extent polluted by sewage from properties outside the burgh, but that no sewage from the burgh entered it above the point where the burn left the land taken.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the burn was not a “sewer” in the sense of section 215 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, and that the defender was entitled to compensation for it.

Question, whether section 215 applied only to sewers and drains which were opera manufacta.

1st DIVISION. IN 1894 the Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Company and Ld. Kyllachy. Alexander Dunn Macindoe and others, pro indiviso proprietors of the estate of Duntocher, in the parish of Old Kirkpatrick, Dumbartonshire, proceeded to arbitration in order to fix the compensation to be paid to the latter for certain portions of their estate which the former had given notice they were to take for the purposes of their undertaking.

On 5th April 1895 the oversman appointed by the parties fixed the “compensation at the sum of £3439, 11s. 1½d., should it be found that the burn or water-course intersecting lot 22A of the lands on the plan No. 8 of process was not a sewer or drain vested in the Commissioners of the burgh of Clydebank, in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892; * or alternatively, the sum of £2989, 11s. 1½d., should it be found that the said burn or water-course was a sewer or drain vested in the said Commissioners of Police, in terms of the said Burgh Police Act.”

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), sec. 215, enacted,—“All sewers and drains within the burgh, whether existing at the time when this Act comes into force or made at any time thereafter (except private branch drains, drains made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land, and sewers made under any local or private Act of Parliament), shall vest in and belong to, and be entirely under the management and control of, the commissioners.”

Sec. 217.—“Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise the commissioners, contrary to any private right, to use, injure, or interfere with any sewers or other works already made or used for the purpose of draining . . . land under any local or private Act of Parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating lands, or to use, injure, or interfere with any water-course, stream, river . . . in which the owner or occupier of any lands . . . shall have right and interest, without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same.”

On 17th June 1895 the railway company raised this action against the proprietors of the estate of Duntocher for declarator (1) "that the burn or water-course, which is known as the Boquhanran Burn, intersecting lot 22A of the lands" on the plans lodged in the reference "is a sewer or drain vested in the Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Clydebank in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892; and (2) that the pursuers are bound and obliged to pay to the defenders the sum of £2989, 11s. 1½d. sterling, and no more . . . as compensation for the lands purchased by the pursuers."

No. 30.

Nov. 20, 1896.
Glasgow,
Yoker, and
Clydebank
Railway Co.
v. Macindoe.

The pursuers averred;—"The said burn or water-course intersecting lot 22A was a sewer or drain at the date of the pursuers' notice to take, and also when the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, came into force. It has been used for purposes of sewage and drainage continuously, exclusively, and increasingly during a long period of years by owners and occupiers both within and outside the burgh of Clydebank, and the defenders and their predecessors have acquiesced therein all along." "The said burn or water-course was, at the date when this Act came into force, and now is, a sewer or drain in the sense and meaning of the statute, and is by operation thereof now vested in and belongs to the Commissioners of the burgh of Clydebank, within which burgh it flows, at least in its course of intersection of the field before mentioned."

The defenders answered;—"Admitted that the burn where it enters lot 22A contains some sewage from properties through which it runs, extending to about 405 acres, and containing a population of about 1000 or 1500. Explained that these properties are all outside the burgh of Clydebank. No rights have been granted to any proprietors of subjects within the burgh to lead sewage from said subjects into the said burn until below the point where it leaves lot 22A. . . . The burgh of Clydebank has a material interest in the question raised by the pursuers. It has not been called in this process."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The burn or water-course in question having been, at the date of the pursuers' notice to take, a sewer or drain within the meaning of the Burgh or Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and having been as such vested in the Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Clydebank, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (2) The said burn or water-course being a sewer or drain as aforesaid, and the pursuers having tendered payment to the defenders of the sum of £2989, 11s. 1½d., with interest thereon at 5 per cent from 1st July 1894 till 13th April 1895, being the date of said tender, they are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the second conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (2) The burn or water-course intersecting lot 22A on the said plan not having been, at the date of the pursuers' notice to take, a sewer or drain vested in the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Clydebank, in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The case having been sisted in order to give the pursuers an opportunity of calling the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Clydebank for their interest, a supplementary action was raised by the pursuers against them for declarator in terms of the first conclusion of the leading action.

The Police Commissioners did not appear.

No. 30. On 22d January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) conjoined the actions and allowed a proof.

Nov. 20, 1896.
Glasgow,
Yoker, and
Clydebank
Railway Co.
v. Macindoe.

No appearance was made for the Police Commissioners of Clydebank.

The import of the proof is thus given by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion appended to his interlocutor of 10th July:—"The burn in question is, in its physical character, beyond all question a natural water-course. It is simply an ordinary Scotch burn, which rises at the foot of Duntocher, some three miles from the place in question, and flows thence through a comparatively open country till it joins the Clyde within the burgh of Clydebank. Moreover, up till about fifteen years ago, it was a practically pure stream—not perhaps fit for human use, but quite fit for watering cattle and similar purposes. Within recent years, however, it has undoubtedly become polluted by sewage, which has been permitted to pass into its course, and although open and in its natural state in and above the defenders' property, it is after it leaves the defenders' property, and for some distance before it reaches the Clyde, enclosed, at least in part, in a built drain or culvert."

It was further proved that the works of Messrs Somervail & Company, situated within the burgh of Clydebank, were drained into the burn, but wholly by sufferance of the defenders, the proprietors of Duntocher.

On 10th July the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is a very short one. It is simply this, whether the burn known as the Boquhanran Burn is, where it passes through the defenders' property, a sewer or drain in the sense of the 215th section of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. If it is, the property of the burn at the place in question is vested in the Commissioners of Police of Clydebank, and the defenders are not entitled to compensation in respect of their property or interest in it. If it is not, there is no suggestion that it belongs to the Commissioners under any previous or other title, and accordingly in that case it is not disputed that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (His Lordship here stated the import of the proof as given supra.)

"The proposition of the pursuers therefore is, and must be, that wherever within the bounds of a burgh there exists a burn or water-course materially polluted by sewage, that burn or water-course is by the Burgh Police Act of 1892 vested in the burgh authorities. Now, I must say this strikes one at first glance as rather a startling proposition. But the pursuers say that such is the result of the Act, and particularly of the 215th section, which is quoted on record.

"I do not think I need say more than that, having read the section in question, and relative sections of the Act, as carefully as I could, I am unable to accept the suggested construction. On the contrary, it appears to me that reading the 215th section by itself, and also in connection with the rest of the Act, there are two things which are fairly clear. The one is that what is meant in section 215 by a sewer or drain is an opus manufactum. That, I think, is clear upon the language of the 215th section. The other is, that the Act throughout this part of it carefully distinguishes between sewers—that is, made or built drains—on the one hand, and natural water-courses, polluted or unpolluted, on the other. I refer specially to the sections of the Act which were all, I think, mentioned at the discussion—sections 217, 219, 221, 222, 227, 228, 229, 230, and 234. And, as I have said, having regard to the terms of those sections and of section 215, I consider that the pursuers' claim is not well founded, and that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor."

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—By section 215 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, all sewers and drains within burgh, with the exception of private branch drains, were vested in the Commissioners. It was illegitimate to read the expression “made” in the section, as the Lord Ordinary had done, as meaning “constructed.” The word really applied to a stream which had “become” a sewer or drain. A natural water-course might be a sewer.¹ This was supported by a perusal of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 55), for section 4 (the interpretation clause) defined “sewer” as including sewers and drains of every description except private branch drains, and section 18 empowered the local authority “to cover in or otherwise improve any sewer belonging to them,” and, moreover, there was an absence of any expression like “constructed” drain.² It was proved that this stream had been polluted by sewage, and it made no difference that the sewage entered it from outside the burgh.³ Lastly, it was to be noted that while in the Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), any sewer (sec. 182) within private property was exempted from the control of the Commissioners, in the Burgh Police Act of 1892 there was no exemption except private branch drains used to drain a dwelling-house.

Argued for the defenders ;—The Act of 1875 was sharply distinguished from the later Act of 1892. The former contained a definition clause of “sewer,” and the sections of the latter referred to by the Lord Ordinary indicated that the Act meant to distinguish between natural water-courses and made or built drains. In short, it was clear that the 215th section dealt alone with opera manufacta, and could therefore have no application to this natural water-course. Nothing could be vested in the Commissioners under the section which was not administered by them, and they had never exercised any administration over the burn. But, further, there was in point of fact no burgh sewage falling into the burn, and even if there had been, that would not make the burn a sewer vested as such in the Commissioners.⁴

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The general facts about this water-course are concisely stated in the second paragraph of the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, and I think that his Lordship has also accurately stated the controversy when he says : “The proposition of the pursuers therefore is, and must be, that wherever within the bounds of a burgh there exists a burn or water-course materially polluted by sewage, that burn or water-course is, by the Burgh Police Act of 1892, vested in the burgh authorities.”

Now, in considering this proposition, it is well to bear in mind what are the use and object of such vesting clauses as the one which is before us.

¹ Magistrates of Portobello v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Nov. 9, 1882, 10 R. 130.

² Wheatcroft v. Local Board of Matlock, 1885, 52 L. T. (N.S.) 356; Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board of Health, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 63; Travis v. Uttley, 1893, L. R., 1 Q. B. 233; Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 224.

³ Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 234.

⁴ Attorney-General v. Hackney Local Board, 1875, L. R., 20 Eq. 626; Attorney-General v. The Luton Local Board of Health, 1848, The Jurist, Vol. II., Part I., p. 180.

No. 30.

Nov. 20, 1896.
Glasgow,
Yoker, and
Clydebank
Railway Co.
v. Macindoe.

They properly apply to things, be it roads or drains, which de facto are administered by the Commissioners under the executive clauses of the Act, and they are intended to give so much of a title as is necessary to get over any legal difficulties in the way of the Commissioners effectuating their statutory duties. Accordingly, to shew that by way of vituperation of its impurity this burn may be characterised as a sewer is not to the purpose. The Act does not try to put down nuisances by vesting their locus in the burgh authorities, and the sewers vested are authorised sewers provided or adopted by the burgh as the conduits of such sewage as the burgh has a duty to dispose of.

But this burn in no sense acts as a burgh sewer. Only one house within the burgh drained into the burn, and when this use was challenged by the proprietor of the burn it ceased. Not only does the burn not in fact act as part of, or in the service of, the burgh's sewage system, but, apart from this vesting clause, the burgh cannot pretend to any right to put their sewage into the burn invito domino. So far as the burgh is concerned, and apart from this vesting clause, the defenders might, by arrangement with the upper proprietors, purify this burn so that there should be no sewage carried by it at all. Now, it surely can never be held that this vesting clause was intended to deprive the defenders of any of their rights in this stream in order to support a non-existing administration of it by the Commissioners.

For these reasons I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. There is one part of his Lordship's opinion as to which I desire to express a reservation. I am not prepared to lay it down that the 215th section only applies to sewers and drains which are opera manufacta. It is quite true that a whole series of sections may be pointed to which can only apply to opera manufacta. But this may be because an artificial construction is much the most ordinary form of sewer or drain; and as the words "sewers and drains" do not in themselves exclude a wider construction, I prefer to rest my judgment on the other considerations advanced, leaving open the question whether the vesting clause may not cover some material water-courses which, in fact and lawfully, serve the sole purpose of conveying burgh sewage.

LORD ADAM.—(After citing section 217 of the Act, his Lordship proceeded)—It is clear, therefore, that there may be water-courses or streams within the burgh which do not vest in the Commissioners as drains or sewers, and with which they have no right to interfere.

The question therefore is, whether or not this Boquhanran Burn is, in fact, a water-course or stream of that description.

Now it appears from the evidence that this burn has a course of some three or four miles before it enters the burgh, and that when it enters the burgh it runs in its natural channel through the private property of the defenders. It forms no part of any drainage or sewage system of the burgh, and, in point of fact, while it flows through the defenders' property, it receives no sewage whatever from any house in the burgh, except by a private drain from Somervail's works, which are situated on the defenders' property, and which they can stop at any moment.

It seems to me to be clear that this is a water-course or stream in which the defenders have a right and interest, and that therefore the Commissioners have no right to use or interfere with it without the defenders' consent, or, in other words, that it is not vested in them.

Now it will be observed that the Commissioners do not themselves maintain that this stream is vested in them as a sewer or drain. The claim is made by a railway company who have interfered with it, and the ground of their claim is that where it enters the burgh it is more or less contaminated with sewage, and therefore is a drain or sewer in the sense of the Act.

It is true that the burn is so contaminated—to a considerable extent when the water in it is low—to an inappreciable extent when it is high.

But I fail to see how that displaces the fact that the burn is a stream in which the defenders have a right and interest. If the sewage in it should at any time become a nuisance to the burgh, the Commissioners have their remedy and can put a stop to it.

I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and should be affirmed.

I observe, however, that he is of opinion that this stream or water-course does not fall within the 215th section of the Act, because it is not an opus manufactum.

I think that the grounds which I have indicated above are sufficient for the judgment in this case, and I have not found it necessary to form an opinion as to whether his Lordship's views in this respect are sound or not.

LORD M'LAREN.—I consider that this is a case of the construction of an Act of Parliament expressed in ordinary language. There is no need of any interpretation clause, because Parliament has considered that the Courts of law are quite capable of distinguishing between a sewer and a running stream. Casuists may suggest that there is some resemblance between the two when a stream becomes polluted, but they are essentially distinct, and I agree with your Lordship that a sewer must be a thing either constructed for the purpose of removing waste matter, or appropriated to that purpose in some way. It is not at all likely that there should be found existing a natural channel in all respects suitable for the purpose of a sewer. When one comes to consider too curiously the effect of pollution, there is hardly anything in nature not more or less polluted, but the mere fact that a stream is polluted will never entitle it to be treated in a question of property or administration as in any way identical with a sewer.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—MACNOCHIE & HARE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 30.

Nov. 20, 1896.
Glasgow,
Yoker, and
Clydebank
Railway Co.
v. Macindoe.

MRS ISABELLA RAE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Salvesen—P. J. Blair.
ALEXANDER MILNE & SONS, Defenders (Appellants).—Jameson— Constable.

No. 31.

Nov. 20, 1896.
Rae v. Milne
& Sons.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Workman killed by fall of wall—
Negligence—Relevancy.—A mason having been killed by the fall of a

No. 31.
 Nov. 20, 1896.
 Rae v. Milne
 & Sons.

wall which he was employed in building, his widow brought an action of damages at common law against his employers, the contractors for the mason work of the building, and averred that his death was due to the fault of the defenders, because—1. The wall was of weak and defective construction in respect (1) that the lime used contained an undue quantity of sand, and was insufficiently worked; and (2) that no proper “header” or binding stones were used in building it. 2. The defenders recklessly hurried on the building in spite of wet and unsuitable weather, and did not allow one course to be sufficiently dry before another was put on, with the result that the wall was in a very soft and raw condition. 3. While the wall was in this state, the defenders also, contrary to established custom, allowed the contractor for the carpenter work to drive “dooks” into the wall, with the result that the mason work was shaken and weakened.

Held that no fault was relevantly averred against the defenders.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Aberdeen,
 Kincardine,
 and Banff.

MRS ISABELLA DONALD OR RAE raised this action at common law, in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen, against Alexander Milne & Sons, builders and contractors, concluding for £500 as damages for the death of her husband, George Rae, who, at the date of his death, was in the employment of the defenders.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 2) “On the 19th day of December 1895, the said George Rae was, in the ordinary course of his employment under the defenders, engaged in building the southmost gable of a house in Hosefield Road, Aberdeen, for the mason work of which the defenders were contractors, when suddenly, without warning, the part of said gable on which he was working gave way, and he was precipitated to the ground, a distance of 33 feet or thereby, and was killed.” (Cond. 3) “The said wall was of weak and defective construction in respect (1) that the lime used contained an undue quantity of sand, was insufficiently worked, and was otherwise of insufficient quality, and much inferior to what is necessary for stability and customary to use in the building of walls of the description of that in question; and (2) that no proper ‘header’ or binding stones were used in the building of said wall by the defenders, the stones used being insufficient in size, and otherwise unsuitable for that purpose.” (Cond. 4) “During the time the said wall was being built, the weather was damp and rainy, and was very unsuitable for building operations. Notwithstanding this, the defenders, especially looking to the construction of the building and the insufficient quality of the materials used, unduly and recklessly hurried on the erection of the wall, and did not allow one course to be sufficiently dry before another was put on, with the result that the wall was in a very soft and raw condition. On the said 19th day of December 1895, while the wall was in this state, defenders, also contrary to established custom, suffered or permitted the contractor for the carpenter work of said house to drive dooks into the said wall, with the result that the mason work was thereby shaken and weakened.” (Cond. 5) “The defenders were guilty of gross fault and culpable negligence (1) in building the said wall of insufficient materials; (2) in hurrying on the work during wet weather; and (3) in permitting the dooking to be done as aforesaid. The said wall collapsed in consequence of all, or one or other, of these defects, and the death of the said George Rae was therefore the result of the gross fault and negligence of the defenders.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer’s husband having met his death through the gross fault and culpable negligence of the defenders, they are liable to her in damages.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments, in so far as material, are irrelevant. No. 31.

On 14th July 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defender, and . . . allows both parties a proof of their respective averments on the closed record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation." Nov. 20, 1896.
Rae v. Milne
& Sons.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Crawford), on 5th October, adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial, and argued;—The pursuer's averments were irrelevant. There was no averment to imply personal fault against the defenders. Neither the sand nor the lime was objected to on the ground of quality. The obligation of the defenders was to supply both of good quality. If they were not mixed in proper proportions, that was owing to the carelessness of the labourer. They would have been liable if this labourer had not been competent, but this was not averred. The averments in cond. 3 as to the "header" stones were open to the same criticism. Cond. 4 hung on cond. 3, and fell with it. Cond. 5 was clearly irrelevant, as it was not explained how one contractor could control the movements of another contractor engaged on the same building.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was admitted that the defenders were responsible for the quality of the lime. It was averred that the lime was insufficient in quality. So with regard to the stones. The defenders could not shelter themselves behind the labourer, for they did not plead "collaborateur." Recklessly rapid building, especially in wet weather, was a well-known source of danger, and it was relevantly averred. This alone might have caused the accident, and the pursuer was entitled to prove it. If the defenders could not control the carpenter, at least they could have forbidden the deceased to work on a dangerous wall. The wall was reduced to this condition by the carpenter's operations, and the defenders should have kept the deceased from this risk. Due care was a distinct duty on the part of the defenders, and failure to exercise it was sufficiently averred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This record is as unlike a record for obtaining an issue on the ground of fault as any I have ever seen. It does not contain an averment that the defenders supplied imperfect material, or material insufficient in quality or quantity. The averment is simply that "the wall was of weak and defective construction in respect (1) that the lime used contained an undue quantity of sand, was insufficiently worked, and was otherwise of insufficient quality, and much inferior to what is necessary for stability and customary to use in the building of walls of the description of that in question." That is to say, that the lime as mixed contained too much sand. It is not said that it was so mixed by order of the defenders. It is only said that as a matter of fact it contained too much sand. That is not an averment of fault against anyone. One cannot help knowing that the mixing of lime is an operation usually carried out by ordinary workmen. They get a heap of lime and a heap of sand, and mix them in certain proportions which are perfectly well known to them. That is the work of an ordinary mason's labourer. There is nothing in this record to the contrary. It is said the lime was insufficiently worked, that is to say, insufficiently worked by the ordinary labourers who were appointed to mix it. Again,

No. 31. that is not an averment of fault for which the defenders are responsible. No want of due supervision by the defenders is averred.

Nov. 20, 1896.
*Rae v. Milne
& Sons.*

Then the pursuer says that the wall was defective in respect "(2) that no proper 'header' or binding stones were used in the building of said wall by the defenders, the stones used being insufficient in size, and otherwise unsuitable for that purpose." It is not said that the defenders did not supply suitable stones. It is not said that there was any fault on their part in making no provision for the proper selection of stones. They would naturally expect that the workmen would apply for suitable stones, and that if they were not supplied they would complain. There is no averment to the effect that complaints as to the size of the stones were disregarded, or that stones of a proper size were asked for and refused by the defenders.

The next averment is—(His Lordship read cond. 4).

It is not alleged that if the carpenter comes and proposes, in accordance with his contract, to drive in dooks, he can be prevented by the mason from doing so. It is not even said that the defenders knew when he was coming, and failed to take steps to prevent dooks from being driven in. It is said that the carpenter was suffered to drive dooks into the wall "contrary to established custom," but it is not said that the defenders knew the carpenters were working at the wall at all. If the pursuer has any action for what was done by the carpenter, it must be against the carpenter himself.

It seems to me that by such loose and unconnected averments the pursuer has not stated a relevant case of fault against the defenders to go to a jury. I think the case should be dismissed. If there are really facts and circumstances known to the pursuer which would form the grounds of a relevant case against the defenders, she can bring another action.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. There is here no fault relevantly averred against the defenders.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. This record is too vague and wanting in specification to warrant us in granting the pursuer an issue to go to a jury.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff of Aberdeen, &c. appealed against, of 14th July and 5th October 1896: Sustain the first plea in law for the defenders; dismiss the action, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses in this and the inferior Court."

R. MACDOUGALD, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

PARISH COUNCIL OF SHOTTS, Pursuers (Appellants).—C. J. Guthrie—Deas. No. 32.

PARISH COUNCIL OF BOTHWELL, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Asher—Crabb Watt.

PARISH COUNCIL OF RUTHERGLEN, Defenders (Respondents).—Salvesen—Cullen.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Parish Council
of Shotts v.
Parish Council
of Both-
well and Rutherglen.

Poor—Settlement—Minor Pubes—Second marriage of pauper's mother.—A derivative residential settlement acquired by a woman on her second marriage does not enure to a child of her first marriage.

M died in Rutherglen in 1888, having his settlement in Bothwell, the parish of his birth. His widow, in the same year, married a man having an industrial settlement in Shotts parish, and went with her pupil son of the first marriage, who had been born in Rutherglen, to reside in Shotts. The son reached puberty in 1894, and after his mother's death in 1895 became a pauper.

Held that the son had not derived any settlement from his mother in the parish of Shotts, and that as he had lost, on attaining puberty, the derivative settlement he had in his father's birth parish, the parish of his own birth was liable for his relief.

PATRICK MALLAN, who resided in Shotts, became chargeable as a 1ST DIVISION. pauper on 12th August 1895, and obtained relief from the parish of Sheriff of Shotts. He continued chargeable. Lanarkshire.

The Parish Council of Shotts then raised the present action of relief in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Hamilton against (1) the Parish Council of Bothwell, which was the birth settlement of John Mallan, the pauper's father; and (2) the Parish Council of Rutherglen, the parish of the pauper's own birth.

The following facts were admitted by the parties:—The pauper, Patrick Mallan, was born in the parish of Rutherglen on 14th November 1880. He was the son of John Mallan and of Catherine Dillon or Mallan. John Mallan, the pauper's father, died on 19th April 1888. The pauper's mother thereafter was, on 25th November 1888, married to Charles Dobbin, who had a residential settlement in the parish of Shotts, which he still retained. She resided with her second husband, Charles Dobbin, in the parish of Shotts, till her death, which took place on 17th July 1895, and Patrick Mallan, the pauper, resided in family with her. The pauper's father was born in the parish of Bothwell, and he retained his settlement there until his death.

The pauper was a proper object of parochial relief.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The Parish Council of Rutherglen—the pauper being born in that parish—is bound to relieve the pursuers of the foresaid advances and of future relief, in respect of the said Patrick Mallan's birth settlement. (3) In the event of its being shewn by the Parish Council of Rutherglen that the pauper's settlement is in the parish of Bothwell, the pursuers are entitled to decree against the Parish Council of Bothwell to relieve the pursuers of advances and of future maintenance, in respect the said Patrick Mallan acquired through his father a settlement in that parish.

The defender Bothwell pleaded;—(2) In respect of the said Patrick Mallan being above the age of puberty, and being forisfamiliaried, and Rutherglen being the parish of his birth, his settlement is in that parish, and the Parish Council of Rutherglen are liable for his support. (3) Alternatively, in respect of the said Patrick Mallan having, while

No. 32. in pupillarity, acquired through his mother a derivative residential settlement in Shotts Parish, and not having lost such settlement by absence at the date of chargeability, the said parish of Shotts is liable for his support, and the Parish Council of Bothwell should be assoltized, with expenses.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Parish Council
of Shotts v.
Parish Councils of Both-
well and Rutherglen.

The defender Rutherglen pleaded;—(2) The defenders the Parish Council of the parish of Rutherglen are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses, in respect that (a) the pauper has never been forisfamiliated, and has therefore the parish of Bothwell or Shotts as his settlement; (b) esto that he has been forisfamiliated, he took, on the marriage of his mother with Charles Dobbin, the parish of Shotts as his settlement, and as that settlement was a derivative residential settlement, he has not lost it.

On 29th July 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson), inter alia, found that the pauper had acquired through his mother a residential settlement in the parish of Shotts, and that he was chargeable to that parish, and therefore assoltized the defenders.*

Shotts appealed, and argued;—The pauper here was beyond pupillarity, and received relief in his own right. That distinguished the present case from Greig v. Adamson and Craig.¹ There the children were in pupillarity, and the ground of judgment was that the mother was truly the pauper, not the children, and it was held that the mother, by her second marriage, had acquired the settlement of her second husband, but only for herself, not for her children.² The rubric of Greig's case seemed to go further, but it was not warranted by the judgment or by the opinions. The question raised in the present action was reserved in Greig.³ The rule was that the settlement of a pupil child was not affected by the second marriage of his mother.⁴ There was no authority to the effect that a child who had ceased to be a pupil, and whose father had not acquired an industrial settlement, had recourse against any but his own birth settlement.

Counsel for Bothwell were not called upon.

Argued for Rutherglen;—A father's residential settlement enured to his children, and was only lost by non-residence, and not by the

* "NOTE.—I have been unable to distinguish this case from that of Wallace v. Muir (Poor-Law Magazine, 1893, p. 445), where it was decided by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire that a child acquired a derivative settlement during the years of puberty by residence with his mother, and that a settlement so acquired can only be lost by non-residence, like other settlements. The decisions in the Court of Session seem to me to be to some extent conflicting. The case of St Cuthbert's v. Cramond (1 R. 174) lays down the principle distinctly, that a settlement acquired through the child's father adheres to the child after his death; but, in Craig v. Greig and Macdonald (1 Macph. 1172), a majority of a bench of seven Judges distinguished between a settlement acquired through a father and one obtained through a mother. Wallace v. Muir, however, is of course binding as an authority in this Court, and as the point at issue seems to have been distinctly raised and decided there, I do not think it is necessary to enter further into the question."

¹ Greig v. Adamson and Craig, March 2, 1865, 3 Macph. 575, 37 Scot. Jur. 203.

² Beattie v. McKenna and Wallace, March 8, 1878, 5 R. 737.

³ Greig v. Adamson and Craig, 3 Macph. 575, Lord Ardmillan at p. 581.

⁴ Hendry v. Mackison and Christie, Jan. 13, 1880, 7 R. 458; Bothkennar v. New Monkland, June 5, 1894, 31 S. L. R. 919.

attainment of puberty.¹ When the father was dead the same rule applied to the case of a mother. Here the mother had by her second marriage acquired a derivative residential settlement in Shotts, and that became the settlement of her child also—the child having no industrial settlement through his father—and could only be lost by non-residence. There had not been non-residence. The Sheriff-substitute had followed Wallace v. Muir.² That decision was exactly in point, and it was warranted by previous cases in the Court of Session.³ In the case of *Beattie*⁴ the facts were entirely different, and no question of residential settlement was raised. The case of *Grant v. Reid*⁵ shewed that a mother might acquire a residential settlement not only for her pupil children but also for her imbecile children, however old.

No. 32.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Parish Council
of Shotts v.
Parish Councils of Both-
well and Rutherglen.

LORD ADAM.—(After stating the facts of the case his Lordship proceeded)—In my opinion the parish of the pauper's own birth is responsible.

The first question which naturally and logically occurs is, what was the parish of settlement of this pauper when his father died in 1888? I think there can be no doubt that the parish of his father's settlement, the pauper being then a pupil, became his settlement. I think further that the authorities shew that so long as he continued a pupil that settlement could be lost by no act of his. Therefore, if matters had continued as they were, that would have been the parish of his settlement until he became a minor, and therefore capable of acquiring a new settlement, in which case it is not disputed that the parish of his own birth would have been the parish of his settlement.

It appears, however, that shortly after his father's death his mother married a man Charles Dobbin, who had a residential settlement in Shotts. The question is, whether the fact of the second marriage of his mother made any change in the settlement of the pauper. I think the authorities are against that view. I think the marriage of the pauper's mother effected no change, and did not deprive him of the right which he had in his own person to a settlement in the parish of his father's birth. I concur with Mr Deas's criticism of the case of *Adamson*⁶ that all that that decision settled was that where a woman married again she lost the settlement of her first husband and acquired that of her second husband for herself. She was the pauper in that case, not the children, and it was her settlement alone that required to be looked to, for the children were not to be treated as independent paupers.

I think that the principle of *Beattie*⁴ settles this case. There, as I understand it, it was decided that so long as the children are pupils and remain with their mother the right of settlement which they themselves acquired by the death of their father in the parish of his birth may be

¹ St Cuthbert's v. Cramond, Nov. 12, 1873, 1 R. 174.

² Wallace v. Muir, Sheriff Court, Poor-Law Magazine, 1893, p. 445.

³ Crieff v. Fowles Wester, July 19, 1842, 4 D. 1538, 14 Scot. Jur. 610; Gibson v. Murray, June 10, 1854, 16 D. 926, 26 Scot. Jur. 489.

⁴ Beattie v. McKenna and Wallace, 5 R. 737.

⁵ Grant v. Reid, May 25, 1860, 22 D. 1110, 32 Scot. Jur. 499.

⁶ Greig v. Adamson and Craig, 3 Macph. 575.

No. 32. temporarily suspended. So long as the mother was alive and the pupil living with her he would have had her settlement, for she would have been the pauper. But she died, the pupil attained puberty; he then became capable of acquiring a settlement on his own account, and the result is, that after attaining puberty, as the case of *Cramond*¹ shews, the settlement of his own birth became his settlement.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Parish Council
of Shotts v.
Parish Councils of Both-
well and Rutherglen.

It was said that there was a specialty in this case, in respect that there was here not a birth settlement but a settlement which the widow had acquired by residence, and it was said, on the authority of the *Crieff*² case, that that made a difference. I do not think the facts bear that out, for, as far as any settlement of the widow is concerned, as soon as she married she ceased to have an independent settlement, and only had that of her husband, between whom and the pauper there is no legal relation. In the next place, I think it is equally clearly out of the case that the pauper acquired any settlement in the parish of Shotts, for so long as a child is under fourteen years of age it has no animus to change its own residence.

I am therefore of opinion that we should recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and hold the parish of Rutherglen liable.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to result from the authorities that a pupil child is incapable of acquiring an independent settlement. Now, as connected with the history of this case, we had to consider what was the settlement of the pauper during the period of pupillarity. The law on that subject is that the father—who of course is liable to maintain the child—when he becomes a pauper takes that liability along with him to the parish, and, whether he be alive or dead, the parish of his father's settlement is the parish which is liable to keep the child, and to give it sustenance during the period that the child is incapable of earning a livelihood. This rule, which has been very much discussed, was extended first to the case of a mother who acquires during her widowhood an independent industrial settlement, and because she is responsible for the aliment of her child, it was held that she had a claim against the parish of her industrial residence for her child as well as for herself. And then, in the case of Greig,³ this rule was further extended to the case where the mother's settlement is not acquired by industrial residence, but is acquired through her re-marriage. But those decisions, while settling the question of the liability for the maintenance of a pupil child, throw very little light upon the present question, which relates to the liability for a child who has been forisfamiliarated. I think they throw little light on the question, because whenever a child becomes forisfamiliarated the question of settlement has to be considered afresh and independent of the liability during the past. Now, I take it that the settlement which the child acquires from the father in consequence of the father's industrial residence will adhere, and failing that, the settlement which the child may acquire from the mother through her industrial residence will adhere to the child until lost in the usual way; and that derived settlement from either parent is the one that constitutes a prior claim on the parish—prior to the latent claim which always exists against the settlement of the child's birth. But it seems to me it would not be a sound extension of the principle of derivative settlements to hold that it should be extended to the case of the settlement of a stepfather, as I think the fallacy of the argument consists in extending a rule that may be convenient and just in the case of pupillarity to a new question that arises upon forisfiliation. It is impossible to discover any tangible ground for subjecting the parish of the stepfather's industrial residence to liability for the stepchild. He is not bound to maintain the stepchild. He is bound to maintain his wife, and that is a very good reason why she should have a settlement through him. But the stepfather sustaining no legal relation towards his stepchild, and owing him no duty of support or obligation towards him, it would be inconsistent with legal principle to hold that his settlement should take effect upon the stepchild. Now, as this pauper Patrick Mallan had a father who died without having an industrial settlement, and a mother who never acquired an industrial settlement of her own, it follows that the child must fall back upon the parish of his own birth, which is always liable, unless its liability is displaced by some stronger tie or ground of liability. I therefore am of opinion that the parish of Rutherglen, the parish of the pauper's birth, is the one that is responsible for his maintenance.

¹ 1 R. 174.

² 4 D. 1538, 14 Scot. Jur. 610.

³ 3 Macph. 575.

No. 32.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Parish Council
of Shotts v.
Parish Councils of Both-
well and Rutherglen.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The question is whether this pauper is chargeable on the parish of his own birth, or secondly, upon the parish of his father's birth, or thirdly, upon the parish in which his mother is said to have acquired a derivative settlement by residence after her marriage with a second husband. I take it to be settled that the father's birth settlement transmits to his children only while they are in pupillarity, and therefore the parish of the father's birth seems to me to be relieved upon perfectly clear and well-established principles. I can see no grounds upon which the parish of his stepfather's birth or residence should be made liable. The settlement which the widow acquired by residence after her first husband's death and during her second marriage was not an independent industrial settlement acquired by herself, but through her second husband's settlement, from which I am unable to see that the children of her first marriage could acquire any right. Therefore I agree with your Lordships that we must fall back upon the parish of the pauper's own birth.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 29th July 1896: Find the Parish Council of the parish of Rutherglen, the parish of the pauper's birth, liable for his support: Decern in favour of the pursuers against the said parish as concluded for: Assoilzie the Parish Council of the parish of Bothwell from the conclusions of the action, and decern," &c.

D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—JAMES GIBSON, S.S.C.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 33. CRAWFORD NOBLE AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—Ure—

A. S. D. Thomson.

Nov. 24, 1896. EDWARD HART, Defender (Reclaimer).—Comrie Thomson—W. Brown.
Noble v. Hart.

Lease—Condition—Forfeiture—Drunkenness—Public-House—“Doing anything which may endanger” licence.—By lease of a restaurant for eleven years, from 28th May 1892, it was provided that in the event of the lessee failing to conduct the business properly, or committing any breach of the licence certificate held by him for the premises, or any offence against the Public-Houses Acts or Excise laws, or permitting betting on the premises, “or doing anything which may endanger the continuance or renewal” of the licence certificate, it should be competent for the lessors to bring this lease to a termination either immediately or at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter.

In June 1896 the lessors brought an action of declarator of forfeiture of the lease and removal against the tenant, averring that on 8th June 1895 the defender had been drunk and incapable while in personal charge of the business; that on 14th April 1896, at the Licensing Court, he admitted this, and that the licensing magistrates renewed his certificate, stating “that they had no wish to take away defender’s business at this time, but if a similar charge were brought against him very likely it would be taken away.”

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, who had allowed a proof before answer) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

By lease dated July 1893 Crawford Noble junior and John Alexander Henderson, merchants in Aberdeen, trustees for behoof of the Aberdeen Cord Manufacturing Company, let to Edward Hart the restaurant and cellarage No. 28 Guild Street, Aberdeen, for eleven years from 28th May 1892.

The lease provided, inter alia,—“The said premises are let for the purpose of carrying on a first-class restaurant and refreshment rooms, and are not to be used for any other purpose, the second party undertaking duly and properly to conduct the business during the continuance of this lease; and in the event of the second party [Hart] failing so to conduct the said business, or of his committing any breach of the licence certificate held for said premises, or any offence against the Public-Houses Acts or Excise laws, permitting betting on the premises, or doing anything which may endanger the continuance or renewal of the certificate of licence held for the premises under the statutes for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland . . . it shall be competent for the first parties to bring this lease to a termination, and to enter into possession of the said premises, either immediately or in their option at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter, in the same manner as if the whole years of this lease had run and expired, without any process of law, or proceeding of any kind, other than a letter addressed and delivered or posted to the second party at the premises hereby let.”

On 15th June 1896 Noble and Henderson brought an action against Hart for declarator that he had incurred a forfeiture of the lease and for removing.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) “The defender has contravened the stipulations of the said lease, and has incurred a forfeiture thereof, in respect that he failed duly and properly to conduct the business carried on by him in the premises, and endangered the continuance and renewal of the said licence by becoming drunk and incapable while in personal charge of the business. It is the fact that on or about Saturday, 8th June 1895, the defender was drunk, and was in consequence totally incapable of duly and properly conducting the said business, and he was found in this condition by a police inspector and constable. At the Licensing Court, held in Aberdeen on 14th April 1896, the matter was reported to the magistrates by the chief constable, who informed the Bench that the defender was addicted to drink, and was found in that condition on the said premises as stated above. By an error the date assigned for the said offence was 3d June, whereas it ought to have been 8th June. The defender who was present, and who was represented by an agent, was personally asked by the Court whether he denied the chief constable's statements, and he replied that he did not. Bailie Edwards then stated for the Court that they had no wish to take away defender's business at this time, but if a similar charge were brought against him very likely it would be taken away. A renewal of the licence was then granted to the defender."

No. 33.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Noble v. Hart.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant.

On 29th October 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before answer, allows to the pursuers a proof of their averments in condescendence 4, and to the defender a conjunct probation."

The defender reclaimed.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that nothing is averred in condescendence 4 sufficient to bring this case under the clause of forfeiture in the lease. The words at the end of that clause, "doing anything which may endanger the continuance or renewal of the certificate of licence," must be read in connection with the specific examples which go before. These shew that before forfeiture can take place something must be done which seriously endangers the licence. Now it is here averred that on one particular occasion the defender was drunk and incapable of conducting his business; it is no doubt also averred that the chief constable informed the bench that the defender was addicted to drink, and was found in that condition on the premises on the occasion in question, and it is further averred that the defender, who was present, "was asked by the Court whether he denied the chief constable's statements, and he replied that he did not." But I am unable to take this last averment as coming to more than an averment that he did not deny his drunkenness on that single occasion. What may seriously endanger the licence may be difficult to define, but the averment of what occurred to endanger the licence must be specific and certain, and I think that nothing of that sort has been averred against the defender. I am unable to take the averments on record as more than an averment that the pursuer was intoxicated on one occasion, and that at the Licensing Court he admitted that he had been so. There is no averment of an indication on the part of the magistrates that they thought this one act had endangered the licence. It was said by one of them that if a similar charge was again brought the licence might probably be taken away. But this was as regards the future, and shews that as regards the past the magistrates had no intention of dealing with the licence at all.

¹ Defender's Authorities.—Wooler v. Knott, 1870, L. R., 1 Ex. Div. 124; Fleetwood v. Hall, 1889, L. R., 23 Q. B. Div. 35. Pursuers' Authority.—Hermann v. Powell, 1891, 60 L. J. Q. B. 628.

No. 33. It is remarkable that the whole of the pursuers' contention is based on what took place in June 1895, a year before this action was brought. There
Nov. 24, 1896. is no ground for thinking that since June 1895 the defender has done any-
Noble v. Hart. thing to endanger the licence. I must say that I think there is a great deal in the suggestion made by Lord Moncreiff in the course of the argument, to the effect that if action is to be taken under the lease it must be taken either immediately or at the next ensuing term. If that is so, then of course there is an end of the case. But even assuming that the pursuers had a right under the lease to allow the matter to stand over and to bring it up at a subsequent date, I think they have not stated on record that anything was done by the defender to endanger this certificate, which has been renewed by the magistrates since the act of which the pursuers complain is said to have occurred.

LORD YOUNG.—I think this case requires careful consideration before we can come to the conclusion to alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary allowing a proof before answer. I am greatly averse—I think I may say that all your Lordships are averse—to interfering with such an interlocutor, and I have therefore given this case careful consideration before coming to the conclusion that it is exceptional.

The only violation of the lease which the pursuers aver is found in condescendence 4, and, in my opinion, that averment simply amounts to this, that the defender was drunk on 8th June 1895, a year before this action was brought. There is no averment that the defender was addicted to drinking, or had done anything, or left anything undone, in consequence of any bad habit of his which would interfere with the regularity of the conduct of the business or the renewal of the licence. It is, no doubt, averred that a policeman stated to the Licensing Court that the defender was addicted to drink, but I cannot take an averment that a statement was made by a policeman to the magistrates as an averment by the pursuers themselves of the facts alleged to have been stated by the constable. There ought to have been a substantive averment by the pursuers. I therefore come to the conclusion that the only averment we have here is an averment that on 8th June 1895, a year before the action was brought, the defender, who had been in possession of the premises for four years, was drunk on one occasion. I do not think that such an averment entitles the pursuers even to a proof before answer.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think the first plea for the defender must be sustained. The only averment stated by the pursuers at all relevant to infer forfeiture of the licence is that the defender was intoxicated on 8th June 1895. But the rest of the pursuers' averments shew that, as the matter stands, this conduct on the part of the defender did not endanger the licence. It may be said that, when the case came up before the Licensing Court and the licence was granted, Bailie Edwards remarked that if a similar charge was again brought against the defender his licence would very likely be taken away. But this is only the expression of a possibility. Taking into account the mode in which the Court dealt with the matter, I think it is plain that they did not consider the defender's conduct a matter which really endangered the licence. The licence having been renewed, and there being no averment that anything has occurred since to endanger the licence, I am of opinion that this action should be dismissed. No. 33.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Noble v. Hart.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree in the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. I am influenced a great deal by the long delay which took place before the pursuers took action. In that respect the case is in marked contrast to that of Hurmann.¹ The act charged is said to have been committed in June 1895, and the case was not raised until a year afterwards, while the clause of forfeiture, if truly construed, in my opinion, provides that action must be taken either at once or at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas following the alleged offence. The landlord took no action, and when the Licensing Court was held this isolated act of drunkenness on the part of the defender was brought to the notice of the magistrates. I think it must be held that the Court did not think that this solitary act endangered the licence, because they renewed the licence. I am of opinion that it is now too late for the pursuers to take action. If they had taken action either at once or at the term after the alleged offence was committed they might have been entitled to a proof. But on account of the delay in bringing the action, and as a result of what took place at the Licensing Court, I think that the licence has as yet never been really endangered, and that the present action is irrelevant.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

ANDREW NEWLANDS, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (as representing the Board of Trade), First Party. No. 34.

—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Cooper.

JOHN HUTCHINGS (as representing the Leith Local Marine Board), Nov. 24, 1896.
Second Party.—Salvesen. Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

Ship—Board of Trade—Local Marine Board—Cancellation of Master's Certificate—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), secs. 469, 470, and 471.—The Board of Trade remitted a case under sec. 471 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for inquiry to a Local Marine Board, who reported that they found the charge proved, and recommended that the certificate be suspended, but refused to cancel or suspend the certificate on the ground that they had no power under the Act to do so.

In a special case presented by the Lord Advocate as representing the Board of Trade, and by the secretary of Leith Local Marine Board as representing that Board, held (1) that the Local Marine Board was a "Court" within the meaning of sec. 470, subsec. (b) of the Act of 1894, and had power to cancel or suspend the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer; (2) that the Board of Trade had no power to cancel or suspend a certificate except on the ground that the holder of it has been "convicted of an offence."

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that the word "offence" refers to an offence which may be punished by fine or imprisonment.

THE Board of Trade, on 4th February 1896, remitted a case under 2D DIVISION. section 471 of the 1894 Act to the Local Marine Board at Leith for inquiry, and the latter made a report thereon on 7th February 1896,

¹ 60 L. J., Q. B. 628.

No. 34. in which they "find the charge proven, and recommend that his certificate be suspended," but refused to cancel or suspend the certificate of the person whose conduct was inquired into, on the ground that they had no power under the Act to cancel or suspend.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

The Board of Trade maintained that a Local Marine Board had the power under the said Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, to cancel or suspend the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer; but the Leith Local Marine Board maintained that a Local Marine Board was not a Court within the meaning of section 470 (b) of the Act, that it had no power of itself to cancel or suspend such a certificate, and that its functions were limited to pronouncing a finding whether the person accused was or was not guilty of the charge made against him, and to reporting to the Board of Trade with a recommendation as to how his certificate should be dealt with. The Board of Trade, however, further maintained that the Board of Trade had no power to cancel or suspend upon such a recommendation, but only when a master, mate, or engineer had been convicted of any offence.

In these circumstances this special case was presented by (1) the Lord Advocate, as representing the Board of Trade, and (2) John Hutchings, secretary to the Local Marine Board at Leith.

The questions of law were:—"1. Whether a Local Marine Board has power under the said Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, to cancel or suspend the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer? 2. Has the Board of Trade power to cancel or suspend the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer when a Local Marine Board has reported in favour of its cancellation or suspension?"

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 60), repealed the whole of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, and by sections 469, 470, and 471, it provided as follows:—

Sec. 469.—"The Board of Trade may suspend or cancel the certificate of any master, mate, or engineer, if it is shewn that he has been convicted of any offence."

Sec. 470.—"(1) The certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, may be cancelled or suspended,—(a) By a Court holding a formal investigation into a shipping casualty under this part of this Act, or by a Naval Court constituted under this Act, if the Court find that the loss or abandonment of or serious damage to any ship, or loss of life, has been caused by his wrongful act or default, provided that, if the Court holding a formal investigation is a Court of summary jurisdiction, that Court shall not cancel or suspend a certificate unless one at least of the assessors concurs in the finding of the Court: (b) By a Court holding an inquiry under this part of this Act into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer, if they find that he is incompetent, or has been guilty of any gross act of misconduct, drunkenness, or tyranny, or that in a case of collision he has failed to render such assistance or give such information as is required under the fifth part of this Act: (c) By any Naval or other Court where under the powers given by this part of this Act the holder of the certificate is superseded or removed by that Court. (2) Where any case before any such Court as aforesaid involves a question as to the cancelling or suspending of a certificate that Court shall, at the conclusion of the case or as soon afterwards as possible, state in open Court the decision to which they have come with respect to the cancelling or suspending thereof. (3) The Court shall in all cases send a full report on the case with the evidence to the Board of Trade, and shall also, if they determine to cancel or suspend any certificate, send the certificate cancelled or suspended to the Board of Trade with their report. (4) A certificate shall not be cancelled or suspended by a Court under this section unless a copy of the report, or a statement of the case on which the investigation or inquiry has been ordered, has been furnished before the commencement of the investigation or inquiry to the holder of the certificate."

No. 34.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

Section 471.—“(1) If the Board of Trade, either on the report of a Local Marine Board or otherwise, have reason to believe that any master, mate, or certificated engineer is from incompetency or misconduct unfit to discharge his duties, or that in a case of collision he has failed to render such assistance or give such information as is required under the fifth part of this Act, the Board may cause an inquiry to be held. (2) The Board may either themselves appoint a person to hold the inquiry or direct the Local Marine Board at or nearest the place at which it is convenient for the parties or witnesses to attend to hold the same, or where there is no Local Marine Board before which the parties and witnesses can conveniently attend, or the Local Marine Board is unwilling to hold the inquiry, may direct the inquiry to be held before a Court of summary jurisdiction. (3) Where the inquiry is held by a Local Marine Board, or by a person appointed by the Board of Trade, that Board or person (a) shall hold the inquiry, with the assistance of a local stipendiary magistrate, or if there is no such magistrate available, of a competent legal assistant appointed by the Board of Trade; and (b) shall have all the powers of a Board of Trade inspector under this Act; and (c) shall give any master, mate, or engineer against whom a charge is made an opportunity of making his defence either in person or otherwise, and may summon him to appear; and (d) may make such order with regard to the costs of the inquiry as they may think just; and (e) shall send a report upon the case to the Board of Trade. (4) Where the inquiry is held by a Court of summary jurisdiction the inquiry shall be conducted and the results reported in the same manner, and the Court shall have the like powers, as in the case of a formal investigation into a shipping casualty under this part of this Act, provided that, if the Board of Trade so direct, it shall be the duty of the person who has brought the charge against the master, mate, or engineer, to the notice of the Board of Trade, to conduct the case, and that person shall in that case, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed to be the party having the conduct of the case.”

Section 473 of the said Act provides,—“(1) A master, mate, or engineer whose certificate is cancelled or suspended by any Court, or by the Board of Trade, shall deliver his certificate (a) if cancelled or suspended by a Court, to that Court on demand; (b) if not so demanded, or if it is cancelled or suspended by the Board of Trade, to that Board, or as that Board direct. (2) If a master, mate, or engineer fail to comply with this section he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds.”

By section 475, subsec. (1) it is provided that the Board of Trade may in all cases, and shall in certain specified cases, when an inquiry into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer has been held, order a rehearing, and by subsec. (3) it is provided,—“Where on any such investigation or inquiry a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master, mate, or

No. 34. engineer, and an application for a rehearing under this section has not been made, or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision to the following Courts, namely (a) if the decision is given in England or by a Naval Court, to the High Court; (b) if the decision is given in Scotland, to either Division of the Court of Session; (c) if the decision is given in Ireland, to the High Court in Ireland."

Nov. 24, 1896.
Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

The Act is divided into parts, and the above sections are in Part VI., which is entitled "Special Shipping Inquiries and Courts."

The powers of Board of Trade inspectors are enumerated in section 729.

By section 742, it is further, inter alia, provided as follows:—"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them, that is to say, 'Court,' in relation to any proceeding, includes any magistrate or justice having jurisdiction in the matter to which the proceeding relates." The constitution of Local Marine Boards is regulated by sections 244 and 245 of the said Act.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, which were both repealed by the Act of 1894, contained the following provisions:—

Under section 241 of the said Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the Board of Trade had power either to institute an investigation into a charge of incompetency or misconduct, or to direct a Local Marine Board to do so, and under section 242 of the said last-mentioned Act power was vested in the Board of Trade to suspend or cancel the certificate of any master or mate if upon any investigation made in pursuance of section 241 he was reported to be incompetent, or to have been guilty of any gross act of misconduct, drunkenness, or tyranny. Under subsection (4) of said section 242 power was vested in the Board of Trade to suspend or cancel the certificate of a master or mate if he is shewn to have been convicted of any offence.

These provisions of the Act of 1854 were amended by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, and the power given to the Board of Trade or to a Local Marine Board of instituting an investigation was extended to charges of incompetency or misconduct on the part of certificated engineers.

Section 23, subsection 1, of the Amendment Act of 1862 provided as follows:—"The power of cancelling or suspending the certificate of a master or mate by the 242d section of the principal Act conferred on the Board of Trade shall (except in the case provided for by the fourth paragraph of the said section) vest in and be exercised by the Local Marine Board, Magistrates, Naval Court, Admiralty Court, or other Court or tribunal by which the case is investigated or tried, and shall not in future vest in or be exercised by the Board of Trade."

Argued for the first party;—If either question were answered in the affirmative that would be sufficient, otherwise a supplementary Act would require to be passed. The first question should be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative. The Local Marine Board was a "Court" ad hoc appointed by the Board of Trade. It was objected that the terms of section 471 (3) by conferring the powers enumerated implied that the Local Marine Board was not a Court. The proper view was that the Act by these provisions added to the powers of the Local Marine Board, and by conferring special powers converted it into a Court. The word "defence" in that section implied that it was a Court for the hearing of a debated case in the ordinary way. This view was assisted by the terms of section 466 providing for formal investigations, which undoubtedly dealt with a Court, and yet also gave leave for preferring a defence. Suppose the Board of Trade appointed a Sheriff-substitute to make an inquiry, there was no doubt that he, sitting with an assessor, could suspend a certificate. If the person so appointed could do so, surely the same was true of a Local Marine Board sitting with a legal assessor. It was applying no great strain to the Act to contend that the Board, in such a case, was simply in the same position as a person appointed by the Board of Trade. (2) Unless the Local Marine Board had the power, the Board of Trade had not. It would be a strong result that a body, not a Court, and who had not heard the evidence, could convict.

No. 34.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

Argued for the second party;—The former Act expressly gave this power to Local Marine Boards. If the Consolidation Act of 1894 did not, it was not competent to spell out of it any such power. The inference was that the power was withdrawn. The Local Marine Board was not a Court. Section 244 defined it. The primary purpose of it was to carry out the provisions of the Act. It was administrative, not judicial. It was an examining and inspecting body. If it were a Court the statute need not have enumerated the powers which are inherent in all Courts. Cancellation of certificate was a sentence, and the Local Marine Board could not pronounce this if it was not a Court. But it might have power to convict, leaving it to the Board of Trade to punish.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—There are two questions presented to us here for determination. The answers to be given to them depend on the construction of certain clauses in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. I deal with the second question first.

By the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 (section 242), power was given to the Board of Trade to suspend or cancel the certificate of any master or mate in certain cases there enumerated. No other authority could exercise such a power. But by the Amendment Act of 1862 (section 23), the power of cancelling or suspending certificates (by that Act extended to engineers' certificates) was taken from the Board of Trade, except in one case, and vested in "the Local Marine Board, Magistrates, Naval Court, Admiralty Court, or other Court or tribunal"; by which the cases involving suspension or cancellation of certificate were investigated or tried. The one case in which power to deal with a certificate was reserved to the Board of Trade was where the holder of the certificate was "shewn to have been convicted of any offence." So stood the case when the Act of 1894 was passed, which repealed the Act of 1854 and also the Amendment Act of 1862. The whole grounds therefore on which certificates of masters, mates, and engineers can be cancelled or suspended, as well as the authority by which such cancellation or suspension can be ordered, must be found in the provisions of the Act of 1894. By section 469 of that Act there is conferred on the Board of Trade power to cancel or suspend certificates where it is shewn that the holder thereof "has been convicted of any offence";

No. 34. that is a re-enactment of the power reserved to the Board by the Amendment Act of 1862, where the general power (and indeed until then, the exclusive power) of cancelling and suspending certificates was taken from the Board and vested elsewhere. No other power, beyond what I have stated, of dealing with certificates is conferred on the Board of Trade by the Act of 1894. It is perhaps not necessary in answer to the question before us to define exactly what is meant by these words "convicted of any offence." But I venture to say on this point that the "offence" here referred to is what is more commonly called a criminal offence—an offence, that is, which may be punished by fine or deprivation of liberty. It does not in my opinion extend to such delinquencies as drunkenness on board ship, or acts of tyranny, and certainly not to incompetency, for all or any of which a certificate may be cancelled or suspended by the Court or tribunal inquiring into such a charge. I am of opinion that the Board of Trade has no power to cancel or suspend any certificate except upon the ground that the holder of it has been "convicted of an offence," and therefore that the second question should be answered in the negative.

Nov. 24, 1896.
Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

The first question is, whether a Local Marine Board has power under the Act of 1894 to cancel or suspend a certificate. It has that power undoubtedly if it can be regarded as a "Court" within the meaning of section 470, subsection (b). Now, I am of opinion that the Local Marine Board when holding an inquiry into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer, under that provision, as it may do when so directed by the Board of Trade, is a "Court" within the meaning of the Act. The Board of Trade may direct such an inquiry to be made by any person it pleases to nominate, or by any Local Marine Board, or a Court of summary jurisdiction. In all such cases, the person or persons before whom the inquiry is made constitute the Court of inquiry. I think it difficult to reach any other conclusion with reference to a Local Marine Board, when the provisions of section 471, subsection 3, are taken into consideration. By that section the Local Marine Board are directed to hold the inquiry with the aid of a legal assistant; they are authorised to summon the person to appear before them against whom the charge is made—to give him an opportunity of making his defence, either in person or otherwise (which includes appearance by agent or counsel), to summon witnesses and recover documentary evidence—and to make such order as to costs as they may think just. All these are the proper actions and functions of a Court. This clause (section 471) does not in terms give the power to suspend or cancel the certificate, any more than give power to dismiss the charge or complaint. But that is because section 470, subsection (b), has already given the power to suspend or cancel, and, of course, to refuse to do so if the charge or complaint is not established.

The principal argument addressed to us in opposition to this view was that by the interpretation clause (section 742) the word "Court" is said to include "any Magistrate or Justice having jurisdiction," &c. But that clause does not exclude from the meaning of "Court" every person not a Magistrate or Justice. The clause does not say that the word "Court" shall mean every Magistrate or Justice having jurisdiction—but only that it shall include such persons. The definition is not exhaustive, for it would not include, at least not necessarily, such a judge as a Wreck Commissioner.

On these grounds I think the first question should be answered in the affirmative. No. 34.

Nov. 24, 1896.

Board of Trade
v. Leith Local
Marine Board.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am clearly of the same opinion. I do not think that the questions put to us present any real difficulty. Previously to the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 a Local Marine Board possessed the power of cancelling or suspending the certificate of a master or mate for any of the reasons specified in section 242 of the Act of 1854, the power of the Board of Trade in this respect being confined by the Amendment Act of 1862, section 23, subsection (1), to the case provided for by the fourth paragraph of the said section, viz., of the master or mate having been shewn to have been convicted of any offence.

I do not find that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 has either taken away any of the powers conferred in this respect upon a Local Marine Board by the earlier statutes, or increased the powers of the Board of Trade. By section 469 the power of the Board of Trade as to cancelling or suspending a certificate is confined as before to the case of a master, mate, or engineer having been convicted of an offence. As to the powers of a Local Marine Board I think that if section 471 is read before 470, it is quite plain that not only are those powers not taken away, but that by section 471, subsection (3), Local Marine Boards are rendered more efficient for the performance of their duties as a Court.

The definition of the word "Court" in the interpretation clause, section 742, does not, I think, create any difficulty. It is plainly not exhaustive.

I agree generally in the opinion which Lord Trayner has delivered, and, in particular, in his statement as to the meaning and effect of the successive statutory provisions bearing on the powers of a Local Marine Board, and need add no more.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

GAVIN BROWN CLARK, Petitioner.—Ure—Cooper.

ROBERT SUTHERLAND, Respondent.—W. C. Smith.

ALEXANDER DUGALD MACKINNON, Respondent.—W. Campbell—Crole.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1896.

Clark v.
Sutherland.

Election Law—Election Petition—Return of election expenses—Failure to make timeous and true return—Petition for authorised excuse—Corrupt Practices Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 34.—Opinions that the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an application by a candidate under sec. 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, for an authorised excuse for failure to make a timeous and true return of election expenses unless the petitioner admits in his petition that he has contravened the statute.

Election Law—Election Petition—Return of election expenses—Failure to make timeous and true return—Petition for authorised excuse—Title to appear—Corrupt Practices Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 34.—Where a candidate applies under sec. 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, for an authorised excuse for failure to make a timeous and true return of

No. 35. election expenses, any elector in the constituency has a title to appear and oppose the application.

Dec. 2, 1896. Question whether a person who is not an elector in the constituency has Clark v. a title to oppose such an application.
Sutherland.

1st Division. THIS was a petition at the instance of Dr G. B. Clark, Member of Parliament for the county of Caithness.

The petitioner stated that he had become a candidate for the county of Caithness at the general election in 1895, and had been duly elected Member of Parliament for that constituency. He had acted in the election as his own election agent.

That on the evening of 27th August 1895, being the thirty-fifth day after his return, the last day allowed by the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883,* for transmitting the account for election expenses, he posted at the House of Commons post-office the return of election expenses, but without a voucher for £5, 15s., which he had paid to James Nicol for hiring, which voucher he had not received in time.

That an action in the English Courts had been raised against the petitioner by Alexander Dugald Mackinnon, a law-agent in Portree, who had no connection with the county of Caithness, for penalties for alleged failure to make a timeous, true, and complete return of his election expenses as required by the said Act. "The petitioner believes that he made a timeous and true return of his election expenses in terms of said Act."

"The return of election expenses made by the petitioner is said to

* Section 33 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51), enacts, inter alia,—"1. Within thirty-five days after the day on which the candidates returned at an election are declared elected, the election agent of every candidate at that election shall transmit to the returning officer a true return (in this Act referred to as a return respecting election expenses) in the form set forth in the second schedule to this Act or to the like effect, containing, as respects that candidate (a) a statement of all payments made by the election agent, together with all the bills and receipts (which bills and receipts are in this Act included in the expression 'return respecting election expenses'); (b) a statement of the amount of personal expenses, if any, paid by the candidate; (c) a statement of the sums paid to the returning officer for his charges, or, if the amount is in dispute, of the sum claimed and the amount disputed; (d) a statement of all other disputed claims of which the election agent is aware; (e) a statement of all the unpaid claims, if any, of which the election agent is aware, in respect of which application has been or is about to be made to the High Court; (f) a statement of all money, securities, and equivalent of money received by the election agent from the candidate or any other person for the purpose of expenses incurred or to be incurred on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election, with a statement of the name of every person from whom the same may have been received. . . . 5. If in the case of an election for any county or borough the said return and declarations are not transmitted before the expiration of the time limited for the purpose, the candidate shall not, after the expiration of such time, sit or vote in the House of Commons as member for that county or borough until either such return and declarations have been transmitted, or until the date of the allowance of such an authorised excuse for the failure to transmit the same as in this Act mentioned, and if he sits or votes in contravention of this enactment, he shall forfeit one hundred pounds for every day on which he so sits or votes to any person who sues for the same. . . ."

be not in conformity with the said Act (a) because the envelope in which it was sent from London bears the London post-mark of the 28th August 1895, while the last day on which, in terms of the Act, the return could be made, was the 27th August 1895; (b) because it was not accompanied by the receipt for the £2, 2s. paid to the Lybster Temperance Hall committee; and (c) because it was not accompanied by the receipt for the £5, 15s. paid to James Nicol.

No. 35.
Dec. 2, 1896.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

"With regard to (a) the petitioner has discovered that letters posted after 10 P.M. at the House of Commons post-office are not removed therefrom and marked with a date stamp till after midnight"; (b) the receipt was sent with the return, but the Sheriff-clerk stated that he had not received it, and the petitioner obtained and sent a duplicate; (c) Nicol's receipt was handed to Sheriff-clerk on 2d September 1895.

The petitioner further stated that he had inadvertently omitted to fill up in the return the date of the election, and had inserted Mr Nicol's Christian name as "John" instead of James.

The petitioner then set forth sec. 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883.*

The petitioner craved the Court "to find that the petitioner did timeously transmit a true return of his election expenses, incurred by him as candidate for the county of Caithness, at the election which took place therein on 23d July 1895, to the returning officer for the

* Section 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, enacts, inter alia,—"1. Where the return and declarations respecting election expenses of a candidate at an election for a county or borough have not been transmitted as required by this Act, or being transmitted contain some error or false statement, then—(a) If the candidate applies to the High Court or an Election Court and shews that the failure to transmit such return and declarations, or any of them, or any part thereof, or any error or false statement therein, has arisen by reason of his illness, or of the absence, death, illness, or misconduct of his election agent or sub-agent, or of any clerk or officer of such agent, or by reason of inadvertence, or of any reasonable cause of a like nature, and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the applicant, or . . . the Court may, after such notice of the application in the said county or borough, and on production of such evidence of the grounds stated in the application, and of the good faith of the application, and otherwise, as to the Court seems fit, make such order for allowing an authorised excuse for the failure to transmit such return and declaration, or for an error or false statement in such return and declaration, as to the Court seems just." "3. The order may make the allowance conditional upon the making of the return and declaration in a modified form or within an extended time, and upon the compliance with such other terms as to the Court seem best calculated for carrying into effect the objects of this Act, and an order allowing an authorised excuse shall relieve the applicant for the order from any liability or consequences under this Act in respect of the matter excused by the order; and where it is proved by the candidate to the Court that any act or omission of the election agent in relation to the return and declaration respecting election expenses was without the sanction or connivance of the candidate, and that the candidate took all reasonable means for preventing such act or omission, the Court shall relieve the candidate from the consequences of such act or omission on the part of his election agent. 4. The date of the order, or if conditions and terms are to be complied with, the date at which the applicant fully complies with them, is referred to in this Act as the date of the allowance of the excuse."

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

said county, in terms of the Statute 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51, section 33, or otherwise, and in any event, to make an order for allowing an authorised excuse for the petitioner's failure (1) to transmit the return of his election expenses within the time fixed by the Statute 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51, section 33; (2) to enclose as part of said return the receipt for £2, 2s. paid by the petitioner to the Lybster Temperance Hall committee; (3) to enclose as part of said return the receipt for £5, 15s. paid by the petitioner to James Nicol, Wick; (4) to insert the date of the election in the return which he made; and (5) to state accurately the Christian name of the said James Nicol in the said return, or for his failure to do any of the above wherein your Lordships shall consider that the petitioner has not complied with the statute; and further, to make an order allowing all or any of the above failures or omissions, if found to have been committed, to be an exception or exceptions from the provisions of the said Act, which would otherwise make the same an illegal practice,* and to declare that the petitioner shall not be subject to any of the consequences under the said Act of his said acts, failures, or omissions; or to do further or otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

The Court ordered the petition to be intimated upon the walls and in the Minute-book, and to be advertised.

Answers were lodged by Robert Sutherland, farm servant, an elector in the county of Caithness, and by Alexander Dugald Mackinnon, mentioned in the petition, who had raised an action against the petitioner for penalties in the High Court of Justice in England.

Sutherland averred "that the petitioner's declaration as to expenses was not in statutory form, as it did not specify the amount of the expenses (which was left blank), or the date of the election; that the return and declaration were not transmitted to the Sheriff-clerk within the statutory period, which expired on 27th August 1895; that the return was not accompanied by the statutory bills and receipts, and was therefore no true return; that although the petitioner's attention was directed by the Sheriff-clerk of Caithness-shire to these facts shortly after the said defective return was made, the petitioner took his seat and voted in the House of Commons for a whole session without making any application for relief. This respondent accordingly submits that the petitioner is not now entitled to the relief craved."

Mackinnon objected to the prayer of the petition being granted on like grounds, and further submitted that the application, in the first alternative prayer thereof, was incompetent, et separatim that the matters referred to in the petition being at present under the consideration of the English Courts, it was not convenient to try the question at issue in the present application.

At the hearing the respondents objected to the competency of the petition, on the grounds (1) that an application under either section

* This crave was for an order under section 23 of the Act, which authorises the Court, in certain circumstances, to make an order allowing any act or omission of a candidate which would, but for that section, be an illegal practice, payment, employment, or hiring, to be an exception from the provisions of the Act "which would otherwise make the same an illegal practice, payment, employment, or hiring, and thereupon such candidate . . . shall not be subject to any of the consequences under this Act of the said act or omission."

23 or section 34 must proceed upon an admission that the provisions of the statute had not been complied with ;¹ and (2) that in raising the issue whether he had committed illegal practices, the petitioner was inviting the Court to consider a question already competently raised in England in the action for penalties.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1896.

Clark v.
Sutherland.

After some discussion counsel for the petitioner craved and obtained leave to amend the petition by deleting the first crave, and the averments in support thereof, and also the last crave of the prayer, viz., those for a finding that the petitioner had timeously transmitted a true return, and for declarator that he should not be subject to any of the statutory consequences of his acts, failures, or omissions.

Argued further for the petitioner ;—The petitioner craved the Court to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon it by sections 23 and 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act. In order to obtain complete relief it was necessary for the petitioner to apply under section 23 as well as section 34, for it might be contended that an authorised excuse granted under the latter section only took effect from the date on which it was granted, and was no defence against a claim for penalties incurred prior to that date. The respondents had no locus standi to oppose the application. The statute did not contemplate the appearance of other parties than the candidate in the application, and, in any view, Mackinnon, who was not an elector in the county, but merely a common informer, could have no title to intervene. Further, the respondents had set forth no relevant grounds for opposing the application, as they did not aver that the irregularities committed by the petitioner had been committed in bad faith.

Argued for the respondent Mackinnon ;—Looking to the original form of the petition, there was no doubt of this respondent's title to appear, for the petitioner craved a finding which would have been a judgment on the question raised by the respondent in his action for penalties. But the respondent's title was not cut down by the amendment made on the petition, for the petitioner averred that he was applying for a certificate which would, in his opinion, be a good ground of defence to the respondent's action, and the respondent had evidently a right to see that such a certificate was not given except on proper grounds. Section 23 was not intended to apply to omissions in the return or declarations of a candidate. The averments in the answers were relevant. Various particulars in which the petitioner had failed to comply with the statute were specified, and the statute imposed upon the candidate the burden of shewing that such failures were due to inadvertence and not to any want of good faith.

The respondent Sutherland argued that as an elector in the petitioner's constituency he had a clear title to intervene in the application, and to discuss the question whether the illegalities which had admittedly been committed were due to inadvertence or want of good faith.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me that the amendments which have been made on the petition are sufficient to make it competent under the statute. As I take it, we have jurisdiction only to furnish an authorised excuse to persons who have something to be excused, not to try the question whether something has occurred which requires an excuse. The petitioner must ¹ Walsall Case—Day's Election Cases, 77 and 106.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

make up his mind on that question, and Mr Ure has done well for his client in striking out of the prayer the crave for a finding that the principal thing—the first of the three offences supposed to have been committed—has not been done. Accordingly, the proceedings must necessarily go on from this point on the footing that the question is whether an excuse should be awarded. He has also done well to strike out of the last part of the prayer a declaration for which no statutory warrant can be found. The last part of the amended prayer, which desires the Court to make an order under section 23, is one which we do not require at present to consider, as it will be entirely open to the Court subsequently disposing of the case to settle whether effect can be given to section 23 at one and the same time with section 34. In my view therefore the petition has been reduced by these very material alterations to an ordinary plain-sailing application under section 34. I presume that your Lordships will consider that we should remit—as we have power to—to one of the Judges to proceed with the case. Probably an Election Judge will be the best to select.

We have been challenged to determine whether either of the parties who have appeared as respondents have a title so to appear. I think there is force in Mr Ure's observation that, if the petition could have been treated as it stood when the debate commenced as a petition under section 34, there would be great room for doubt whether Mr Mackinnon had any place in the controversy. But, unfortunately for the petitioner, the application was not then for an excuse, but for a declarator that there was no need of an excuse, and the only possible reason suggested for that crave being allowed was that the petitioner is at present defendant in an action in the English Courts at the instance of this respondent, where he affirms, and the petitioner denies, that there has been an offence in contravention of the Act. In these circumstances, it seems to me that the petitioner by his own choice has really convened Mr Mackinnon to this Court, to see that an order is not pronounced which might be incompetent, but which would have the appearance of a decree by a Court of law cutting away the ground of his action in the English Courts. Accordingly, I am of opinion that Mr Mackinnon was well entitled to come here, and what is more, that he has succeeded in his contention. We have not to determine more than this at present, but I am at a loss to see what locus standi Mr Mackinnon would have in the sequel to this case, now that it has been reduced to the scale and compass of an ordinary application for an excuse for an offence admittedly committed.

As regards Mr Sutherland, he has in his answers confined his statements within very sober and modest limits, and has not made any aggressive or injurious reflections on the conduct of his Parliamentary representative; but on the other hand, though his social position may not be of the most important, he is, like every elector, entitled to come forward,—it may be at his own expense,—but at all events to come forward and appear in this proceeding. I should therefore be averse to pronouncing anything which would discourage his laudable vigilance, but at the same time he must bear in mind that it will depend on the sequel and the course of the proceeding what the pecuniary result may be to him.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the condition of an application under section 34 is that some act has been committed either by the candidate or his agent or other representative, which is a contravention of the provisions of the statute that are intended to secure a complete return of election expenses. The powers of the Court are very ample to allow an authorised excuse, which shall have some effect—I do not say what effect—in relieving the candidate from the consequences of the contravention. But unless the petitioner comes here setting forth that there has been contravention, the foundation on which our jurisdiction depends does not exist.

I agree that the petition as framed was open to observations affecting its relevancy, and I also agree that Mr Mackinnon was entitled to come here in order to see that no decree was given out (as it might be if the attention of the Court were not called to the point), to the prejudice of his action in the English Court.

I have no doubt that the provisions of the statute as to advertisement within the applicant's constituency are intended to enable any elector to appear and watch the case, and to see that the application is fully scrutinised before being granted.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT allowed the amendments on the petition proposed at the bar, and the same having been made, remitted the cause to Lord Kyllachy to proceed as might be just.

M'NAUGHT & M'QUEEN, S.S.C.—A. & S. F. SUTHERLAND, S.S.C.—DUNCAN SMITH & M'LAREN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

THOMAS HARDIE AND OTHERS (Peter Waddell's Trustees), First Parties.—Rankine—Pitman.

No. 36.

ALEXINA WADDELL, AND HER TUTOR, Second Parties.—D.-F. Asher—W. Campbell.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

MRS CATHERINE WADDELL, Third Party.—D.-F. Asher—W. Campbell.

MOSES ADAMSON, Fourth Party.—A. M. Anderson.

Succession—Testament—Holograph Writing.—In the repositories of a deceased person who left a formal settlement were found, but not tied up along with it, two holograph writings. The first ran thus:—"August 27, 1888—Annuity for life Mrs Wood Waddell, 30 Queen's Crescent, for £100, £3000 codicil to my will for Alexina Waddell, my late nephew W. Wood Waddell, daughter Alexina Waddell." The document bore the name and address of the deceased in his own handwriting at the left-hand bottom corner, away from the writing.

The second document was in pencil, and ran thus:—"May 14th 1894—Moses Adamson, the sum of £100 hundred pounds. 14th May 1894.—The sum of One hundred pounds, Peter Waddell." There was added in ink,—“May 14, 1889.” There was written on the back of the paper in ink,—“May 14th 1894, pay to Moses Addemson One hundred pounds stg.”

Held that the writings were not testamentary.

Lowson v. Ford, March 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 631, and Colvin v. Hutchison, May 20, 1885, 12 R. 947, approved.

Succession—Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit—Bequest by uncle to nephew and niece.—A testator directed his trustees to pay to his sister the

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

sum of £6000, to "W, son of my late brother Andrew, the sum of £5000," and "to the only surviving daughter of my said brother the sum of £5000." These legatees were his only near relatives. In the same clause of the settlement legacies were left amounting in all to £40,000, and ranging from £500 to £4000, to distant relatives and strangers in blood. The residue, which amounted to £100,000, was left to charities. W predeceased the testator, leaving a daughter.

Held (dub. Lord Adam) that the conditio si sine liberis applied to W's legacy, there being nothing in the settlement to shew that the testator was moved to select his nephews and nieces as objects of his bounty by any other consideration than their relationship to him.

Per Lord M'Laren,—"I cannot help thinking that the true rule, and the only workable rule, is that in the case of a testator who has no children of his own, the benefit of the conditio will be given to the issue of his legatees, being nephews or nieces or their descendants, unless it appears from the will itself that the nature of the bequest was personal favour to the legatee rather than relationship."

Bogie's Trustees v. Christis, Jan. 26, 1882, 8 R. 453, approved.

1ST DIVISION. PETER WADDELL, 5 Claremont Park, Leith, died without issue on 18th June 1895, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 18th June 1886, and codicil dated 24th October 1888.

This special case was presented by Dr Thomas Hardie and others, the trustees—first parties—and by Alexina Waddell, only child of William Wood Waddell, the testator's nephew, and her guardian, second parties; by Mrs Catherine Walker Waddell, third party; and by Moses Adamson, fourth party.

It may be stated generally that two questions were raised—(1) Whether two holograph writings found in the deceased's repositories were testamentary; and (2) Whether a legacy of £5000 left by the testator in his settlement to his nephew William Wood Waddell, who predeceased the testator, fell, under the conditio si sine liberis, to his daughter Alexina, the second party.

I. Holograph Writings.

The special case contained statements to the following effect:—

The settlement contained this clause,—Quinto. "That my trustees shall pay and deliver all such legacies, gifts, or provisions, and implement all such instructions as shall be contained in any codicil or any memorandum or writing by me clearly expressive of my will, though not formally executed, declaring that the same, whether formal or informal, shall be held and taken to be part and parcel of these presents."

"Subsequent to the testator's death a holograph writing in the following terms was found in his repositories:—

August 27, 1888

Annuity for life

Mrs Wood Waddell

30 Queen's crescent

for £100

£3000 codicil to my will for Alexina Waddell my late nephew W. Wood Waddell daughter Alexina Waddell.

Peter Waddell

5 Claremont Park

Links Leith

"The testator on 27th August 1888, at a meeting with his agent, the late John T. Mowbray, LL.D., W.S., instructed him to prepare a codicil to the said trust-disposition and settlement. After various consultations a draft codicil was framed, containing, inter alia, a clause directing the trustees to pay 'to my grandniece, Alexina Waddell, daughter of my late nephew William Wood Waddell, sometime residing at No. 30 Queen's Crescent, Edinburgh, the sum of £1000 sterling.' Thereafter, upon 24th October 1888 the codicil was executed, this clause having been deleted." The draft codicil shewing this deletion was produced.

"The testator on 29th August 1888 instructed the said John T. Mowbray to purchase an annuity of £100 on the life of the said party of the third part, and subsequently, on 31st August 1888, he instructed Mr Mowbray to increase the amount of the annuity to £150. On 6th September 1888 an annuity of £150 on Mrs Waddell's life was purchased by Mr J. T. Mowbray."

"Moses Adamson, the party hereto of the fourth part, acted for some time as the personal attendant of the testator, but left his employment in May 1894. After the death of the testator there was found in his repositories a holograph writing in the following terms:—

[The words in italics were written in pencil.]

May 14th 1894

Moses Adamson

The sum of £100 hundred pounds st

14 May 1894

The sum of One hundred pounds peter Waddell

May 14 89

[Written on the back in ink.]

May 14th 1894

Pay to Moses Addemson

One hundred pounds stg

"The testator drew from the Bank of Scotland, Leith, monthly, certain sums to enable him to meet the house bills, &c. On 14th May 1894 he signed a cheque for £100 on the said bank in favour of the said party of the fourth part, but which cheque was afterwards cancelled, and on the same date he signed another cheque, also in his favour, for the same amount, which was paid to the said party of the fourth part by the bank on that date. The amount so uplifted was by the party of the fourth part handed to the testator to enable him to meet the current house expenses, &c." There was no statement that the holograph writings were found along with the settlement.

The second and third parties maintained that the first holograph writing was testamentary.

The fourth party maintained that the second was so.

The trustees for themselves, and as representing the residuary legatees, maintained that they were not testamentary.

II. Conditio si sine liberis.

With regard to the question whether the conditio si sine liberis applied to the legacy of £5000 in favour of William Wood Waddell, the testator's nephew, the following statements were made in the special case:—The testator had two brothers, Andrew and James, and one sister, Elizabeth, all of whom he survived. Andrew Waddell was the only member of the family who had issue, viz. (1) Elizabeth, who died in 1880 unmarried; (2) William Wood Waddell, who died on 19th July 1888, leaving a daughter, Alexina, born on 12th October

No. 36.
Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

1886; and (3) Mrs Mary Waddell or Wilson. Mrs Wilson and Alexina Waddell, the testator's niece and grandniece, survived him. They were his nearest relatives. He was also survived by Mrs Catherine Walker Waddell, the widow of William Wood Waddell.

The testator's settlement, dated 18th June 1886, set forth, inter alia, the following trust purposes:—“(Secundo) That my trustees shall convey to my sister, Elizabeth Waddell, residing with me at 5 Claremont Park aforesaid, my share of the whole effects in the house No. 5 Claremont Park aforesaid, belonging jointly to me and her, except certain pictures . . . (Tertio) That my trustees shall pay or retain the following legacies, videlicet,—To the said Elizabeth Waddell [his sister] the sum of £6000 sterling; to William Wood Waddell, presently residing in No. 6 Mansfield Place, Edinburgh, son of my late brother Andrew Waddell, the sum of £5000 sterling; to Mrs Mary Waddell or Wilson, only surviving daughter of my said brother Andrew Waddell, the sum of £5000 sterling.”

Here followed legacies to strangers in blood, inter alia, six legacies of £1000 each to the daughters and son of George Louthan nominatim, a legacy of £4000 to John Gordon, and a legacy of £4000 to Mrs S. J. Gordon or Liddle, and other legacies.

By the fourth purpose the testator directed his trustees to deliver to William Wood Waddell a painting by W. Goven dated 1641.

By the sixth purpose the testator directed the residue of his estate to be divided among certain charities named.

In a codicil, dated 24th October 1888, the testator left two legacies to strangers, and directed his trustees to deliver to the National Gallery of Scotland, Edinburgh, the painting above mentioned, the bequest thereof “having lapsed by the predecease of the said William Wood Waddell; and I revoke and alter the preceding trust-disposition and settlement, in so far as is necessary to give effect to these presents, but no further or otherwise.”

The legacies amounted to £40,000, and the residue was estimated at £100,000.

The second parties contended that the conditio si sine liberis applied to the legacy of £5000 in favour of William Wood Waddell, and that his daughter was entitled thereto.

The opinion and judgment of the Court was asked on the following questions:—“1. Are the second parties entitled to the legacy of £5000 bequeathed to the said William Wood Waddell? 2. Are the second and third parties respectively entitled to the sum of £3000 and to the annuity of £100 mentioned in the holograph writing of 27th August 1888? 3. Is the party of the fourth part entitled to the sum of £100 mentioned in the holograph writing of 14th May 1894?”

Argued for the first parties;—Holograph Writings.—(1) The writing of 27th August 1888 was clearly, on the face of it, merely a memorandum prepared by the deceased with a view to a consultation with his legal adviser. Had it been intended as a codicil, it would have been headed “codicil to my will.” It contained no words of gift, and was in no way testamentary. Although signed, it was at most a document containing a mere specification of names and sums of money. This view was supported by extrinsic evidence.¹ Two days after the date of the memorandum, the deceased instructed his agent to buy an annuity of £100 for Mrs Waddell, which he afterwards increased to £150, and further, a draft codicil was prepared bequeathing £1000 to Alexina, although the bequest in her favour was afterwards cancelled by the deceased. The direction in clause 5 of the settlement instructing the trustees to give effect to informal memoranda applied only to documents which, although containing technical defects, expressed an intention to make a testamentary gift.¹ The same argument applied to the writing in favour of Adamson. (2) Conditio si sine liberis.—The rule of construction admitting the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit applied at first to bequests by parents to children. It was then extended to the relation of uncle and nephew or niece, but only subject to the qualification, that it should appear from the will that the uncle had placed himself in loco parentis to the object of his bounty.² The Court would not readily extend the doctrine beyond descendants.³ There was no case in which the doctrine of in loco parentis had been given effect to, unless the settlement was one of the nature of a family provision. It might not be necessary that every member of the family should receive something, but that the settlement should be a family one in the sense that no one else benefited by it was characteristic of all the cases, and especially of *Bryce's Trustee*⁴ and Forrester's Trustees.⁵ Here, however, there was a special bequest to an individual contained in a clause consisting otherwise of a list of legacies to various families and individuals, to all of whom the testator must be held to have been in loco parentis if the doctrine were to be applied.⁶ The conditio therefore did not apply.

¹ Lowson, &c. v. Ford, &c., March 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 631, per Lord Cowan, 638; Munro v. Coutts, July 13, 1813, 1 Dow, 437.

Argued for the second and third parties;—(1) Holograph Writings.—The document of 27th August was signed, dated, and contained a specification of what the writer desired. It fell accordingly to be given effect to as a testamentary writing. The testator evidently had foreseen that he would be from time to time making alterations on his settlement, and he had inserted clause 5 to meet such a contingency. (2) Conditio si sine liberis.—The conditio applied to a bequest by an uncle to a nephew or niece, unless circumstances disclosed in the will shewed that the bequest was given upon the ground of delectus personæ, or as a memento.⁷ The deceased had only three relatives when he made the will. He did not pick and choose, but provided substantially for each of them. There was nothing to support the view that the mere relation between the amount given to them and the total corpus of the estate was necessarily exclusive of

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

¹ Hamilton, &c., v. White, June 15, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 53, per Lord Chan. Selborne, 55.

² Hall v. Hall, March 17, 1891, 18 R. 690, opinions of consulted Judges, p. 698; Bogie's Trustees v. Christie, &c., Jan. 26, 1882, 9 R. 453, per Lord President Inglis, pp. 455-6.

³ Hall v. Hall, supra.

⁴ Bryce's Trustee, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722.

⁵ Forrester's Trustees v. Forrester, July 12, 1894, 21 R. 971.

⁶ Allan v. Thomson's Trustees, May 30, 1893, 20 R. 733; Douglas' Executors, Feb. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 504, 41 Scot. Jur. 268; Blair's Executors, &c., v. Taylor, &c., Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362.

⁷ Bryce's Trustees, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722, per Lord Gifford, p. 729; Forrester's Trustees v. Forrester, July 12, 1894, 21 R. 971, per Lord M'Laren, p. 973.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

the idea underlying the in loco parentis doctrine. If Alexina was found to have right to £3000 under the writing of 27th August, that did not preclude the application of the conditio.¹

Argued for the fourth party;—Holograph Writings.—The writing of 14th May fell under the description of informal documents, to which validity was to be given under clause 5 of the settlement. There was on the back a specific direction to pay, which, though not in gremio of the document, fell to be taken into account as explaining its contents.²

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The testator Peter Waddell died in June 1895, leaving a considerable fortune. He disposed of more than £40,000 in legacies, and the residue, estimated at over £100,000, is destined to charitable uses. The first question in the case relates to the effect of a legacy of £5000 to a nephew; the second and third questions depend on the validity of two memoranda which are said by the persons named in them to be testamentary writings, the trustees of Mr Waddell maintaining the contrary.

We intimated to the parties that the questions would be considered in a different order, because it is necessary first to consider what are the writings constituting the will of the testator before we can proceed to determine what is the true legal construction and effect of these writings.

The point really raised by the second and third questions are, whether the writings bearing date 27th August 1888, and 14th May 1894, or either of them, are codicils or testamentary instruments, and I shall so consider the questions.

In considering such a writing as that of 27th August, we have to begin with the elementary question, What are the essentials of a testamentary gift? We see from the decisions that testamentary effect has been given to writings which to all appearance were in their inception mere drafts or memoranda to be used in the preparation of a will or codicil, on the principle that where a testator puts up the writing or memorandum with the principal will, he may be assumed to be willing that his testamentary intention should stand on the words there used. But the Court has never gone so far as to hold that a mere specification of names and sums of money without words of gift would amount to a will. The contrary has been distinctly affirmed by both Divisions of the Court. I refer specially to Lord Cowan's opinion in Lowson v. Ford,³ and that of the Lord President in Colvin v. Hutchison.⁴

The paper in question begins (after the date) with the words, "Annuity for life, Mrs Wood Waddell, 30 Queen's Crescent, for £100." Now, one may infer from these words that the deceased was in some way concerned with obtaining an annuity for life for Mrs Wood Waddell. But whether he was to purchase this annuity for the lady out of her own funds, or to make her a present of it, and in the latter case whether by gift inter vivos or by bequest, is wholly uncertain. As a matter of fact, only two days after the date of the memorandum Mr Waddell instructed his agent to pur-

¹ Bryce's Trustee, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722.

² Burnie's Trustee v. Lawrie, July 17, 1894, 21 R. 1015.

³ 4 Macph. 636.

⁴ 12 R. at p. 955.

chase an annuity of £100 for the lady, which he afterwards increased to £150. This makes it perfectly clear that so far as Mrs Wood Waddell's name is concerned the memorandum was not expressive of a testamentary intention, but I should come to the same conclusion independently of the extrinsic facts, important though they be. The writer might have changed his mind and never purchased an annuity, but does it follow that his estate is to be put under an obligation to do so? I think that such a conclusion is altogether inadmissible. I think that in the absence of words of gift or direction it must be taken that there is no present testamentary intention, and an intention to give, if not expressed, is what no Court of law can supply.

No. 36.
Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

I come to the same conclusion with respect to the other entry in the paper beginning, "£3000 codicil to my will for Alexina Waddell." The words convey no meaning to an ordinary reader, though doubtless the writer knew what he meant. It would be a mere guess to say that the note was written to remind the writer to cause a codicil to his will to be prepared in favour of Alexina. It appears that such a codicil was prepared, but the lady took no benefit under it, because Mr Waddell, for reasons known to himself, struck the bequest in her favour out of the draft.

With regard to the supposed bequest of £100 to Moses Adamson, I can only repeat that a will or testamentary intention is not expressed by merely writing the name of a person and a sum of money against the name. It appears that Mr Waddell was in use to draw cheques payable to Moses Adamson, his servant, and it is conjectured that at a time when he was suffering from physical weakness he wrote these words on a scrap of paper to try his hand before filling up a cheque. Whatever may be the true explanation, I am of opinion that the writing of 14th May 1894 is not a bequest in favour of anyone.

I pass to the consideration of the first of the questions of law in the special case. By his trust-disposition Mr Waddell made a bequest of £5000 in favour of William Wood Waddell, designed "son of my late brother Andrew Waddell." Now, William Wood Waddell died in the testator's lifetime, about two years after the execution of his trust-deed or will, and the question is whether his daughter Alexina is entitled to claim this legacy under the conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

In considering this question I shall leave out of view the circumstance already alluded to, that a draft exists in which this lady's name appears as a legatee for the sum of £1000, because, according to the best opinion I can form, this is not a circumstance relevant to the present inquiry. According to the judgment of the Court in the case of Bogie's Trustees,¹ the question whether a testator has put himself in loco parentis towards a nephew or niece is independent of extrinsic facts and circumstances, and is to be determined by the will itself. Now, if the scheme of the will is such as would affix the character of a parental provision to the particular bequest, it is consistent with sound principle to hold that this character can only be taken away, and the provision transformed into an ordinary legacy by a subsequent testamentary act, or at least by evidence in writing that the testator did not intend that the issue of his nominee should come into the parent's place.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

Passing from this specialty, I would observe that while the decisions are certainly adverse to the extension of the conditio to collaterals, there has been a disposition to admit it liberally within the degree of relationship in which it is properly applicable. It is certainly not limited to the case of a gift of a share of residue, though where a share is given to a nephew or niece with the usual destination, this is sufficient to exclude the conditio from any pecuniary legacy which may be given to the same person, the latter being deemed a personal gift. But again, if we are to be guided by the Lord President's views as developed in the case of Bogie,¹ it is not a necessary ingredient of a parental provision that all the testator's nephews and nieces are treated alike, or even that every member of the class should receive something, and if I rightly follow the judgment, as a father may leave a child out of his will because he is wealthy and does not need to be provided for, or because he is undeserving, so also the childless uncle may, for reasons known to himself, exclude a brother's child from his will, and still be a parent in the sense of the conditio to those nephews or nieces and their descendants for whom he undertakes or proposes to provide. It is easy to see that where so understood the phrase "in loco parentis" ceases to be a limitation, and expresses only the reason of the extension of the conditio to nephews and nieces. I confess that this consequence does not alarm me. I think it is much better that the relationship being defined the principle of implied conditional institution should be liberally applied, than that its application should be determined according to the impression which a Judge may form as to the assumption by a testator of a character which probably never entered his mind at all.

In the present case I understand that all the testator's nearest relations who were living at the date of the will are included, and I see that each of them receives a substantial sum. The sister receives £6000, and each of his brother's children £5000, so that the element of personal prepossession does not enter largely, if at all, into the case. It is true that legacies of smaller amount, chiefly sums of £1000, but in two instances sums of £4000, are given to strangers in blood or persons who are only distantly related to the testator, while the residue goes to charity. But this is not necessarily inconsistent with the supposition that the ties and duties of relationship were in the view of the testator in providing for his nephew and niece. The moral duty cannot reasonably be stretched further than the extent of a reasonable provision sufficient to keep the legatee from want. The circumstance that the testator has not dealt as liberally with his brother's children as he might have done, or as they might reasonably expect, does not seem to me to constitute a sound argument for depriving their issue of the benefit of the implied conditional institution which it is admitted would be a rightful claim if the bulk of the succession had been divided between the parents.

I have not thought it necessary to discuss the numerous decisions upon this principle of the law of wills, though I have examined them carefully, because I think that this case is not precisely ruled by any of the previous decisions. The in loco parentis doctrine is a somewhat artificial rule at best; its application is nowhere subjected to any definite test, and it does not seem capable of more precise definition than such as is given in the case to which I have referred. I cannot help thinking that the true rule, and the only workable rule, is that in the case of a testator who has no children of his own, the benefit of the conditio will be given to the issue of his legatees, being nephews or nieces, or their descendants, unless it appear from the will itself that the nature of the bequest was personal favour to the legatee rather than relationship. I am therefore of opinion that the first question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

¹ 9 R. 453.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

LORD ADAM.—I agree that clearly the first question to determine is,—What are the testamentary writings of the deceased? No doubt his trust-disposition and settlement is one, and his codicil of 24th October 1888 is another; but there is a question in the first place with regard to the holograph writing of 27th August 1888, viz., whether that is a testamentary writing, or merely a memorandum intended by Mr Waddell to refresh his memory.

The question comes before us in the form of a special case, and to my mind that precludes us from ascertaining a very significant fact, viz., where this holograph writing was found. If, as has happened in previous cases, it had been found tied up in a bundle with other documents undoubtedly testamentary, that fact might give it a testamentary character, while if it were found separate in a chest of drawers, or what are vaguely described as “repositories,” that would put a different aspect on the question. Now, we are entitled to assume that this writing was not tied up with testamentary writings, for otherwise it should have been judicially brought to our notice. Coming then to the writing itself, as Lord M'Laren has remarked, there are no words of gift or expressing any desire or intention to give. The words used are—(Here his Lordship quoted the terms of the writing). Now, there is mention of a codicil, but that is equally vague, and accordingly the mere fact of his mentioning it is quite consistent with the writing being only a memorandum by which Mr Waddell wished to refresh his memory when visiting his agents. It is true that it is signed, but it is noticeable that the signature is not found where one would expect to find it in a testamentary writing, but down in the left hand corner of the paper, away from the writing. Accordingly I agree that this is not a testamentary writing, and I am also clearly of the same opinion with regard to the second document before us.

It appears to me that our decision on these documents is a very fortunate one for Alexina Waddell in the consideration whether the conditio si sine liberis applies, for if we had concluded that there was a special legacy to her of £3000 that would have precluded the application of the conditio. I must confess that I have great difficulty with reference to this question. In cases where an uncle makes a bequest to nephews and nieces, the rule, as laid down in Bogie's Trustees,¹ is that the conditio applies when the testator has put himself in loco parentis. Now, that is a very vague expression, and it is very difficult to say what its exact meaning is. I could have

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1896.
Waddell's
Trustees v.
Waddell.

understood it if it were competent to go outside the deed and examine the facts to see how the testator had provided for the legatees in his lifetime, but it is not relevant to do this, and accordingly the test laid down in *Bogie's*¹ case is whether the testator "in his settlement has placed himself in a position like that of a parent towards the legatees, i.e., has made a settlement in their favour similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make." I confess that I see great difficulty in applying that test. Parents have various dispositions and children various characters, and it is hard to decide according to the circumstances of each case, and with reference to the special provisions here, it is difficult to conclude that if Mr Waddell had been dealing with his own children he would have left such a testament, and on these grounds I find a difficulty in concurring. But the test is so vague that as your Lordships are of opinion that this deed does fulfil its requirements, I am unwilling to differ from you, and accordingly I agree.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordships as to the order in which the questions should be considered by us, and also in holding that the two holograph writings are not testamentary. On the second question, as to the application of the conditio si sine liberis, I originally shared Lord Adam's difficulty, but on consideration I have come to concur with Lord M'Laren, for the reasons stated by him, and chiefly on the ground that I find nothing in the testament to shew that the testator was moved by any other considerations in selecting his nephews and nieces as the objects of his bounty than that of their relationship to him. I cannot find in previous decisions any definite or distinct limitation of the condition which is said to qualify the application of the general rule that the testator must have placed himself in loco parentis to the legatees, except that the person claiming the benefit of the conditio must shew that the testator made the bequest in consideration of relationship, and not for any more special reason applicable exclusively to the individual legatee. I agree with Lord M'Laren that we must adopt the former of these alternative views.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second and third in the negative.

PATRICK C. JACKSON, W.S.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

THIN & SINCLAIR, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Asher—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—John Wilson.

ARCHIBALD ARROL & SONS, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Ure—Napier.

Reparation—Contract—Agreement to give credit to third party induced by fraud—Loss resulting from advances made during a course of years—Measure of damages.—In November 1889, Barber, who carried on business as a merchant, and who had been financed by Arrol & Sons, to whom he was then largely indebted, applied to Thin & Sinclair to make advances to him. Thin & Sinclair having made inquiries, and having obtained information from Arrol & Sons as to the amount of Barber's indebtedness to them, agreed to give Barber "an open credit for £5000 to £6000, and any bills you may draw on us . . . in addition to this amount must be against bills of lading." Immediately thereafter Thin & Sinclair advanced £6000 to Barber, and subsequently during a course of business transactions made further advances to him upon bills of lading, with the result that Barber's account shewed a debit balance of £10,500.

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

In March 1894 Thin & Sinclair raised an action against Arrol & Sons, in which they averred, inter alia, that the defenders had in November 1889 fraudulently understated the amount of Barber's indebtedness to them, and that but for their misrepresentation the pursuers would not have agreed to give Barber credit to any extent. They further averred that Barber was unable to pay the £10,500 standing at his debit, and they accordingly claimed that sum as damages, maintaining that they were entitled to be restored to the position they were in prior to making any advances to Barber.

After a proof the Court assolized the defenders, the Lord President, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear, on the ground that the alleged misrepresentation was not established, Lord McLaren, on the ground that the pursuers were not entitled to be restored to the position which they held before the agreement was made, but reserving his opinion as to whether the pursuers would have been entitled to claim damages for loss by the advance of £6000.

Opinion by the Lord President that when a person has been induced to enter into a contract by the fraud of a third person, he is not entitled to be relieved of the contract by the third party, but is only entitled to damages.

Contract—Creditor's obligation not to "take legal steps" to recover debt.—A, who had been financing B, declined to make further advances, but with the view of assisting B to get advances from T, sent to T a letter agreeing (1) that he, A, should "not take legal steps against B within seven years from this date to enforce payment of the balance" due to him; (2) that during that time he would not sell or foreclose mortgages held by him over B's property; (3) that he would not hold against B's debt any goods sent by B for sale which had been purchased with T's money.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that A's letter did not preclude him during the currency of the seven years from recovering payment of B's debt by other means than those specified in the letter.

ON 22d March 1894 Thin & Sinclair, merchants in Liverpool, raised this action against Archibald Arrol & Sons, brewers, Glasgow, and Thomas Kennedy & Son, esparto brokers there, concluding for payment of £10,500.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

The nature of the action was described by the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) as follows:—"The pursuers in this case are merchants in Liverpool, who, from 1889 until recently, financed upon certain terms the business of a certain Mr Barber who is or was a shipper of esparto from Oran, in Algeria, to the United Kingdom. The result of the business has, it appears, been unsatisfactory, the pursuers being—including interest and commission—over £10,000 in advance, and Barber's ability to pay being apparently doubtful. The object of the action is to recover from the defenders, who are merchants in Glasgow, damages equivalent to the amount thus lost or likely to be so, and the ground of the demand is two-fold—(1) That the defenders, who had up to November 1889 been Barber's correspondents, and were at that time his creditors to a large amount, made or were parties to the making of misrepresentations as to the amount of Barber's indebtedness, by which misrepresentations the pursuers were induced to undertake Barber's business; (2) That the defenders having, in connection with what I may call the transfer of Barber's agency to the

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

pursuers, come under certain obligations with respect to the non-enforcement of the debt due to them, violated those obligations by entering into a certain private agreement with Barber, and acting under that agreement in a certain manner."

It is not necessary for the purposes of this report to refer further to the first ground of action mentioned by the Lord Ordinary than to say that the Lord Ordinary and the First Division held that the pursuers had failed to prove any misrepresentation on the part of the defenders.

The pursuers averred that for some years prior to November 1889 the defenders Arrol & Sons had made large advances to Mr Barber, whose agents in Glasgow were the other defenders, Thomas Kennedy & Son; that the senior partner of Arrol & Sons had died a short time prior to November 1889, and that after his death the defenders Arrol & Sons became anxious to cease financing Barber, and to receive payment of the debt then due by him to them.

These averments were not disputed by the defenders.

The pursuers further averred,—“It was, therefore, in the autumn of 1889, arranged between the defenders and Barber that the latter should approach the pursuers with the view of inducing them to make cash advances to him with reference to his esparto business, and so enabling the business to be carried on, and the defenders to get their debt satisfactorily paid off. Accordingly, Barber, in the beginning of November 1889, called upon the pursuers in Liverpool, and asked them to finance him to the extent of £5000 or £6000. He explained that he was indebted to the defenders, and stated that they were willing to agree to allow the amount of their debt to stand over for a period of years, so far as it was not covered by the then stock of esparto grass held by Barber, and represented by a stock list which he shewed to the pursuers. The pursuers, being disposed to entertain Barber's proposal, wrote him” the following letter:—The letter, which was quoted in full, contained the following passage.—“8th November 1889.—Dear Sir,—We now beg to put in writing the terms on which we are willing to enter into business relations with you. It shall be agreed that the present stock of grass held by you at Oran and elsewhere, as represented by the stock list in the hands of Messrs T. Kennedy & Son, of Glasgow, and dated 31st October 1889, shall be sold through Messrs Thomas Kennedy & Son, and the proceeds of the sales credited to your account with Messrs Thomas Kennedy & Son, and Messrs A. Arrol & Sons. An agreement in writing must be given us by these firms [the defenders] undertaking that, if the proceeds of the sales of the stock do not produce sufficient to pay off your indebtedness to them, they will wait for a minimum period of seven years for the balance. Further, that Messrs Arrol give us an undertaking, by a legal document drawn up in Glasgow to the satisfaction of our solicitors, and containing the foregoing agreement, will not for a minimum period of seven years foreclose the mortgage which they hold on your property in Oran and/or Tlelat so long as the agreement lasts, or in any way to dispose of it unless they have the purchaser bound to fulfil the same obligations, and agree and undertake not to hold any grass that may be purchased by you with our money against any of your obligations to them. We are willing to give you an open credit for £5000 to £6000, and any bills you may draw on us or our bankers in addition to this amount must be against bill of lading. . . .” Barber went to Glasgow and saw the defenders on the 9th November. The defenders agreed to the terms of the pursuers’ letter in all respects, and authorised Barber to write saying this, which he did on the 9th November. The defenders, it is believed and averred, saw the letter he wrote at the time.

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.

Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

"In compliance with the conditions laid down by the pursuers, the defenders sent them an undertaking, dated 19th November 1889, in the following terms:—'Messrs Thin & Sinclair, Liverpool,—With reference to your letter of the 8th instant to Mr Thomas A. Barber, Oran, we, Messrs Archibald Arrol & Sons, merchants, Glasgow, and Thomas Kennedy & Son, merchants, Glasgow, agree—First, that for the amount that shall continue to be owing by Mr Barber to us, Messrs Archibald Arrol & Sons, and Thomas Kennedy & Sons, of his existing debt or debts to us or either (whether on open account or on the mortgage or mortgages held by us Archibald Arrol & Sons), after crediting the proceeds of the stock of grass in Oran and elsewhere, as represented by the stock lists referred to in your letter, we, or either of us, shall not take legal steps against Mr Barber within seven years from this date to enforce payment by him of the balance, but you shall be bound to agree to Mr Barber himself selling the farm or vineyard included in one of his mortgages to us, Archibald Arrol & Sons. Second, that during the subsistence of the agreement or arrangement between you and Mr Barber, but not exceeding a period of seven years, we shall not, without your previous consent in writing, sell or foreclose the mortgage or mortgages held by us, Messrs Archibald Arrol & Sons, over any of the property, whether in Oran and/or Tlelat or La Senia contained in our mortgages. Third, that we shall not hold any grass which may be purchased by Mr Barber with your money against any of Mr Barber's obligations. Fourth, this agreement is subject to the arrangement embodied in your letter to Mr Barber being acted on, and shall only be binding on us during the subsistence of that arrangement, and the agreement to be binding upon the parties for the time being comprising our said firms.—ARCHD. ARROL & SONS.—THOS. KENNEDY & SON.'

"By the said letters the defenders, inter alia, agreed to allow the balance of Barber's debt to them to stand over for a period of seven years, and represented to the pursuers that the defenders would wait for payment of said balance for that period, that the pursuers might rely on them doing so, and might enter into the proposed arrangement for financing Barber, and make cash advances to him as proposed, on the footing that the defenders would let their said claim stand over for seven years. On the faith of the undertaking and representations so given and made by the defenders, the pursuers agreed to finance Barber as proposed, and proceeded to make advances to him, with the result that the latter is at this date largely in their debt. It has turned out that Barber is not able to discharge this debt, and the pursuers believe and aver that, by their transactions with him on the faith of said undertaking and representations of the defenders, the pursuers are losers to the amount of about £10,500, conform to statement herewith produced." "It has recently come to the pursuers' knowledge that, in breach of the good faith and terms of the bargain between them, Barber and the defenders, at the very time when, as the pursuers understood the defenders were agreeing to wait for seven years for the said balance of their debt, the latter were taking legal steps to enforce payment of said balance within the said period. In particular, on the said 9th November 1889, Barber was constrained by the defenders to enter into an agreement with them, which is set

No. 37. forth in letters by him to them, of date 9th November 1889.*

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

The defenders fraudulently concealed said agreement of 9th November 1889 between them and Barber from the pursuers lest the pursuers should refuse to carry out the foresaid arrangement for financing Barber. If the pursuers had been informed or become aware of the said agreement, they would have declined to have any transactions with Barber. The whole object of the pursuers requiring the defenders to wait for their debt, viz., to secure that Barber should be free to carry on his business without pressure from the defenders, was defeated by said agreement. . . . The defenders, in fraud and in breach of their said undertaking to the pursuers, continued from time to time to harass Barber for payment of the balance due by him to the defenders. The result was that from the outset Barber was seriously embarrassed for funds; they frequently cabled him to pay sums; they passed drafts on him; they treated the agreement with him as legally binding, and enforceable at any time; and they refused to renew bills. By these means, since November 1889, the defenders have forced payment from Barber of about £10,000 to account of their debt over and above the proceeds of said stock. In consequence of the pressure brought by the defenders to bear on Barber, he was obliged to use the funds supplied to him by the pursuers in making remittances to the defenders to account of the balance due to them. In consequence of the defenders' said actings, Barber's business seriously suffered, and the pursuers' position as his financiers was most prejudicially affected. Their claim against Barber for advances made to him, amounting, as above stated, to upwards of £10,000 has in consequence become irrecoverable from him; whereas, but for the defenders' actings in breach of their agreement, the pursuers would have been kept safe, and would have recovered full payment from Barber."

The defenders referred to the letters founded on, and quoad ultra denied these averments.

* The following letter, dated 9th November 1889, by Barber to Arrol & Sons, was produced:—"Messrs Archibald Arrol & Sons, merchants, Dixon Street, Glasgow.—9th November 1889.—Gentlemen,—Whereas, in connection with the consignment of esparto grass and wine and other merchandise by me, Thomas Andrew Barber, merchant, Oran, to Thomas Kennedy & Son, merchants, Glasgow, for sale, and with the financing of bills against same drawn by me upon you, and discounted by or through you, I am indebted to you in sums amounting to about £28,217 sterling (including bills on the circle); and whereas, in order to liquidate said indebtedness, I have made certain verbal proposals to you, which it is proper I should submit in writing. Therefore I now submit the following proposals for your acceptance, viz.:—(First) Messrs Thin & Sinclair, of Liverpool, shall assist me in carrying on the business at Oran and Tlelat hitherto carried on by me. . . . (Eighth) The balance due by me to you, after deduction of all remittances, cash payments, and proceeds of shipments hereinbefore provided to be paid to you, shall be paid to you by me at the rate of £4000 sterling per annum, beginning the first payment on 31st January 1890, with interest on balance due from time to time at 5 per centum per annum. (Ninth) I shall forthwith accept and deliver to you bills for £10,000 sterling to be drawn by you on me, payable at Oran, on account of cash already advanced by you to me. . . . (Lastly) Your acceptance of this proposal shall be conditional on my satisfying you that an arrangement has been concluded between me and Messrs Thin & Sinclair, and that they advance me at least £5000 sterling to assist me in carrying on my business."

The pursuers pleaded ;—(1) The pursuers, having been induced to finance the said T. A. Barber, and having made advances to him as condescended on, in consequence of the fraudulent concealment and misrepresentations of the defenders as to material facts, are entitled to recover the amount of the loss thereby sustained by them. (2) The defenders, having acted in bad faith and in contravention and breach of the undertaking condescended on, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers, the defenders are liable to the pursuers in reparation. (3) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the amount sued for, in consequence of the defenders' breach of undertaking, decree should be granted as craved, with expenses.

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

On 27th June 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) allowed parties a proof.

The defenders reclaimed, but the First Division adhered.

Thereafter a proof was led, and on 5th May 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders.*

* In his opinion the Lord Ordinary reviewed the evidence at length, and held that on the facts the pursuers had failed to establish misrepresentation on the part of the defenders. With regard to the remedy sought by the pursuers, his Lordship said,—“I did not hear from the pursuers what I thought a sufficient argument for the proposition on which their claim of damage is rested, viz., that the measure of the damage due to them (supposing their case otherwise to be established) is the whole loss which they have sustained upon their four years' transactions with Barber. I do not say more at present than that that seems to be a difficult proposition.

“It remains, however, to consider the pursuers' second ground of action, viz., the defenders' alleged breach of contract, first, by entering into their agreement with Barber of 9th November 1889, and second, by pressing the latter for payment under that agreement. This matter has bulked largely in the proof and argument, but, in the view I take, I may deal with it shortly. The agreement of 9th November 1889 between the pursuers and the defenders, said to have been broken by the defenders, involved, as I read it, three points—(1) That the defenders should not for seven years take legal steps to enforce payment of the balance due by Barber after realisation of all existing stocks. (2) That during the same period the defenders should not sell or foreclose their mortgage or mortgages. (3) That they should not hold any grass purchased with the pursuers' money (that is to say, any grass so purchased and sent to them for sale) as against any of Barber's obligations. Now, I can find no evidence that the defenders did any of the things that were thus forbidden. They took no action or diligence against Barber. They did not sell or foreclose, or attempt to sell or foreclose, their mortgages. They did not retain, or attempt to retain, as against Barber's obligations, any grass which came into their possession. And this being so, I am of opinion that, taking the terms of the agreement as the measure of the defenders' obligation, no breach of contract has been committed.

“What the pursuers appear to assume is that, because the defenders agreed to take no legal steps for seven years, they were debarred from accepting from Barber an undertaking to pay them off at the rate of £4000 a year, and were not at liberty to press Barber from time to time for fulfilment of that undertaking, or, indeed, for any payment at all. I am not, I confess, able to discover in the agreement of 19th November any warrant for that assumption. It may have been understood (it is admitted to have been so understood, although the agreement does not express it) that no payment should be made to the defenders out of the price of grass purchased with the pursuers' money except in so far as such price represented profits. But it was, as I read the evidence, quite contemplated in November 1889

No. 37.

Dec. 8, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

The pursuers reclaimed.

The hearing was chiefly concerned with a consideration of the evidence. On the question of the damages claimed the pursuers argued;—The sum claimed was the amount due by Barber if the account between him and the pursuers was closed. The sum mentioned in the agreement with Barber, viz., £6000, was the minimum which the pursuers were bound to advance, but they were under no obligation not to exceed that sum. The cause of all the advances to Barber, and of the consequent loss and damage to the pursuers, was the fraudulent misrepresentation of the defenders. The pursuers were therefore entitled to the whole sum of £10,500, and to be restored to the position they were in before being misled by the defenders.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuers had failed to prove any misrepresentation or breach of the agreement by the defenders. Even if it were otherwise, £6000 was the limit of the credit which the pursuers were under obligation to give. That limit was reached early in 1890. The balance of the alleged loss—it was not yet an ascertained loss—was the result of a course of voluntary trading extending over several years. There was no law to support a claim to recover such a loss as that from the defenders.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case has been very fully and carefully argued, the speeches of counsel having occupied five days. The Lord Ordinary has closely analysed the mass of material before him, and has explained his views in considerable detail. As I am satisfied of the soundness of his Lordship's conclusions, I shall summarise rather than fully develop the grounds of my adherence.

The pursuers in argument presented their case as resting on two grounds—(1) Fraudulent misrepresentation made by the defenders in regard to the amount of the indebtedness of Barber at the date of the agreement between him and the defenders, and (2) the "secret agreement." On either of those subjects the pursuers' case has most formidable difficulties to encounter, having regard to their averments on record, the proved facts, and the remedy sought.

that between the profits of his vineyard and the profits of his esparto business (including the rents of his stores) Barber would or might be in a position to pay £4000 a year to the defenders without trenching on the pursuers' money. And in point of fact it has not, in my opinion, been proved that the defenders have, since 1889, either asked or received any payments from Barber which they had reason to know were made out of the pursuers' money. They received in all to account of their indebtedness £3171 of principal and £3469 of interest, &c., the last payment of principal being made in June 1892, and the last payment of interest in June 1893, and there is certainly no proof (indeed it is admitted that upon the materials available the point is incapable of proof) that Barber did not, between his vineyard, his stores, and his business, earn profits at least equal to those payments. In any case the defenders say that they so believed, and give their grounds for so believing, and I am unable to say that those grounds are displaced by the proof. . . . Altogether, even if I felt called upon to go beyond the terms of the written agreement, and to follow the parties into the ethical questions into which the proof in this part of the case largely diverged, I doubt whether I should, upon the materials before me, see my way to a different conclusion than that which I have reached in point of law."

(After stating his opinion on the evidence that the pursuers had failed to prove misrepresentation on the part of the defenders, his Lordship proceeded) :—

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

2. The pursuers' case about what was called in the debate "the secret agreement," stands in a very curious position, and rests, as I think, on a total misconception of what was done, and in this instance done in writing, in 1889.

In 1889, as everybody now admits, the reason why Barber required to go to the pursuers at all was that the Arrols, who had been financing him, declined to finance him any longer. That he was indebted to the Arrols at that date was matter of course, and the pursuers were told that the death of one of the partners of Messrs Arrol was the reason why they declined to give Barber more money, and wanted him to get someone else to do so. It is plain, on these facts, that the Arrols simply assumed the position of creditors for what Barber owed them on the account. In order to keep their debtor going they were willing to make some concessions, which might induce the new financier to come forward. They did so, and in the letter of 19th November 1889 they set down in black and white the specific concessions they made. It is as plain as anything can be that those concessions did not preclude the Arrols from asking and taking from Barber, during the seven years, as much money as they could get out of him by other means than those which were waived for that stipulated period.

Yet, on record, the pursuers have set out that the bargain was that the Arrols should allow the balance to stand over for seven years, and, on record, the "secret agreement" is impugned because it is a violation of this bargain. When the "secret agreement" is compared, not with this imaginary bargain, but with the letter which set out the bargain, it is seen that the one in no way infringes the rights conceded by the other. So long as they kept within their concessions to the pursuers the Arrols were at perfect liberty to make any arrangements with Barber which they saw fit. Examining the arrangement actually made, I think Mr Balfour's observation was just,—that the most of it is in favour of the debtor, and subserved the purpose common to the pursuers and defenders alike, of fostering Barber's business and keeping him afloat. On the question more directly before us, I am of opinion that the "secret agreement" was not a violation of the written undertaking of the Arrols to the pursuers, and that the steps actually taken by the defenders under that agreement were not in violation of their undertaking to the pursuers. There need have been no mystery about the agreement, and had it been shewn to the pursuers at the time they would, as best I can judge, have quite approved of it. Their annoyance at its existence would seem to be due to the ill result of their adventure, and the erroneous impression of their own rights as against Mr Arrol, which misrecollection of the facts has induced them to put on record.

I indicated, at the outset, that a difficulty common to both grounds of action attends the remedy sought. The pursuers' counsel admitted that they have not proved damage, in the sense of actual loss resulting on their account with Mr Barber. They maintained that their true right, they having been deceived, was to have the defenders to relieve them of that account. It is, I think, impossible to sustain this contention. The pursuers cannot,

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

and the Court cannot, create between the defenders and Barber contractual relations which do not exist. Accordingly, against a third party, a bystander, although it may be an interested bystander, by whose fraud a contract has been induced, the remedy must necessarily be damages,—to wit, the loss directly, or naturally, resulting from his fraud. As the pursuers' case fails upon the facts, it is not perhaps necessary to further prosecute this subject.

I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have considered this case with the care which its importance and the extended character of the oral and documentary evidence demands, but for reasons which will appear my opinion may be very shortly stated.

I shall consider first the question of damages. The hypothesis is that the defenders, by fraudulent representations, or by concealment amounting to a partial and untrue representation as to the credit and solvency of Barber, induced the pursuers to enter into an agreement whereby the pursuers undertook to make Barber an immediate advance, without security, of a sum not exceeding £6000, and also to make further advances in the ordinary course of business against bills of lading. The pursuers advanced the full sum of £6000, and during a course of business extending from the year 1889 to 1894 they accepted Barber's drafts against bills of lading. The result was an ultimate loss, as appearing in their ledger account, of £10,500. This sum is claimed from the defenders as damages, on the ground, as I understood the argument, that the pursuers are entitled as against the defenders to be restored to the position they occupied before the agreement was made.

In my opinion, the principle of restitution is incapable of being applied to a claim of this nature, and no authority for such an extension of the principle was or could be cited. My view may be illustrated in this way. The purpose for which the defenders were consulted was to assist the pursuers in coming to a decision whether they would be safe in making an advance of £6000 to Barber without security. Now, if the defenders had guaranteed Barber to that amount, £6000 would be the limit of their responsibility however large the ultimate deficit might be in the trading account which followed on this advance. But the argument is that because the defenders did not guarantee Barber, but only made untrue representations as to the state of his account with them, they are to be liable in the whole ultimate loss arising on a course of trading extending over a term of years. There are two answers to this view, the one theoretical and the other practical. In the first place, it involves the paradox that the liability resulting from a representation should be greater than the liability consequent on a guarantee; secondly, the sum which a banker or a mercantile agent advances without security may be held to be advanced in reliance on representations as to the credit and solvency of the debtor; but what he advances upon ordinary mercantile security, such as bills of lading, must in ordinary circumstances be taken to be advanced upon his own judgment as to the state of trade and the sufficiency of the security. Especially is this the case where the advances extend over a period of years during which the conditions of the case are necessarily altered, so that the alleged representations cannot justly be held to have any application to the circumstances of the debtor at the times when the successive advances are made.

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1896.
Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons.

What I have said may be applied with a slight variation to the case made against the defenders in respect of their having entered into an agreement with Barber to pay them so much a year to account of his debt. If it could be established that the defenders had received payments from Barber which were not taken out of profits, I think the pursuers would have a good claim to have these sums restored to the debtor's estate, on the ground that the defenders had agreed not to take payment out of gross purchased with the pursuers' money. But it was admitted at the bar that the proof did not contain materials for proving that such payments were made out of stock.

I understood the Dean of Faculty to disclaim any argument founded on the immediate advance of the £6000, and leading to an alternative claim of special damage of that amount. I was anxious that this view should be left open for our consideration, because my difficulties as to the question of damage would not affect a claim thus limited. But no such claim has been made or argued, and I shall give no opinion regarding it.

In what I have said I have not answered the question of fact whether the defenders, while professing to make a full disclosure of Barber's indebtedness to them, concealed the existence of debt amounting to about £16,000.

Now, with my view of the duty of a Judge, I never would give an opinion that a party was guilty of fraud in an action in which such a finding could not be followed out to an effective conclusion. As I am unable to accept the theory of estimation of damages which the pursuers have put before us, and no other claim of damage is open to our consideration, I prefer not to express an opinion on the issues of fraudulent concealment.

I concur in the judgment proposed assoilzieing the defenders, on the ground that on the facts as stated the pursuers are not entitled to the remedy of restitution, and that no other relief is claimed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair and with the Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN WOTHERSPOON AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—C. K. Mackenzie —Aitken.

No. 38.

THE BRESCIA MINING AND METALLURGICAL COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATOR, Respondents.—Lorimer.

Dec. 5, 1896.
Wotherspoons
v. Brescia
Mining and Metallurgical
Co., Limited.

Company—Winding-up—Objection to intimation of petition for winding-up—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), secs. 79 and 80.—Circumstances in which objections by a limited company to intimation of a petition by a debenture-holder for the judicial winding-up of the company, which was in course of being wound up voluntarily with a view to reconstruction, on the ground that the intimation would be injurious to the interest of the company, repelled.

No. 38.

Dec. 5, 1896.
 Wotherspoons
 v. Brescia
 Mining and Metallurgical
 Co., Limited.

1st Division.

THIS was a petition at the instance of John Wotherspoon and his wife for the judicial winding-up of the Brescia Mining and Metallurgical Company, Limited, in which they held mortgage debentures to the respective value of £1000 and £500 out of a total of £12,000. John Wotherspoon also held 100 fully paid-up £10 ordinary shares. At the date of the petition the company was in course of being wound up voluntarily, with a view to reconstruction.

The petitioners stated that interest to the amount of £37, 10s. was overdue on John Wotherspoon's debentures, and that the company was unable to pay its debts.

At the calling in the Single Bills, the company and the liquidator in the voluntary winding-up appeared, and objected to an order for intimation being pronounced, on the ground that the publication of the petition would be detrimental to the interests of the company. They were allowed to lodge answers without any order for intimation being pronounced. In their answers the company and liquidator stated:—Until lately the petitioner John Wotherspoon had been a director of the company. Along with the other directors, he had agreed not to present his coupons for debenture interest when they became due. He had accordingly never applied for payment, and the presentation of the petition was the first intimation that he desired payment. The interest due to the debenture-holders, other than directors, had been duly paid. The respondents were willing to pay the interest due. The capital of the debentures was not due for some years. The petitioner had himself concurred in the shareholders' resolution in favour of the reconstruction of the company. The large majority of the debenture-holders, in number and value, approved of the scheme, and the liquidator had presented a petition in order to obtain authority to summon a meeting of the debenture-holders, for the purpose of obtaining their approval in a formal manner.

Parties were thereafter heard on the petition and answers. At the date of the hearing, the interest due to the petitioner John Wotherspoon was still unpaid.

Argued for the petitioners;—An order for intimation should now be granted. Sufficient grounds were set forth to justify the application—(1) There was a debt of £37, 10s. to one of the petitioners which had been due since the preceding July, and they also held debenture bonds over the property of the company, which were contingent debts, amounting to £1000 and £500 respectively. (2) The company was stated to be unable to pay its debts, and the fact that the small sum due to the petitioners was still unpaid shewed that the statement was probably true. Where it was averred that a company was unable to pay its debts the custom of the English Courts was to order a proof. The *Oregonian*¹ case was a very special one, and bore no resemblance to the present. There the company was a going concern. Here it was in course of being wound up voluntarily.

Argued for the respondents;—The petitioners had no title, as the respondents were ready to pay the only debt presently due to either of them. The petitioner John Wotherspoon was a party to the winding-up resolution, and was therefore debarred from opposing the reconstruction scheme,² and much more from taking steps to have the company wound up by the Court. The petition disclosed no sufficient ground for the application. A mere statement that a company was not able to pay its debts was not enough, unless there was a statement of some debt actually due which the company had failed to pay on demand.¹ The public intimation of the application would obviously be to the detriment of the company, especially in view of the delicate nature of the transactions necessary to the carrying through of a reconstruction scheme.

¹ Macdonell's Trustees v. Oregonian Railway Co., June 12, 1884, 11 R. 912.

² Companies Act, 1862, sec. 161.

No. 38.

Dec. 5, 1896.
 Wotherspoons
 v. Brescia
 Mining and Metallurgical
 Co., Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The motion by the petitioners is for an order for intimation and service. Now, I think the Court would not be entitled to refuse that order unless some one comparing to oppose the petition could instantly verify an objection to the title of the petitioner, or could shew some very special reason of danger to the common interests which might arise from the order being granted. Now, the *Oregonian*¹ case was one of the latter description, because there the company was carrying on, and proposed to continue to carry on, such business as it had, and happened to be in a very crucial relation to its tenants, the railway company in America, and the Court felt that, as the company would go on but for the intervention of the petitioner, they were entitled, in the interests of all concerned, to withhold an order which might have in those special circumstances an immediate and detrimental effect upon all concerned. Now in this case, by way of contrast, the company themselves avow that they must be wound up. They propose that the winding-up should be voluntary, and with a view to reconstruction. The petitioner, taking a different view of the general interests, says he agrees that the company should be wound up, but asks that it should be wound up judicially. That is a totally different species facti from that which the Court had to consider in the *Oregonian*¹ case. The question, therefore, which we now have to consider is, whether any special reason has been shewn why the proposal of the petitioner should not be considered, and, in the first place, publicly intimated. I think the case is one in which the petitioner is entitled to have his proposal proceeded with, at all events to its initial stage, and I am therefore in favour of granting his motion for intimation and service.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. The petitioners, or at least one of them, have a title capable of instant verification, because the interest due upon a debt has not been paid, and though it is some days since this petition was presented, no steps have been taken for payment of the petitioning creditor's debt. This might not be conclusive, as the amount of the debt is not large, if it could be shewn that the interests of the company would be injuriously affected by an order for advertisement and service. It is however idle to maintain that the credit of the company is at stake, because there is standing a resolution to wind up the company voluntarily. Whether that will result in a reconstruction is a question with which we are not at present concerned, the question before us being between voluntary

¹ European Life Assurance Society, L. R. 9 Eq. 122; Macdonell's Trustees v. Oregonian Railway Co., June 12, 1884, 11 R. 912.

No. 38. and judicial winding-up, and I do not see why the case should not follow the ordinary course.

Dec. 5, 1896.
Wotherspoons
v. Brescia
Mining and Metallurgical
Co., Limited.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT ordered the petition to be intimated, advertised, and served.

SMITH & WATT, W.S.—JOHN REIND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 39.

JOHN MACKAY, Petitioner.—M'Lennan.

Dec. 8, 1896.
Mackay.

Bankruptcy—Cessio—Discharge—Report by trustee not obtainable—Nobile officium—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 146—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), sec. 5.—Where in consequence of the death of the trustee in a cessio the bankrupt was not able to obtain the statutory report with a view to his discharge, the Court remitted the case to the Accountant of Court for his report.

1ST DIVISION. ON 24th January 1890 decree of cessio was pronounced against John Mackay, dairyman. J. J. Stewart, C.A., was appointed trustee. A first and final dividend of 1s. 8d. in the pound was paid to the creditors. The trustee died on 11th September 1895.

On 15th October 1896 Mackay, in order that he might be finally discharged of all debts due by him before the date of the cessio, and being unable, owing to the death of the trustee, to obtain the statutory report in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 146, and the Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 5,* presented a petition craving the Court, inter alia, (1) to remit to the Accountant of Court to prepare a report in terms of sec. 146; (2) to accept the Accountant's report as equivalent to the statutory report; and (3) to remit to the Sheriff to "appoint the petition to be intimated," and to follow forth the procedure usual in such petitions in the Sheriff Court.

The petitioner stated,—“The petitioner is unable to obtain such a report under a petition for his discharge presented in the said Sheriff Court. According to the practice in said Sheriff Court, the acceptance of such a report in lieu of a statutory report by the trustee involves an exercise of the nobile officium, competent only to your Lordships.”

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 146, enacts, that a bankrupt may petition to be finally discharged on the expiration of two years from the date of the sequestration without any consents of creditors, but it is provided that it shall not be competent for him to present such a petition “until the trustee shall have prepared a report with regard to the conduct of the bankrupt,” and certain other points.

The Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), sec. 5, enacts that “a debtor with respect to whom decree of cessio bonorum has been pronounced shall be entitled, on the expiration of six months from the date of such decree, to apply to the Sheriff to be finally discharged of all debts contracted by him before the date of such decree, and the provisions of the 146th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, with regard to the conditions on which a bankrupt shall be entitled to obtain his discharge on the expiration of . . . two years . . . from the date of the sequestration,” shall apply to a debtor with respect to whom decree of cessio has been pronounced.

The petitioner cited the undernoted case.¹

No. 39.

THE COURT remitted to the Accountant as craved, and thereafter the Accountant, having lodged a report favourable to the petitioner, accepted the report in place of, and declared it equivalent to, the statutory report, and remitted to the Sheriff to appoint the petition to be intimated, &c.

PHILIP, LAING, & Co., S.S.C., Agents.

MINNIE GREEN OR BORTHWICK (Deceased), Pursuer.
GEORGE GREEN (Green or Borthwick's Executor), Minuter (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—W. Wallace.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1896.
Green or
Borthwick v.
Borthwick.

ROBERT FORRESTER BORTHWICK, Defender (Reclaimer).—Salvesen—Younger.

Title to Sue—Executor—Husband and Wife—Declarator of marriage—Breach of promise and seduction—Process—Summons—Conclusions.—A woman brought an action against a man concluding for declarator of an irregular marriage, "but if it shall be found that the pursuer is not married to the defender, then and in that case" for £3000 as damages for breach of promise and seduction. The pursuer pleaded that decree of declarator ought to be pronounced, "or alternatively" that decree ought to be pronounced "in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons."

While the action was in dependence the pursuer died, and her executor craved leave to be sisted as pursuer, stating that he proposed to insist in the conclusion for damages only. The defender objected, on the ground that the conclusion for damages was in its terms conditional on decree of absolvitor in the declarator being pronounced, and that the executor was not in titulo to move for declarator.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the conclusions were truly alternative, and that the executor was entitled to be sisted to the effect of pursuing the conclusion for damages.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the executor of the pursuer of an action of declarator of marriage was entitled to be sisted as pursuer, and to proceed with the action.

ON 15th November 1895 Minnie Green or Borthwick raised an action against Robert Forrester Borthwick, the conclusions of which were as follows:—"Therefore the Lords of our Council and Session ought and should find facts, circumstances, and qualifications proven relevant to infer marriage between the pursuer and the defender, and find them married persons accordingly; and therefore decern and ordain the defender, the said Robert Forrester Borthwick, to adhere to and cohabit with the pursuer, and treat and entertain her in all respects as his lawful wife: But if it shall be found that the pursuer is not married to the defender, then, and in that case, the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foreshaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £3000 sterling on account of the defender having refused to implement and fulfil a promise of marriage made by defender to the said pursuer, and on account of the defender having seduced the pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Marriage between the pursuer and defender, the said Robert Forrester Borthwick, having been duly constituted by promise cum subsequente copula, decree of declarator to that effect ought to be pronounced. (2) Marriage between the pur-

¹ White, March 18, 1893, 20 R. 600.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1896.
Green or
Borthwick v.
Borthwick.

suer and defender having been duly constituted by acknowledgment, declarator ought to be pronounced to that effect. (3) Or alternatively, the defender having promised to marry the pursuer, and having failed to carry out his promise to her, and having seduced her, decree ought to be pronounced against him in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons.

The defender denied both the marriage and the breach of promise and seduction.

On 21st December 1895 the record was closed, and a proof allowed.

On 31st December the pursuer died intestate, and on 30th March 1896 her brother, George Green, was appointed her executor-dative.

Thereafter the executor lodged a minute, setting forth that he "desires to be sisted as pursuer in the cause, and he craved the Lord Ordinary to sist him as pursuer in room and place of the said Minnie Green or Borthwick."

On 31st October 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, sists George Green, executor-dative to the deceased pursuer Minnie Green or Borthwick, as pursuer in room and place of the said deceased Minnie Green or Borthwick, conform to minute of sist No. 8 of process: Finds the defender liable in the expense of the discussion in connection with the competency of the said minute of sist; modifies the same at the sum of £5, 5s. sterling, for which sum decerns against the defender for payment to the said George Green, and allows the parties a proof of the averments on record relative to the conclusion of the summons for damages for breach of promise and seduction, to proceed on a day to be afterwards fixed." *

* "OPINION.—The defender's counsel admits that an executor has a good title to insist in an action of damages for injury to person or character, provided it has been raised by the deceased person before his death. This rule is well settled, and is not affected by the fact that under the judgment in Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum, 20 R. 859, a different rule holds where the deceased person has died without raising the action. Accordingly, if the present action had been one simply of damages for breach of promise and seduction, there could have been no doubt of the executor's right to be sisted as a pursuer in room of the defunct. But it is said that the executor has no such right, because the leading conclusion is for declarator of marriage. I assume that this is a conclusion so purely personal to the woman that, especially when founded on promise subsequente copula, it could not be insisted in by anyone else. Indeed the executor here avows his intention, if he be sisted, of prosecuting the action only to the effect of recovering damages. I am quite unable to see why the presence of this conclusion in the summons should affect the executor's right to be sisted. Once he is sisted he can elect to proceed only under the conclusion for damages, just as the deceased could have done. There is nothing inconsistent in the two conclusions, because the proof of promise in order to establish marriage is of a much more stringent kind than the proof of promise to obtain damages for breach, and the deceased herself, while maintaining the promise to the fullest extent, might well have despaired of establishing it by the writ or oath of the defender.

"Accordingly the executor, in the course which he proposes, need not contradict or abate one word of the averments which the deceased instructed her advisers to make. He might conceivably be met (though I have no reason to suppose that he will be met) by a proposal on the part of the defender to amend his pleadings to the effect of submitting that there was a marriage, but that is an answer which might equally be made although

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—An executor was not entitled to institute an action of damages for personal injury to the deceased whom he represented,¹ but he might carry on such an action if it had been raised before the death of the deceased. An action for declarator of marriage or for divorce was different ; while the representatives of the defender of such an action might be sisted,² the representatives of the pursuer were not so entitled ; the reason being that the status of the parties could not be altered after the death of either.³ The first conclusion, therefore, of the present action could no longer be insisted in, and the second conclusion fell with it as being merely ancillary to the first. Nothing could be done under the second conclusion until the first was disposed of, and it could not now be disposed of, there being no one in titulo to move in it. Probably the defender was not entitled to absolvitor quoad the first conclusion, but must remain satisfied with the practical security that there never could be anyone to move for decree, but whether entitled to absolvitor or not the defender did not ask for it.⁴

No. 40.
Dec. 8, 1896.
Green or
Borthwick v.
Borthwick.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The pursuer did not insist in the conclusion for declarator of marriage, so that the pecuniary conclusion for damages for breach of promise of marriage alone remained. Admittedly such a conclusion, if the subject of a separate action, might be insisted in by an executor. Nor apparently would the defender have had any objection to such a conclusion even when the summons contained a conclusion for declarator of marriage, provided the conclusions were alternative, so that the one might be insisted in without reference to the other. The defender's argument thus came to turn on a highly technical and strict construction of the present summons ; but looking especially to the pleas, the fair reading of the summons was that the conclusions were alternative. The pursuer, therefore, was entitled to take up the conclusion for damages as if the other conclusion had never existed.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—In 1895 a young woman raised an action against a Mr Borthwick. The first conclusion is for declarator of marriage, the second and only other conclusion (which is necessarily alternative to the first) is for damages for seduction. Shortly after the pursuer raised her action she died, and her executor lodged a minute craving to be sisted as pursuer in her room and place. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor sisting the there was no conclusion for declarator. Whether such an averment would avail the defender after closing the record on the footing that there was no marriage, is a different question, which has nothing whatever to do with the form of the action. On the record as it stands, the parties have joined issue on the question whether the admitted connection was mere concubinage, or a surrender of the woman's person induced by a promise of marriage, and I am of opinion that the executor is entitled to be sisted in order to prove that it was the latter, and thus to recover the pecuniary damages which in that case (failing marriage) would have been due to the deceased."

¹ Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum, June 22, 1893, 20 R. 859.

² Ritchie v. Ritchie, March 11, 1874, 1 R. 826.

³ Bell's Prin. sec. 1534 ; Fraser on Husband and Wife, p. 1145.

⁴ Stewart v. Menzies, Feb. 4, 1836, 14 S. 427 ; Robertson v. Henderson, Nov. 19, 1833, 12 S. 70 ; Maloy v. Macadam, Jan. 9, 1885, 12 R. 431 ; Fraser, Husband and Wife, p. 504.

No. 40.

Dec. 8, 1896.
Green or
Borthwick v.
Borthwick.

executor as pursuer, and it is against this interlocutor that the defender has reclaimed. The question, therefore, which we have to decide is whether this judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right, which declares that the executor of a pursuer who has died after raising an action of this kind is entitled to be sisted as pursuer in room and place of the deceased?

On this subject I have already expressed an opinion in the case of Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum.¹ What I said was this:—"I have not overlooked the rule of our law and practice that the raising of an action by the sufferer from the wrong changes the situation altogether." That is dealing with the rule brought before the Court, that a claim for damages for personal wrong of any kind does not transmit either to the executor of the party against whom the wrong is committed or against the executor of the party committing the wrong. "Action raised changes the situation in many, perhaps most, other cases as well as this, and that for reasons quite apart from the notion of discharge or waiver being thereby excluded. The most obvious of these is perhaps this, that the case is there brought within these well-settled rules, viz, 1st, that when the defender in a pending action dies it may always be transferred against his legal representative; and 2d, that when the pursuer of such action dies, not only may his representative be sisted in his room, but if required by the defender, must sist himself or allow the defender to have judgment on the footing of his refusal, which will be effectual against the estate of the deceased which he holds or administers. The effect may seem great and striking when the action has been newly brought, but it has been found impossible to distinguish between one stage of an action and another. This rule of our law that action raised changes the situation is in accordance with, but not, so far as I know, founded on the Roman law on the same subject (Justinian Institutes, lib. 4, tit. 12, sec. 1)—"Ponales autem actiones quas supra diximus si ab ipsis principalibus personis fuerint contestatæ et hæredibus dantur et contra hæredes transeunt."

In the present case we do not require to consider whether the executor is entitled to continue the action raised by the deceased so far as the decree for declarator of marriage is concerned, because the executor tells us that he is not going to proceed with that conclusion of the summons, and the defender does not oppose it being abandoned. I am, however, inclined to think that in all cases where a pursuer dies after bringing an action of declarator of marriage, her executor is entitled to be sisted as pursuer so that he may continue the action. The transmissible rights of the deceased which pass to the executor, and which the executor is entitled and properly bound to enforce, might largely depend on whether she was married to the defender or not. Thus, for example, if a man died against whom a woman had brought an action of declarator of marriage, and after him the woman also died, the executors of both would be entitled to come in and insist upon the action being decided, because the executors of both would be interested in the question whether they were married persons or not. If they were not married persons the whole of the man's estate would go to his own executor; if they were married a considerable portion would go to the executor of the widow. An action of damages for seduction would admittedly pass to the executor of the pursuer who died during its dependence, and it is not, I think, doubtful that the defender would be at liberty to aver and prove that he was married to the deceased pursuer—for that would be a legitimate and conclusive defence to the claim of damages for seduction. It is, I think, a mistake to suppose that a question regarding a disputed marriage cannot be raised, tried, and decided after the death of either, or indeed both of the parties, by anyone having legitimate interest in the question. Here it is, I think, the right of the defender to have absolvitor with expenses from the declarator of marriage, unless the executor of the deceased pursuer shall establish it. The executor's right to be sisted is, I think, absolute.

¹ June 22, 1893, 20 R. p. 873.

No. 40.
Dec. 8, 1896.
Green or
Borthwick v.
Borthwick.

In this case we are only concerned with the conclusion for damages. The question really is, whether the executor of a deceased pursuer of an action of damages for seduction is entitled to be sisted and pursue that conclusion, or shall be excluded from doing so because there is in the summons a prior conclusion for declarator of marriage. I see no force in the defender's argument, and am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right in sisting the executor of the deceased pursuer.

LORD TRAYNER.—The mode in which the conclusions of the summons are expressed creates a difficulty in disposing of the question raised by this reclaiming note. Read strictly, these conclusions exclude from the consideration of the Court the conclusions for damages until there has been a decision pronounced on the first conclusion. Now, on the first conclusion there has been no decision or finding of any kind, and I greatly doubt, the pursuer being dead, whether any finding can competently be pronounced thereon.

I desire to reserve my opinion on the question whether a declarator of marriage can in any circumstances be either raised or insisted in by any representative of one of the parties. But having regard to the averments and pleas of the pursuer, I think I may read the conclusion of the summons as really alternative, and in that view of the summons I am of opinion that the deceased pursuer's executor may competently be sisted to insist in the second of the alternative conclusions, being one for a money claim.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The Lord Ordinary has sisted the executor as pursuer, but he has practically sustained his title only to the extent of suing the second conclusion of the summons, because although he has not dismissed the action as regards the first conclusion, he only allows a proof as regards the second.

Although the second conclusion is awkwardly worded, I think it is in substance simply an alternative conclusion. After the pursuer raised the action she could have departed from the first conclusion at any time and taken up the second. The action was proceeded with because the defender refused to recognise her claims, and the pursuer having died while carrying on the action, I do not see why the executor cannot now take up the second conclusion of the summons. I therefore concur.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

A. LAURIE KENNAWAY, W.S.—CAMPBELL FAILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 41. RANDOLPH GORDON ERSKINE WEMYSS AND OTHERS (Wemyss' Trustees) AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Asher—Rankine
 Dec. 11, 1896. —Ure.
 Wemyss' Trustees v. THE LORD ADVOCATE, Defender (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Murray—C. N. Johnston.
 Lord Advocate.

Superior and Vassal—Crown—Sea—Barony Title—Submarine Coal—Prescription.—In a question between the Crown and a vassal, held (1) that the grant of a barony, with parts and pertinents, cannot, apart from prescriptive possession explaining the grant otherwise, be construed to carry the coal under the bed of the sea ex adverso of the barony lands; but (2) that, if coal below low-water mark has been openly worked from barony lands for more than the prescriptive period, such possession is sufficient to shew that the coal below low-water mark, so far as the same is workable from the barony lands and within the lateral boundaries of the barony, was included in the original grant.

Opinion by the Lord President that the right of the proprietor of a barony to work as much coal as he can under the sea from the barony lands infers a right of property in an area of coal susceptible of definition should the Crown shew an interest to sue for definition.

Superior and Vassal—Title—Grant of coal infra fluxum maris.—A grant of land adjoining the seashore, with the privilege of working the coal infra fluxum maris, confers a right to work the coal underneath the foreshore, but implies an exclusion of any right to coal beyond low-water mark, so that possession of such coal is possession without a title.

Superior and Vassal—Title—Disjunction of united barony by division of superiority.—By crown charter of resignation and novodamus granted in 1651 the three baronies of W., E., and M., which were separately described, were united into a single united barony. Upon the restoration of Episcopacy in 1662 the superiority of the barony of M., which was within the regality of St Andrews, reverted to the Archbishop of St Andrews, and the vassal resigned the lands to the archbishop, and obtained a charter from him. At the Revolution the superiority again passed to the Crown, and crown charters of the whole lands of W., E., and M. were subsequently granted to the vassal. These charters, however, did not re-erect the three baronies into a single barony.

Held that, as a barony cannot be held of different superiors, M. ceased to be part of the united barony in 1662, and that, as it had never been re-united therewith, possession of submarine coal ex adverso of the lands of W. could not be founded on to instruct a title to such coal ex adverso of the lands of M.

Superior and Vassal—Crown—Barony—Union of baronies with different titles—Possession.—A crown charter of resignation and novodamus erected three baronies, W., E., and M., which were separately described, into a united barony, but did not expressly make any additional grant. The description of the lands of W. contained no boundary seawards. After the union of the baronies the proprietor worked the coal under the bed of the sea beyond low-water mark ex adverso of W. for the prescriptive period.

Opinion by Lord Adam that the proprietor was not entitled to found on this possession further than as explaining his title to W.

Homologation—Adoption—Minor—Transaction by curators without concurrence of minor.—The right of a proprietor of estates adjoining the sea to work coal below low-water mark was challenged by the Crown during his minority. The estates to which the minor had succeeded consisted in part of entailed and in part of unentailed lands. The administration of the unentailed estate was vested in the testamentary trustees of the minor's father, who were also the curators of the minor. These trustees, without the concurrence of the minor, entered into a transaction with the Crown, whereby they on their part accepted a lease of the whole coal below low-water mark ex adverso of both the entailed and unentailed estates, and the Crown agreed not to claim damages in respect of the coal which had been worked in the past. After he came of age the proprietor accepted an assignation of the lease, and subsequently applied for and obtained from the Crown a reduction of the royalty payable under, and a modification of the mode of working enjoined by, the lease. When he so acted in regard to the lease, the proprietor was unaware that he had well-founded claims to the coal below low-water mark, and that the lease was the result of a compromise, involving a surrender of his claims, between his father's trustees and the Crown. No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

In an action of declarator brought by the proprietor against the Crown upwards of fourteen years after he had reached majority, held (1) that the trustees having had no right to transact in regard to the entailed estates, their whole agreement with the Crown was null; and (2) that the actings of the proprietor after he came of age, while he was ignorant of his rights, did not infer homologation or adoption of the transaction, and that he was not barred from challenging it.

THIS action was raised in December 1893 by Randolph Gordon Erskine Wemyss, of Wemyss, and others, trustees under a trust-disposition and conveyance granted by the said Randolph Gordon Erskine Wemyss, dated and recorded in 1891, and by Randolph Gordon Erskine Wemyss as an individual, against the Lord Advocate as acting for the Commissioners of the Treasury, the Board of Trade, and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The pursuers sought declarator that (1) the ground forming the foreshore of the sea or of the estuary of the Forth between high-water mark and low-water mark ex adverso of the united barony of Wemyss, including therein the ancient baronies of West Wemyss, East Wemyss, and Methil, all in the county of Fife, belonging to the pursuers, and the coal and other minerals therein, and (2) the coal and other minerals under the sea ex adverso of the said united barony and foreshore thereof, belonged in property to the pursuers as trustees foresaid, and were parts and pertinents of the said united barony, subject to the rights of the Crown as trustee for public uses, so far as regarded the seashore. They further sought declarator that they were not bound by the terms of a lease entered into between the Honourable James Kenneth Howard, one of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the trustees of the late James Hay Erskine Wemyss, dated in 1875, and if necessary craved reduction of said lease. 1st Division.
LdStormonth-Darling.

The pursuers, who were infeft as trustees in certain lands, including the ancient baronies of West Wemyss, East Wemyss, and Methil, founded upon the terms of a crown charter of resignation and novodamus granted in favour of their predecessor, David, second Earl of Wemyss, in 1651, with instrument of sasine following thereon in 1652. This charter contained a conveyance of the three ancient baronies above mentioned, the several subjects being separately described therein.

In the case of West Wemyss the barony lands were conveyed with parts and pertinents, but the charter made no mention of coal—it was neither expressly granted nor reserved.

In the case of the barony of East Wemyss there was a conveyance of the lands “cum carbonibus carbonariis . . . cum speciali et plenaria ptate. et privilegio . . . lucrandi et effodiendi carbones et carbonaria infra fluxum maris infra bondas predict. ac etiam edificandi et tenendi salinarias patellas infra aliqua. partem dict. bondarum inter lie podlockraig et torrentem de Denburne.”

The grant of Methil was with parts and pertinents, “cum carbonibus et carbonariis tam subtus terra quam supra terram.”

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss
Trustees v.
Lord Advo-
cate.

The charter contained a clause erecting the three old baronies into one united barony, but no new grant of any kind was made in connection with the united barony.

The lands of West Wemyss and East Wemyss were never afterwards disjoined, and passed by a regular progress into the hands of the pursuers. The later titles dealt with the coal in substantially the same terms as those above set forth.

After the re-establishment of Episcopacy in 1662 David, second Earl of Wemyss, resigned the barony of Methil, which was situated within the regality of St Andrews, to the Archbishop of that see, and obtained a charter from him. The mode in which the barony was subsequently dealt with was correctly set forth in answer 1 for the defender, quoted infra.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 1) The united barony erected by the charter of 1651 had never afterwards been dissolved. (Cond. 3) It included the foreshore, and (cond. 4) the coals and other minerals under the foreshore and sea ex adverso thereof. (Cond. 5) The pursuers and their predecessors had from time immemorial worked the coal under the foreshore and sea ex adverso of a part of the united barony. (Cond. 6) Upon his father's death in 1864 Mr Randolph G. E. Wemyss had succeeded to the whole barony lands (except certain portions which had been alienated). These lands were partly unentailed and partly entailed, the sea-board of the entailed being more extensive than that of the unentailed lands. The unentailed lands were under the administration of the testamentary trustees of Mr J. H. E. Wemyss until 1879, when Mr Randolph G. E. Wemyss attained majority. The lease mentioned in the summons applied to the whole coal under the sea-bed ex adverso of both the unentailed and entailed lands. That lease was ultra vires of the trustees. Further, the trustees had not in accepting it come under any agreement to abandon Mr Wemyss' proprietary right to the submarine minerals. If they had, they had acted in ignorance of his rights, and the agreement was not binding on them, and should be set aside. Mr Wemyss had only recently become aware of his rights in the submarine minerals, and of the invalidity of the lease.

The defender in answer stated;—(Ans. 1) “ . . . Denied that the said estates constitute one united barony. Explained that the united barony created by the said charter of 1651 was dissolved on the re-establishment of Episcopacy after the Restoration, and the superiority of the barony of Methil, which lay within the regality of St Andrews, reverted to the Archbishop of that see. The barony of Methil accordingly is not included in crown charters of the lands of Wemyss, granted in favour of pursuers' authors in 1671 and 1673. Separate charters of the barony of Methil were obtained by them from Archbishop Sharpe, who, by a charter of 1662, created Methil a burgh of barony. A subsequent charter of the same was granted by him in 1665, on which sasine followed in favour of pursuers' author on 27th September 1665. At the Revolution the superiorities of the see of St Andrews reverted to the Crown. Crown charters of the whole lands of Wester Wemyss, Easter Wemyss, and Methil, were granted in favour of pursuers' authors in 1711 and 1756. The lands, however, were not by these charters reconstituted into one barony, although it is declared that one sasine taken at the manor place of West Wemyss, or upon any part of the ground of the said barony of Wemyss, shall suffice for all the lands.” (Ans. 3) “ Not known as to the extent of the pursuers' possession of the foreshore, No. 41. but explained that the defender has raised no question with the pursuers with reference to pursuers' rights in the foreshore." (Ans. 4) Denied that the pursuers' estate includes the coals and other minerals under the sea beyond the foreshore ex adverso of the said estate. (Ans. 5) Denied that the lands form a united barony. Quoad ultra not known and not admitted. In Ans. 6 the defenders averred that the trustees of the late Mr Wemyss had on behalf of Randolph G. E. Wemyss abandoned all claim to the submarine minerals, and that the agreement to that effect into which they had entered had been homologated and adopted by Mr Wemyss after he came of age.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

The pursuers pleaded ;—1. The pursuers being heritable proprietors of the foreshore and the coal therein, and the coal under the sea ex adverso of the said united lands and barony of Wemyss, are entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. 2. The lease libelled having flowed a non domino, and being ultra vires of the lessees, and having been accepted by them in ignorance of the said Ralph Gordon Erskine Wemyss' rights in and title to the coal and others thereby leased, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second conclusion of the summons. 3. There having been no homologation or adoption of the lease to the effect of excluding the present action, the pursuers are not barred from insisting on the same. 4. The title of the pursuers is sufficient, especially as interpreted by immemorial or prescriptive possession, to carry the minerals claimed in the summons. 5. The possession of the submarine minerals ex adverso of part of the united barony is sufficient to explain the scope of the crown charters along the whole of the continuous seaboard of the said barony. 6. The agreement founded on in the defences does not exist in fact, and separatim, is not binding on the pursuers, in respect that, if made, it was ultra vires of the trustees.

The defenders pleaded ;—2. The pursuers are barred from insisting in their present claims, in respect (1) that the pursuer Mr Wemyss and the said trustees, by entering into the said transaction or compromise, and by accepting and working the minerals under the said lease, admitted that the right of property in the said minerals belonged to the Crown, and barred themselves from afterwards disputing the right of the Crown thereto ; and (2) that the pursuer Mr Wemyss ratified or otherwise homologated and adopted the said transaction or compromise and the said lease, and worked the minerals under the said lease as modified by the arrangements with him condescended on, and thereby admitted and barred himself from afterwards disputing that the Crown had right to the said minerals. 3. Upon a sound construction of the titles relied on by the pursuers, the said titles do not convey the minerals under the sea below low-water mark. 4. The titles libelled by the pursuers do not form a habile ground for the acquisition by prescriptive possession of any minerals under the sea below low-water mark, and separatim, such minerals cannot in law be acquired by prescriptive possession.

On 27th June 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed the parties a proof of their averments in condescendence and answer 6.

The result of the proof was as follows :—On 7th August 1874 Mr Howard, one of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests, wrote to Randolph G. E. Wemyss, stating that it had recently come

No. 41.
 Dec. 11, 1896.
 Wemyss'
 Trustees v.
 Lord Advocate.

to his knowledge that Mr Wemyss was working coal at West Wemyss under the bed of the sea, and challenging his right to do so.

On 24th August Mr Wemyss' agents, Messrs Melville & Lindsay, replied, stating that the matter had been referred to them. "We have accordingly made inquiry, and we now state, in reply, (1) That the family of Wemyss have been in the uninterrupted possession of the barony of Wemyss for upwards of two hundred years, under charters from the Crown; (2) that for more than forty years they have, as owners of the barony, worked the coal under the bed of the Firth of Forth, ex adverso of the lands of the barony, and this not secretly, but in the most open and public manner possible; and (3) that such title and possession exclude all interferences on the part of the Crown, in regard to the coal in question, which can be worked only by means of pits sunk on the Wemyss land or shore.

"If, however, notwithstanding the above facts, you are advised that the Crown has right to the coal under the Forth, opposite to and connected with the barony lands, and is prepared to try the question of ownership in a Court of law, we would be disposed to recommend to Mr Wemyss, rather than enter upon a protracted litigation, to make some sacrifice by paying to the Crown a small rent or royalty for the coal he may find convenient still to take out under the existing very precarious working."

On 28th August Mr Howard replied that he was not aware upon what assumption it could be contended "that the fact that the proprietor of a barony had worked the coal under the bed of the sea by subterranean passages from his own land, even for forty years, entitled him to claim that his barony included the bed of the sea for an undefined distance," and that he must assume that the workings which had been carried on were an encroachment on the rights of the Crown, and that Mr Wemyss was liable to account for the full value of the coal raised and gotten.

On 25th September Mr Howard wrote offering to grant Mr Wemyss a lease of the coal, &c. under the bed of the sea upon certain terms, and after some further correspondence Mr Wemyss' agents wrote agreeing to accept a lease. In May 1875 a lease was executed in favour of the testamentary trustees of the late Mr J. H. E. Wemyss,* by which Mr Howard, as one of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, let to the said trustees the whole coal, &c. under the bed of the sea ex adverso of the barony lands below low-water mark, for a period of thirty years from 1st January 1874. The lease bound Her Majesty in warrandice from fact and deed only. It contained a declaration that "as a consequence, and in respect of this lease being entered into, it shall not be competent to, nor in the power of, the said James Kenneth Howard, for behoof foresaid, or his successors, to raise any question with or to make any claim whatever against the trustees of the said James Hay Erskine Wemyss or their foresaids, in respect of workings by the said trustees, and their predecessors or authors or tenants of coals or other minerals under the sea ex adverso of the lands and barony of Wemyss, prior to the term of entry under these presents, all such questions and claims being hereby departed from and expressly renounced."

The lease included the coal ex adverso both of the entailed and unentailed lands, of which the latter only were under the administration of the trustees. No. 41.

* Under the settlement of Mr J. H. E. Wemyss his trustees were appointed curators to his son Randolph.

In 1879 Randolph Wemyss, upon attaining majority, accepted an assignment of the lease from the trustees, which was duly intimated to the Crown. Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

In 1887 the agents of Mr Wemyss, acting on his instructions, applied for and obtained a reduction of the royalties payable to the Crown under the lease.

In 1890 Mr Wemyss, through his agents, obtained from the Crown a modification of the terms of the lease in regard to the mode of working the coal, and a minute of alteration was duly annexed to the lease.

The evidence shewed that Mr Wemyss was not aware at the date of the above transactions of the terms of the titles under which he held the barony, though these were in his possession, of the grounds on which he might lay claim to a proprietary right to the coal, or of the nature of the transaction entered into between his father's trustees and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

On 22d December 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, proof, and productions, and in respect that it is stated for the defender at the bar that he does not oppose decree of declarator in terms of the first declaratory conclusions of the summons, finds, decerns, and declares in terms thereof: Sustains the second plea in law for the defender, and in respect thereof assoilzies the defender from the remaining conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer, as proprietor of the barony and estate of Wemyss, in Fifeshire, seeks by this action to establish his right to the coal and other minerals under the sea ex adverso of that estate and the foreshores thereof. His case on the merits is laid both on express grant from the Crown, by a charter of resignation and novodamus granted in 1651 and confirmed ten years later by Act of the Scottish Parliament, and also on immemorial possession founded on his barony title. But it appears that in 1875, when the pursuer was a minor, his father's trustees (who were also his curators) accepted from the Crown a lease of the coal in question, which does not terminate till 1905, and that the pursuer himself, who came of age in July 1879, arranged with the Crown in 1887, and again in 1890, important modifications of the lease, both as regards the rate of lordship and the mode of working the coal. The Crown accordingly pleads that he is barred by these transactions from insisting in his present claims.

"I am of opinion that this plea is a good one, and ought to be sustained. I shall consider (1) how the matter would have stood if the pursuer had been of full age at the time when the lease was entered into, and (2) whether the fact of his having then been in minority makes any difference.

"On 7th August 1874 the late Mr Howard of the office of Woods challenged the right of the proprietors of Wemyss to extend their coal workings under the bed of the Firth of Forth, on the ground that the minerals in that situation, unless specially granted away, were the property of the Crown. The matter was at once inquired into by Messrs Melville & Lindesay, who were at that time agents for the Wemyss family, and on 24th August they addressed a letter to Mr Howard, in which they stated (1) that the Wemyss family had been in the uninterrupted possession of the barony of Wemyss for upwards of 200 years under charters from the Crown; (2) that for more than forty years they had, as owners of the barony, worked the coal

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss'
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

The pursuers reclaimed, and after hearing parties, the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor hoc statu, and allowed parties a proof of their respective averments so far as not already admitted to probation.

After the proof, the parties lodged a joint minute of admissions, stating,—“(1) That for more than the prescriptive period prior to 1874 the pursuer the said R. G. E. Wemyss and his predecessors, continuously, and without interruption, worked the coal under the foreshore and beyond the foreshore, under the bed of the sea, ex adverso of a part of the lands of West Wemyss; but the defender does not admit that the working of the said coal under the bed of the sea came to the knowledge of the Commissioners of H. M. Woods and Forests prior to the year 1874. (2) That there never was any under the bed of the Firth of Forth ex adverso of their lands in the most open and public manner; and (3) that such title and possession excluded all interference on the part of the Crown. They then proceeded in the following words:—‘If, however, notwithstanding the above facts, you are advised that the Crown has right to the coal under the Forth, opposite to and connected with the barony lands, and is prepared to try the question of ownership in a Court of law, we would be disposed to recommend to Mr Wemyss, rather than enter upon a protracted litigation, to make some sacrifice by paying to the Crown a small rent or royalty for the coal he may find convenient still to take out under the existing very precarious working.’ In reply, Mr Howard denied that working coal under the bed of the sea on a barony title, even for forty years, could ever have the effect of setting up a right to the bed of the sea as part of the barony. Accordingly he intimated his view that the Wemyss workings had been an encroachment upon the ungranted rights of the Crown, and that the proprietor was liable to account for the full value of the coal which had been raised. At the same time he indicated that the full rights of the Crown in that respect might not be demanded.

“Further negotiations followed and resulted in the granting of the lease to which I have referred, in which the Crown, as a consequence of the lease being accepted, expressly departed from all claims in respect of bygone workings.

“Now, this was unquestionably ‘a transaction,’ as that phrase is defined by Lord Stair, i. 17, 2. Both parties maintained their respective views, but each ‘quitted some part of what they claimed, to redeem the vexation and uncertain event of a plea.’

“When that is the case, Lord Stair says,—‘It is therefore the common interest that the transaction should be firmly and inviolably observed, which both by the Roman law and our customs has been held as sacred and necessary for men's quiet and peace.’ If an action had been raised by the Crown, and the proprietor of Wemyss had compromised it by accepting a lease in consideration of the Crown's renunciation of all claims for bygones, I apprehend it would have been impossible for either party afterwards to set aside the compromise on any ground except misrepresentation or fraud. I do not see that a different rule should be applied to a transaction entered into for the purpose of averting a threatened lawsuit. In the case of Stewart v. Stewart (1839), M'L. and Rob. 401, the House of Lords refused to set aside such a compromise on the ground that a particular point of law had been mistaken or overlooked.

“The pursuer, however, maintains his right to cut down the lease (for that is substantially the claim which he makes), not merely on the ground that his advisers in 1875 were wrong in giving up that part of his case which was founded on a barony title followed by possession, but also on the ground that he has recently discovered the crown charter of 1651, which, as he says, contains an express grant of the minerals in question. I do not working of the coal under the bed of the sea below low-water mark ex adverso of the lands of East Wemyss and Methil until after the year 1874. (3) That the pursuers have right to the foreshore, and to the coal under the foreshore, of the lands of West Wemyss, East Wemyss, and Methil."

No. 41.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

The proof shewed that, although the fact that coal under the bed of the sea was being worked from the barony lands might not have come to the knowledge of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests prior to 1874, the working had been in no sense clandestine, but had been well known and talked about in the district, reported upon by the Government Inspector of Mines, and also made the dispute his contention that, for the purpose of testing a plea in bar, everything must be assumed in his favour. But, even assuming that the crown charter does contain an express grant, it must be borne in mind that the deed was in his possession, and that its contents might have been known to his advisers, at the time when the compromise was made. I am aware that this element existed in the case of Cooper v. Phibbs (L. R., 2 Eng. and Ir. Appa. 149), where the very same facts existed of a man having taken a lease of a heritable subject which was truly his own. But the essential difference between that case and the present is that there was in it no element of compromise. Both parties contracted under a mutual mistake and misapprehension as to their relative and respective rights. One party believed himself to be entitled to the property, the other party believed that he was a stranger to it. Accordingly there was no threat of litigation, and there were no opposing claims which could form the subject of a transaction. The question was treated just as if both parties had contracted on the footing that a particular person was dead, when in truth he was alive.

"If a similar state of facts had existed in the present case I do not say that the mere lapse of time, and the difficulty of reinstating parties in the position which they occupied in 1875, would, of themselves, have prevented the remedy of reduction being granted. But it is a peculiarity here that the pursuer does not limit himself to the case of express grant. He still maintains his case on a barony title, followed by possession, and it is obvious that the lapse of time might make it much more difficult for the Crown to meet that case now than if they had taken action when they threatened to take it in 1875. The element of compromise also makes this important difference, that if the lease were to be set aside the Crown would undoubtedly be entitled to revive their claim for bygones, and that also might be rendered more difficult to establish by the fact that the pursuer has been working the coal under the lease for nearly twenty years.

"The next question is, whether the fact of the pursuer having been a minor in 1875 gives him a right to a relief which he would not otherwise be entitled to. That the trustees were entitled to compromise claims connected with the unentailed lands, which formed the trust-estate, so as effectually to bind him, is clear enough. But he might have been entitled, after he attained majority, to challenge the lease as regards the entailed lands, if he had exercised his right in time. So far from doing that, however, he transacted with the Crown for himself in 1887, when he was twenty-nine, and again in 1890, when he was thirty-two. By the formal minute which was entered into in the latter year, he expressly agreed that the lease should be continued for its unexpired period according to its terms, in all respects, except as thereby altered; and this seems to me to have constituted not merely an adoption of the existing lease, but a new agreement on the part of the pursuer himself, by which all objection on the ground of minority is entirely superseded.

"I shall therefore sustain the defender's second plea in law, and assoilzie him with expenses."

No. 41. subject of scientific papers, of which one was published as early as 1834.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss'
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

Argued for the pursuers;—I. On the question of bar.—The trustees had no power to transact in regard to the entailed lands without Mr Wemyss being made a party to the transaction. Their alleged agreement with the Crown was therefore void so far as these lands was concerned, and as it was impossible to treat the transaction as valid in regard to part of the lands, and invalid as regarded the remainder, it must be held void in toto. Further, the alleged agreement did not amount to an abandonment by the trustees of Mr Wemyss' rights, but merely to their suspension during the period of the lease. Assuming both these contentions to fail, the compromise was not binding upon the trustees, as both sides had evidently transacted in ignorance that as regarded the lands of Easter Wemyss Mr Wemyss had an express grant of the coal infra fluxum maris, and in the erroneous belief that his only title to the submarine coal was a simple barony title followed by possession. The case therefore did not fall within the doctrine of Stair,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary, for the contract of "transaction" was no more sacred than any other contract, and could be set aside on the ground of mutual error, or even error on one side.² Mr Wemyss had not adopted the transaction, for his acts in regard to the lease had been done in entire ignorance, not only of his rights, but of the fact of any compromise having been entered into.³

II. On the merits.—Assuming that the pursuers were not barred, they had a good claim to the coal under the sea-bed ex adverso of the whole united barony, although their claim was rested on somewhat different grounds in the case of each of the three ancient baronies. West Wemyss.—In this case there was a barony title to lands on the seashore with parts and pertinents, followed and explained by open and uninterrupted possession of the coal below low-water mark for more than the prescriptive period. It was contended, in the first place, that a simple grant of a barony with parts and pertinents was sufficient to carry the coal below low-water mark ex adverso of the barony lands. In the case of the foreshore, which was analogous, there was a large body of authority to support the view that it was carried as a pertinent of a barony title to lands on the seashore.⁴ It

¹ Stair, i. 17, 2.

² Kippen v. Kippen's Trustee, July 10, 1874, 1 R. 1171; Balfour v. Smith and Logan, Feb. 9, 1877, 4 R. 454; Bingham v. Bingham, 1748, 1 Vesey Senior, 126; Kelly v. Solari, 1841, 9 M. and W. 54; Beauchamp v. Winn, 1873, L. R., 6 Eng. and Irish App. 223; Cooper v. Phibbs, 1867, L. R., 2 Eng. and Irish App. 149; Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister & Son, 1895, L. R., 2 Ch. 273, esp. per L.-J. Lindley, at p. 281.

³ Cooper v. Phibbs, 1867, L. R., 2 Eng. and Ir. App. 149.

⁴ Bell's Prin. sec. 642; Innes v. Downie, 1807, Hume's Dec. 552; Campbell v. Brown, Nov. 18, 1813, F. C.; Macalister v. Campbell, Feb. 7, 1837, 15 S. 490, per Lord Gillies, at p. 493; Paterson v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 752, 18 Scot. Jur. 370; Lord Saltoun v. Park, Nov. 24, 1857, 20 D. 89, 30 Scot. Jur. 54; Hunter v. Lord Advocate, June 25, 1869, 7 Macph. 899, per Lord Kinloch, at p. 911, 41 Scot. Jur. 513; Officers of State v. Smith, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 711, per Lord Moncreiff, at p. 721, 18 Scot. Jur. 364, July 13, 1849, 6 Bell's App. 487, 21 Scot. Jur. 534.

was true that, in some of the cases referred to, the proprietor had proved possession of the foreshore to explain the grant, but such proof was unnecessary. Although there were dicta in Agnew to the opposite effect, there was no decision on the point,¹ which was still open. A title to lands "bounded by the sea," with parts and pertinents, carried the foreshore,² and the rule was applicable in the case of baronies which were de facto bounded by the sea.³ But if a barony title carried the foreshore, there was no reason for holding that it did not carry the solum of the sea so far as available for beneficial possession, for the right of the Crown in the solum of the sea, within the three mile limit, or inter fauces terre, was of the same character as its right in the foreshore,⁴ and as the owner of a barony bounded by the sea was the only person who could work the minerals under the bed of the sea, the presumption, arising from the public interest, was that he had the right to work them. If, however, a barony title, with parts and pertinents, was by itself insufficient to carry submarine minerals ex adverso of the barony lands, it could certainly do so if followed and explained by possession, such as the pursuers and their predecessors had had in this case. Such a title afforded a good foundation for prescription of regalia minora,⁵ such as a right of ferry,⁶ or of the foreshore, subject to the public right of use.⁷ The maxim tantum prescriptum quantum possessum was clearly inapplicable to the case of minerals, and it had never been applied to them.⁸ To apply it literally would be to exclude minerals from the operation of the law of prescription. Possession therefore was not the measure but the index of the pursuers' right. This principle had been applied in the case of the foreshore,⁹ and it was equally applicable to minerals below low-water mark. The right might be held to extend seawards in the case of an estuary ad medium filum, or until it was met by a competing right acquired from the Crown, and in the case of the open sea to the three mile limit.

East Wemyss.—There was here an express grant of a right to work the coal "infra fluxum maris." In construing this grant it was important to keep in mind that the Crown, having admittedly granted the foreshore, had no interest to reserve the minerals below low-water mark, as it could not work them. The most reasonable construction therefore of the words of the grant was that they meant "below the sea flood, or high-water mark." The pursuers had therefore an express grant of the submarine minerals ex adverso of the lands of Easter

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss,
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

¹ Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, 11 Macph. 309, per Lord Neaves, at p. 332, 45 Scot. Jur. 214.

² Campbell v. Brown, Nov. 18, 1813, F. C.; Nicol v. Blaikie, Dec. 23, 1859, 22 D. 335, 32 Scot. Jur. 134; Young v. North British Railway Co., Aug. 1, 1887, 14 R. (H. L.) 53.

³ M'Alister v. Campbell, Feb. 7, 1837, 15 S. 490, per Lord Gillies, at p. 493.

⁴ Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, Nov. 25, 1891, 19 R. 174.

⁵ Ersk. ii. 6, 18.

⁶ Duke of Montrose v. Macintyre, March 10, 1848, 10 D. 896, 20 Scot. Jur. 317.

⁷ Bell's Prin. sec. 642; Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, 11 Macph. 309, 45 Scot. Jur. 214.

⁸ Forbes v. Livingstone, Jan. 31, 1822, 1 S. 311; Crawford v. Durham, June 2, 1826, 4 S. 665.

⁹ Young v. North British Railway Co., Aug. 1, 1887, 14 R. (H. L.) 53.

No. 41. Wemyss. Alternatively they had a right to these minerals in virtue of their barony title, as explained by their prescriptive possession of the coal ex adverso of West Wemyss, which was part of the united barony. Where barony lands were contiguous partial possession of a subject in connection with the barony would instruct a title to the whole.¹

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

Methil.—The pursuers here relied upon the effect of a barony title with parts and pertinents, followed and explained by possession. Methil was still part of the united barony, the proper means never having been taken to effect its disjunction, and the possession of the submarine coal ex adverso of West Wemyss applied to instruct the pursuer's title to the like coal ex adverso of Methil. The united barony was erected by a crown charter followed and confirmed by an Act of Parliament,² and it could not be severed without the intervention of the Crown. The general terms of the Act re-establishing Episcopacy were therefore not effectual to dissolve the united barony, and to put the Archbishop in place of the Crown.

Argued for the defender;—(1) On the question of bar.—The fair reading of the correspondence which resulted in the acceptance of the lease by the trustees was that there was a surrender by the trustees of the proprietary rights of Mr Wemyss, on the footing that the Crown abandoned its claim to damages on account of the working of the coal in the past. This was essentially a compromise or transaction, and it could not be set aside on the ground that one party had not been aware when he entered into it of all the grounds upon which his right might have been supported.³ But there was no true case of error in fact, for a proprietor could not plead ignorance of the terms of his own title, which was in his own possession.⁴ The cases upon which the pursuers relied were distinguishable, because in them there was no true element of compromise. The compromise was binding upon Mr Wemyss, for a minor might delegate the management of his estate to others, and Mr Wemyss had done so, and therefore could not repudiate the actings of his delegates after expiry of the quadriennium utile. But Mr Wemyss had done more than fail to repudiate the transaction. He had by his actings homologated and adopted it in the most distinct manner, and could not plead ignorance of his rights as a ground for now repudiating it. In its scope the compromise was not merely an arrangement to hang up the question between the parties during the currency of the lease, but was an abandonment by the trustees for a consideration of any claim to proprietary rights in the under-sea coal.

(2) On the merits.—West Wemyss.—A simple grant of barony lands with parts and pertinents was not enough to carry submarine minerals.

¹ Lord Advocate v. Cathcart, May 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 744, 43 Scot. Jur. 500; M'Douall v. Lord Advocate, April 16, 1875, 2 R. (H. L.) 49; Lord Advocate and Clyde Trustees v. Blantyre, June 19, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 72, per Lord Mure at p. 80; Lord Advocate v. Lovat, July 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 122.

² Act 1661, c. 158; Thomson's Acts, 7, 352.

³ Ersk. iii. 3, 54; M'Alister v. M'Alister's Trustees, June 29, 1827, 5 S. 871; Stewart v. Stewart, Nov. 22, 1836, 15 S. 112, June 3, 1839, M'L. & Rob. App. 401.

⁴ Haldane v. Ogilvy, Nov. 8, 1871, 10 Macph. 62, per Lord Benholme, at p. 71, 44 Scot. Jur. 32; Wason v. Wareing, 1852, 15 Beavan, 151; Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, 1870, L. R., 5 Q. B. 449.

The analogy of the foreshore was entirely against the pursuers' contention, for it had been distinctly laid down in the case of *Agnew*¹ that a barony title did not carry the foreshore without possession; the views there expressed had been approved in a later case,² and the point could no longer be regarded as open. The cases founded on by the pursuers merely established that the owner of a barony adjoining the sea was entitled to prevent a party having no title from encroaching on the foreshore. But even if a barony title were held to carry the foreshore, it by no means followed that it carried the solum of the sea below low-water mark, for the dicta founded on by the pursuers accentuated the difference between the foreshore and the deep sea.³ Nor had the pursuers instructed a title to the minerals below low-water mark by possession. The possession had by the pursuers' predecessors had not been apparent, and had not come to the knowledge of the officials of the Crown. Further, the solum of the sea was not inter regalia minora, but was vested in the Crown as proprietor,⁴ and a totally different class of considerations attached to these different rights. Incorporeal rights, such as the right of fishing, or the right of ferry, which was the right in question in the case of Montrose,⁵ might reasonably be regarded as pertinent of a barony where they had been possessed in connection with it, but the patrimony of the Crown was in quite a different category, and the onus lay upon the owner of the barony to shew otherwise than by possession that he had possessed the submarine coal as a pertinent of the barony, just as if he were claiming lands not mentioned in his title.⁶ The presumption was against the grant of the barony being intended to extend below low-water mark, as the Crown had very rarely made such grants. Assuming, however, that a title to the submarine coal might be instructed by possession, possession of a small part could not prove a right to the whole sea coal ex adverso of the lands ad medium filum of the estuary. The analogy of the foreshore did not help the pursuers, for that was a recognised tract of defined extent, but the limits of the territory under the sea to which a prescriptive title was claimed by the pursuers were entirely undefined. Accordingly, the maxim tantum prescriptum quantum possessum was the only rule which could be applied.⁷

East Wemyss.—In charter-latin fluxus maris was equivalent to fluxus et refluxus maris, and infra fluxum maris meant below where the sea ebbed and flowed, or, in other words, the foreshore.⁸ The right conferred upon the pursuers' predecessors, therefore, was to work the coal below the foreshore, and by the terms of the grant they were

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss,
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

¹ Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, 11 Macph. 309, 45 Scot. Jur. 214.

² Lord Advocate and Clyde Trustees v. Lord Blantyre, Scot. Jur. 19, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 72.

³ E.g. Hunter v. Lord Advocate, June 25, 1869, per Lord Kinloch, at p. 911, 41 Scot. Jur. 513.

⁴ Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, Nov. 25, 1891, 19 R. 174.

⁵ Duke of Montrose v. Macintyre, March 10, 1848, 10 D. 896, 20 Scot. Jur. 317.

⁶ Lord Advocate v. Hunt, Feb. 11, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 1, 39 Scot. Jur. 248; M'Intosh v. Lord Abinger, July 12, 1877, 4 R. 1069.

⁷ Maitland v. M'Clelland, Dec. 21, 1860, 23 D. 216, 33 Scot. Jur. 102.

⁸ Straiton v. Scott, 1755, 5 Brown's Suppl. 299; Brodie v. Magistrates of Nairn, 1796, M. 12,830.

No. 41. limited to that coal, and could not by possession acquire any right beyond the limits of the foreshore. The possession had of the under-sea coal ex adverso of West Wemyss could not therefore be used to instruct a title to the like coal ex adverso of East Wemyss.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss'
Trustees v.
Lord Advo-
cate.

Methil.—Nor could that possession be used in the case of Methil. The Act of 1662, which restored Episcopacy, made all prior Acts which deprived bishops of property null and void. There was no special sanctity about a barony to prevent the application of the Act to Methil. The superiority of this barony had accordingly reverted to the Archbishop of St Andrews upon the re-establishment of Episcopacy, and the barony was consequently disunited from the united barony of Wemyss, because a barony could not be held of different superiors. Having never been reunited to West and East Wemyss, Methil was still a separate barony.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which sustained the plea of bar, was but faintly supported by the counsel for the Crown, and they invited our attention, in the main, to the merits of the cause. I do not think that the pursuers are barred by the series of events set out in support of that plea. It is clear that the rights of Mr Wemyss in the entailed estate were not effectually dealt with during his minority, for he was not so much as made a party to the transactions which touched them. Nor does it seem possible to separate the action of the trustees in regard to the unentailed lands from their action in regard to the entailed lands. The transaction purported to be one, and was one; and it is impossible to affirm the validity of part while negating the validity of the whole. Accordingly, I do not think that any rights to the coal in question were validly renounced during the minority of Mr Wemyss.

On the next question, whether the pursuer Mr Wemyss after his majority adopted the acts of the trustees, it is certain that he dealt with the Crown on the footing of his being a tenant. But, while he was thus aware of the lease, it does not appear that he knew of or considered the surrender of rights which led to the granting of that lease; and it is this surrender which he is now said to have adopted. The surrender, such as it was, is contained in letters collateral or antecedent to the lease, and not in the lease itself. Accordingly, the renewal of the lease, or the recognition of the lease, does not bring home to the pursuer Mr Wemyss more than was present in Cooper v. Phibbs.¹

On the merits of the question, it is necessary to distinguish between the lands of East Wemyss, West Wemyss, and Methil. Each formed a separate barony until the year 1651, when a crown charter purported to form them into one barony. For a reason to be afterwards mentioned it cannot be held that this union was operative during the period of prescription, so far as Methil was concerned; but it was operative as regards West and East Wemyss. It is necessary, however, to consider the case of each barony separately, as each is separately described in the uniting charter, and the subsequent titles, and the facts as to possession are also different.

Let us take, then, first, West Wemyss,—what of its title, and what of possession?

¹ L. R., 2 Eng. and Ir. App. 149.

There is here no express conveyance of coal, but a simple conveyance of a barony in general terms, and with no boundary seaward. There has been for the prescriptive period working of the coal under the foreshore, and beyond the foreshore under the bed of the sea, ex adverso of a part of these lands. The pursuer's right to the coal under the foreshore is now, although it was not at first, admitted. The question is, what is the legal result of this possession in regard to the coal under the sea?

No. 41.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss
Trustees v.
Lord Advo-
cate.

It was, however, in the first place maintained for the Crown that the possession had not been open. In a sense this is, of course, true, from the physical conditions. But it was not necessary to prove either that officers of the Crown had been apprised of the workings, or that they in fact knew of them. Apart from this, the evidence shews that the workings under the sea were in no sense clandestine; that they were well known in the district; that they had been the subject of public scientific discussion, and that they were inspected and reported on in the usual way by the Government Inspector of Mines.

If the principles of the law of prescription be applicable to coal, then the possession in the present case seems sufficiently regular, continuous, and open to avail for the purposes of that law. The question remains, whether the possession will apply to the barony title, so as to bring within it the coal now in dispute? This is a question of novelty, and it must be considered on principle.

"A title of barony," says Lord Wood, in a passage of recognised authority (Duke of Montrose v. Macintyre),¹ "is sufficient to include, without enumeration or its being expressed, every part and parcel of it, and every right and privilege connected with the barony, and naturally incident to it; everything, in short, that it may be supposed might naturally accompany and form part and pertinent of a grant of so high a character. Nor does it present any objection or difficulty to this view that the right in question may be one of the regalia, seeing that, as the title flows from the Crown, it is derived from a party competent to grant the right, and seeing also that there is no ground for holding that the Crown would not give out such a right to a subject,"—(a barony title) "being a title which is broad enough to cover the right, if truly intended to be given out, is capable of being cleared and confirmed by evidence of possession of the right having followed upon it, which, if continued undisturbed for forty years, affords the best evidence, and, in law, conclusive evidence, of that right being one of the unenumerated particulars contained in the grant, and conveyed under the general title of barony."

Such is the general law, and the question is, whether it is applicable to the right of working coal under the sea ex adverso of the barony?

Now, first of all, it is sufficiently clear that the coal in dispute was originally part of the patrimony of the Crown, and when the barony lands were granted out by the Crown, the coal might have been lawfully worked by the Crown, and was alienable by the Crown. The contrary was not maintained in debate.

It is equally certain that, as matter of fact, this coal is workable from the ¹ 10 D. 896, at p. 914.

No. 41.
 Dec. 11, 1896.
 Wemyss'
 Trustees v.
 Lord Advo-
 cate.

barony of West Wemyss, and in connection with the coal under the foreshore, which admittedly form part of the barony ; it is naturally so worked, and, what is more, the Crown, which is the only suggested competitor, could not, by physical possibility, work it without the licence of the baron.

Accordingly, it would appear to be every way natural that a right to work this coal, inaccessible to the Crown and naturally accessible to the baron, should form one of the privileges of the barony. The Crown's admission in fact, in this action, proves that, to a certain and substantial extent, the coal ex adverso of West Wemyss has been worked by the baron in connection with the barony colliery. That this has been done in virtue of the barony title seems to be the legitimate and necessary inference from the facts.

Accordingly, I hold that in working the coal ex adverso of West Wemyss the pursuers are exercising one of the rights of that barony. The Crown counsel very legitimately tested the argument of their opponents by inquiring whether any, and what, limit bounded this right seaward, and the terms of the summons fairly justify this challenge. The same magnitude and vagueness of the claim were made to constitute an argument against the application of the law of prescription to a measure of use so small in proportion to the claim.

The true answer to this objection is to be found in the limited and relative nature of the right. I do not think that the pursuers have right to any coal except such as can be wrought from the barony lands. I do not see on what sound reasoning the pursuers could obtain declarator that, let us say, some patch of coal, five miles away from Fife, in the middle of the Firth of Forth (whether isolated geologically or delimited for the purpose of controversy) was theirs, merely because it was ex adverso of their barony. The same objection, in point of principle, opposes the claim to a continuous right ad medium flum of one of the narrow seas (however great the distance), on the part of a seaboard baron, whose right to the coal depends on prescriptive use to a much more limited extent. The true inference to be drawn from the use is, that he has right to the coal which he can get by submarine workings from his lands, within the prolongation of their lateral boundaries. That the words naturally used to describe this right are very much those descriptive of a privilege is nothing against the doctrine, as is shewn by the cases in which such words have been held to embody a right of property in coal. So, I should hold that the pursuers' right being to work as much coal as they can from the barony lands, this infers a right of property in an area of coal hitherto undefined, but susceptible of definition, should the Crown sue, or shew an interest to sue, for a delimitation.

All this, of course, has little practical importance, at least in the existing means of submarine mining. But, in principle, it is necessary to place the pursuers' right upon a tenable basis, and I think that the decree he seeks is too wide, and ought to be limited by the insertion of appropriate words.

In the case of East Wemyss, there has been no possession, and the claim of the pursuers is therefore rested (1) on the terms of the title ; and (2) on the title as supported by the possession ex adverso of West Wemyss.

There is in the East Wemyss title, first of all, so far as coal is concerned, a grant of the coal down to high-water mark, and then a grant of the right of working coal infra fluxum maris. That these words define a limited area is made sufficiently clear by realising that the contrary contention is that they mean a grant of all the coal below high-water mark, and indefinitely outwards. No precedent or authority, legal or literary, was adduced in support of this construction of the words fluxus maris, which seem to denote, in popular language, and according to ideas common to scientific and pre-scientific days, the flow of the tide between high and low-water marks. The words infra fluxum maris seem, therefore, to prescribe and limit the subject of the grant as the coal under the foreshore.

No. 41.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

It was, indeed, suggested that the words were intended to confer a special privilege of working the coal from the surface of the foreshore; but this does not seem tenable. Such a privilege of working coal which, ex hypothesi, had already been granted, would be either superfluous, or, having regard to the public uses of the foreshore, illegal.

In the construction of the East Wemyss title, which I adopt, the baron's right to coal is expressly bounded seaward by low-water mark.

The next question is, Can the possession ex adverso of West Wemyss be held as applicable to East Wemyss? The argument in support of the affirmative was, that the possession having taken place when the two baronies West and East Wemyss were held under a title uniting them into one barony, the possession of coal at any part interpreted the whole title, and was applicable to every part of the barony. The answer, which in my opinion is sound, was that while the charter of 1651 made the two baronies one barony, yet that writ, and all the subsequent titles, kept up the same description of the lands of East Wemyss, and thus limited the right to coal in that part of the united barony, just as much after as before the union. The express terms of the title of the united barony thus preclude the suggested extension.

In the case of Methil there is again (as in the case of East Wemyss) a twofold question, according as it is treated separately, or as it is regarded as part of the united barony which purported to be established in 1651.

If the description of Methil as a separate barony be alone regarded, the case stands thus: there is a conveyance of a barony, and of the coal of the lands of the barony. There has been no possession of the coal under the sea. The question therefore is the pure one, does a barony title without possession give right to work coal under the sea ex adverso of the barony? It was represented for the pursuers that this question is the same as that raised in Agnew's case,¹ that the opinions that possession was necessary were obiter, and that the weight of authority and principle were in favour of the inherent efficacy of a barony title independent of prescription. Now, even assuming that the right now in question is, for the purposes of the argument, in pari casu with that of foreshore, the opinions in the case of *Agnew*¹ must, I think, be held authoritative in this Court; and I was not struck with the success of the pursuers in their attempt to marshal against that decision a superior weight of earlier authority.

The other argument of the pursuers was that the West Wemyss possession might be held to interpret the title of Methil, as Methil was made part of the same united barony under the title of 1651. The answer here is different from that in the case of East Wemyss. The terms of the description of Methil present no such difficulty as arises in East Wemyss. But the fatal defect is, that the union of baronies constituted by the charter of 1651 had ceased to exist before the possession founded on took place. Now, as there is no need to amplify by mere repetition an opinion already sufficiently long, I may say that the true position of the title is stated, with perfect accuracy, in the Crown's answer to the first article of the condescendence, and that this is a complete answer to the pursuers' contention.

¹ 11 Macph. 309.

No. 41. Dec. 11 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

Turning to the summons, the following is the result of my opinion:—The coal under the foreshore was not at first, but is now (under the third head of the joint minute of admissions), allowed to belong to the pursuers. The pursuers are therefore entitled to decree under the first conclusion of the summons, varied, however, so as to treat the three baronies as separate baronies.

Under the second conclusion the pursuers seem entitled to decree of declarator that the coal lying under the sea ex adverso of the lands and estate of West Wemyss, so far as workable from the said lands and estate, forms part of the barony of West Wemyss. There must be absolutor as regards the other two baronies.

In accordance with the view stated in the first part of this opinion, the pursuers seem entitled to the declarator sought regarding the lease, but the reductive conclusions seem unnecessary, and may be dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—The question raised by this reclaiming note is whether the pursuers are proprietors of the coal under the sea below low-water mark ex adverso of their lands. These lands lie in the county of Fife, and extend for several miles along the estuary of the Forth, by which they are de facto bounded on the south.

It appears from the titles produced that by a crown charter of resignation in favour of the pursuers' predecessor David, second Earl of Wemyss, dated 22d July 1651, the three ancient baronies of West Wemyss, Easter Wemyss, and Methil, were thereby disposed to him, and were erected into a single barony called the barony of Wemyss.

It will be observed that this charter is a charter by progress, and that we have not the original grants in the case of any of the three baronies. It is, however, I think to be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that they were in the terms set forth in this charter.

It will farther be observed that while the three old baronies are united into one barony, it is that one sasine may suffice for the whole, but that there is no new grant of any kind in connection with the united barony. The united barony just consisted of the three old baronies with their respective grants, privileges, and pertinents, whatever these might be.

In this charter of 1651, in so far as regards the ancient barony of West Wemyss thereby disposed, there is no mention of coal. It is neither expressly granted nor reserved. The effect of that in law would appear to be to give to the vassal the coal within the area of the barony, whatever that may be.

In so far as regards the barony of Easter Wemyss, there is a grant of the coal-heughs of the same—and there is a farther grant “lucrandi et effodiendi carbones et carbonaria infra fluxum maris infra bondas predictas”—i.e. of the barony. I shall afterwards have to consider what the meaning and extent of that grant is.

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss’
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

As regards the barony of Methil, there is a grant of the whole coal and coal-heughs of the barony “tam subtus terra quam supra terram.”

This union of the three baronies into the single barony of Wemyss did not long continue, because we find that David, Earl of Wemyss, having completed his title under the charter of 1651, resigned the barony of Methil into the hands of the Archbishop of St Andrews as his immediate lawful superior, and obtained from him a charter of resignation dated 9th August 1665, under which he was duly infeft; and the pursuer’s title to this barony is derived from this charter. I cannot understand how a single barony can be held under different superiors, and I think that the necessary effect of this was to dissolve the recently created barony of Wemyss.

It is maintained by the pursuers that, however that may be, the three old baronies were again united into one by the crown charter of resignation in favour of the third Earl of Wemyss, dated 17th July 1711.

The superiority of the barony of Methil had, no doubt on the abolition of Episcopacy, reverted to the Crown, and this charter contains a grant of the three ancient baronies, but they are not thereby united of new into a single barony. It is true that the charter contains a clause declaring that infeftment taken in one place should be sufficient for all the three baronies, but that has not the effect of erecting them into a single barony. The result appears to me to be, that subsequent to 1665 the pursuers’ predecessors held the ancient baronies of East and West Wemyss as one barony, and the barony of Methil as another and separate barony.

I do not think that the recent titles of the pursuers call for any particular remark. They are now infeft in the three old baronies under crown charters containing grants of coal substantially in the terms set forth in the charter of 1651.

In the case of Agnew v. The Lord Advocate,¹ it was held that when an estate on the shore, whether barony or not, is held under a crown charter which does not, by express grant or specific boundary, extend the right of the vassal beyond high-water mark, there is no presumption that the foreshore is a pertinent of the land, but that the charter may be shewn to include the foreshore by such long continued possession thereof as can only be ascribed to a right of property. There is no question that the pursuers are in right of the foreshore in this case, because they have obtained decree of declarator to that effect, which is not objected to by the Crown.

But the question appears to me to be, whether the possession by the vassal of coal below low water for the requisite period will be sufficient to establish his right to the coal there, just as it was held in *Agnew’s*¹ case that possession of the foreshore was sufficient to shew that it was included in the barony.

That leads to the consideration of the possession of the coal had by the pursuers and their predecessors ex adverso of their lands—and to the titles to which such possession is to be ascribed.

¹ 11 Macph. 309.

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

As regards the possession had by the pursuers and their predecessors under their titles of the coal, there is no difficulty, because it is admitted by the parties that for more than the prescriptive period prior to 1874, the date of the lease under reduction, the pursuers and their predecessors continuously and without interruption worked the coal under the foreshore and beyond the foreshore under the sea ex adverso of a part of the lands of West Wemyss, and that there never was any working of the coal under the sea below low-water mark ex adverso of the lands of East Wemyss and Methil until after the year 1874.

The first question appears to me to be, what is the effect in law of the admitted prescriptive possession by the pursuers and their predecessors of the coal ex adverso of the lands and barony of West Wemyss below low-water mark. The coal and other minerals in this barony were not, as I have said, reserved by the Crown. They therefore passed to the vassal as a part and pertinent of the lands. The barony is de facto bounded by the sea. It is not disputed that prescriptive possession following on a barony title is sufficient to enable the vassal to acquire the foreshore and the minerals under it—or rather perhaps to shew that they formed part of the original grant of the barony. It is maintained, however, by the Crown that prescriptive possession has not this effect as regards the minerals, including coal, below low-water mark. They say that such minerals cannot in law be acquired by prescriptive possession. Had the Crown been able to plead that such minerals were inalienable in their hands, I would have seen the force of the argument. But, as we see in this case, the Crown is in use to make express grants of these minerals, just as they are in use to make express grants of the minerals above low-water mark. But as prescriptive possession is sufficient to shew that minerals above low-water mark are included in the barony though not expressly mentioned, so I do not see why it should not be sufficient to shew that minerals below low-water mark are also included therein though not expressly mentioned. I do not see that there is any difference in the nature or quality of the Crown's right to minerals above or below low-water mark. It is said that in the latter case there is no limit seaward, but that does not seem to be material, because the same objection would apply to an express grant.

In the next place, I think the possession of this coal is to be ascribed to the old barony title of West Wemyss. As I have already pointed out, the charter of 1651, which united the three baronies, contained no new grant in connection with it, or with the three old baronies. Any right, therefore, which the proprietor of West Wemyss had to the coal in that barony must have been in connection with the original grant of that barony, and it appears to me that possession of coal ex adverso of that barony can confer no right to the coal ex adverso of either East Wemyss or Methil.

But I think that the possession of the coal which has been had ex adverso of the barony of West Wemyss is sufficient to afford the presumption that a grant of the coal below low-water mark was contained in the original grant, and that, therefore, Mr Wemyss had a right to the coal below low-water mark ex adverso of the lands and barony of West Wemyss at the date of the lease.

From what I have said it follows that the pursuers have established no right to the coal below low-water mark ex adverso of the barony of Methil or of East Wemyss in respect of the possession of coal ex adverso of West Wemyss.

No. 41.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

But as regards the barony of East Wemyss there is an express grant of coal "infra fluxum maris" as it is described in the charter of 1651, or "within flood mark" as it is described in the disposition in Mr Wemyss' favour of August 1879. The pursuers maintain that this includes the coal below as well as above low-water mark. I do not think so. I think it means the coal within the area covered by the flow of the sea backwards and forwards over the shore—or in other words, the foreshore. If this be so then the pursuers have not an express grant of the coal below low-water mark ex adverso of the barony of East Wemyss. But they have an express grant of the coal "infra fluxum maris," and it would be against the terms of their charter to prescribe a right "extra fluxum maris" as they seek to do. They have an express right to the coal within an area defined as bounded by low-water mark, and they cannot prescribe beyond that boundary. The result in my opinion is that at the date of the lease in 1874 Mr Wemyss was in right of the coal below low-water mark ex adverso of the barony of West Wemyss, but not ex adverso of the baronies of East Wemyss and Methil.

But the Crown maintains that the pursuers are now barred from disputing the right of the Crown to the coal in question by Mr Wemyss' trustees having accepted from the Crown the lease of 1874 and by his subsequent adoption and homologation of it after he came of age in 1879, and the Lord Ordinary has sustained this plea. The lease bears to be entered into between the Crown and the trustees of Mr Wemyss' father under a trust-disposition and settlement dated 21st December 1860. The lease includes the minerals of both the entailed and the unentailed lands. At the date of the lease the trustees were in the possession and management of the unentailed lands under the trust-disposition and settlement, and they were also by it appointed tutors and curators of Mr Wemyss, and were in the management of the entailed lands in which Mr Wemyss was infert. It appears to me that in order to constitute a valid lease of the coal in the entailed lands the lease should have been entered into by Mr Wemyss with consent of his curators. Mr Wemyss, however, is not a party to the lease, and it is certain that he was not consulted and knew nothing about it at the time. It may be that the trustees had power to enter into this lease without Mr Wemyss' consent as regards the coal in the unentailed lands. But I think it was not a valid lease as regards the coal in the entailed lands. And if it is not a valid lease as regards the coal in the entailed lands it cannot stand as regards the unentailed lands, as both are let as an unum quid. It appears to me, therefore, that the lease must be set aside unless it can be shewn that Mr Wemyss subsequently to his coming of age homologated and adopted it in the full knowledge of its effects.

Now, it is not doubtful that the lease was a part of and the result of a transaction in respect of which the Crown maintain that any rights or claims which the proprietors of the estate had or might have had to the coal in question were abandoned by them, while on the other hand the Crown abandoned any claim they might have against them in respect of the working of this coal prior to the date of the lease.

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss'
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

The lease, however, does not set forth the transaction. It does set forth that in respect of the lease being entered into the Crown had abandoned their claims in respect of the previous workings; but I do not think that that was sufficient to suggest to Mr Wemyss that part of the consideration for the lease had been that the trustees should abandon any rights they or he might have to the coal, or to put him upon his inquiry.

The fact that he adopted and acted on the lease after coming of age in ignorance of the true facts does not appear to me to be sufficient to prevent him from now challenging the lease when he has come to know the true facts of the case, viz., that he had well-founded claims to the coal, and that these had been abandoned by a transaction of which he knew nothing. But it is said that Mr Wemyss' actings went farther than this, and that after he came of age he transacted directly with the Crown about the lease. He appears, it is true, in March 1887 to have applied through his agents to the Crown, and to have obtained a reduction of the royalty payable under the lease; and again in 1890 he appears to have been a party to a minute with the Crown, whereby certain alterations with regard to the working of the minerals were agreed to. These proceedings, however, do not appear to me to carry the case any farther against him. He acted in the belief, no doubt, that the lease was a valid lease, and binding on him, as he was entitled to believe in the then state of his knowledge. The Crown cannot point to any act of homologation or adoption by him after he came to the knowledge of the facts, and, therefore, I think that this plea of the Crown, which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, ought to be repelled, and the pursuers found entitled to the coal below low-water mark ex adverso of the barony of West Wemyss.

LORD M'LAREN.—I was not able to be present during the whole time of the first hearing of the case, and therefore my opinion is confined to the subject which was argued at the second hearing, viz., the effect of a barony title followed by possession of the coal by workings below the low-water line. On this subject I am entirely satisfied as to the soundness of the view developed in the Lord President's opinion.

It is common ground that the rule or principle which enables the proprietor of a barony to acquire extraneous subjects by prescription is not an absolute rule. The grant of a barony in Caithness would certainly not be a title of prescription to subjects in Galloway. Two limitations have been recognised. First, the property which is claimed as a prescriptive acquisition must be locally situated in such proximity to the general barony estate as to be capable of being treated in a reasonable sense as a pertinent of the barony. Secondly, and having regard to the foundation of the rule, viz., that the subject in dispute is presumed to be covered by the original grant, if this presumption is displaced by the history of the title, or is shewn to be untrue in fact, prescription will not take effect. This second limitation applies, at all events, to cases of competition with the Crown, the author of the grant, and it was, as I understand, the ground of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of The Lord Advocate v. Hunt.¹

The mere fact that the barony is defined by boundaries, or even by a plan, would not, I apprehend, be an answer to a claim of prescription founded on a grant of barony, with the usual clause of parts and pertinents, because in such a case it is open to the claimant to maintain that the subject prescribed to, although extraneous to the principal part of the estate, was originally conveyed as a pertinent of the barony, and had been possessed as such for the prescriptive period. In the case of West Wemyss, where alone possession for the prescriptive period is proved, I find nothing in the facts of the case which can be considered as putting the coal below the sea outside the category of subjects which may be pertinent to a barony. Discontiguity is not inconsistent with the notion of a pertinent. According to the Lord Chancellor's opinion in the case I have referred to, discontiguity is treated as being an element of difficulty only, and as throwing on the prescriptive possessor the onus of satisfying the Court that the subject is in fact a pertinent of the barony. But in the case of an estate which is in fact bounded by the sea or the seashore, and where the foreshore and the coal which is vertically beneath it, have been possessed by the barony title, there is no discontiguity. The coal under the sea is continuous with the coal under the land, the whole being wrought as one stratum by pits and underground passages, serving the uses of the mine as a whole.

¹ 5 Macph. (H. L.) 1.

But, again, it cannot be said that there is anything in the history of the titles which would prevent Mr Wemyss from ascribing his possession of the sea coal to his grant of parts and pertinents. Other title there is none, except the general title of the Crown to all estate which has not been granted or feued out to private owners. The only argument against the title which affects my mind is that the boundary is a geographical boundary which is capable of being precisely ascertained. But if we look to the substance of the thing, the very fact that the general estate is bounded by the sea, and that all access on the part of the Crown or its donees to coal below the sea is cut off, makes it most improbable that any chance of revenue from such sources was intended to be reserved; rather, I should say, creates a reasonable probability that such coal below the sea as could be got at through the workings connected with the land was put at the disposal of the grantee as a pertinent of the barony. This would not, of course, give Mr Wemyss a title to the sea coal in the absence of proof of possession, because there is no proof that the sea coal is a pertinent except what is derived from or connected with possession through mining. But I am here considering whether there is anything in the nature of the subject, as existing or as described in the title-deeds, which would make the claim of "part and pertinent" inappropriate, or which would disentitle the possessor to claim the coal under the description of a pertinent. Now, considering the impossibility of working the coal otherwise than by mines sunk in the adjacent lands, and taking account also of the necessary limitation from physical causes of the grantee's power of working the coal seaward, I think that the coal ex adverso of the barony is just such a subject as might very naturally be thrown in as a pertinent of the land with the coal contained therein. That being so, it follows, in my opinion, that the barony title is a sufficient title to which possession for the prescriptive period may be ascribed, and that Mr Wemyss has a good title to the sea coal ex adverso of the barony of West Wemyss.

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

No. 41.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wemyss'
Trustees v.
Lord Advo-
cate.

I also agree with your Lordships that the effect of such possession cannot be extended to the lands of East Wemyss and Methil, and that the decree must be limited in the terms proposed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinion delivered by your Lordship in the chair, and also that delivered by Lord Adam. I concur in these opinions, and I do not think it desirable, and it certainly is not necessary, to repeat reasons which have been already so fully explained.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Recall the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Find and declare (1) that the pursuers, as proprietors of the baronies of West Wemyss, East Wemyss, and Methil, have right to the foreshore (subject to the right of the Crown as trustee for public uses), and to the coal under the foreshore of the said lands; (2) that the pursuers, as proprietors of said barony of West Wemyss, have right to the coal lying under the sea ex adverso of the said barony so far as the said coal is workable from the said barony: Find and declare in terms of the declaratory conclusions relating to the lease libelled, and dismiss as unnecessary the reductive conclusions relating thereto: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern," &c.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 42.

WILLIAM FOX AND ANOTHER (Carruthers' Trustees), Petitioners (Reclaimers).—Younger.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Carruthers'
Trustees.

HENRY SYDNEY AND ANOTHER (Allan's Trustees), Petitioners.—Macaulay Smith.

Allan's
Trustees.

Trust—Foreign—Statute—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97)—English Trusts.—The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, does not apply to English trusts.

Trustees under an English trust which embraced a heritable property in Scotland presented a petition to the Court under section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, for authority to sell the Scots property. The Court refused the petition on the ground that the Act did not apply to English trusts.

1st Division.
LdStormonth-
Darling.
Lord Pearson.

ARCHIBALD CARRUTHERS, a solicitor in London, died on 10th July 1895, leaving a last will and testament whereby he bequeathed all his property to William Fox (solicitor's clerk in London), and Hester Thomas Carruthers (residing at Westham, in Essex), in trust for his two children.

The trustees named accepted office, and obtained probate in their favour from the principal registry of the High Court of Justice in England. They prepared a statement, from which it appeared that the only asset of the trust not situated in England was a heritable property in Kirkcudbright. The liabilities of the deceased exceeded his assets, and it became necessary therefore for the trustees to realise the Scots property. The will contained no power of sale.

In these circumstances, the trustees presented an application to the Court under section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867,* in which

* The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), proceeds on the preamble,—“Whereas . . . and it is expedient that greater they set forth the facts above narrated, and craved the authority of the Court to sell the Scots property. No. 42.

On 21st October 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) refused the petition.* Dec. 11, 1896.
Carruthers'
Trustees.

The petitioners reclaimed. At the hearing the case was continued, in respect it was stated that another petition by English trustees for authority to sell Scots heritage was pending before Lord Pearson, which his Lordship proposed to report to the First Division. Allan's
Trustees.

The petition referred to was at the instance of Henry Sydney, solicitor, London, and Charles Murray, railway clerk, Selhurst, Surrey, the trustees acting under the antenuptial marriage-contract of James Allan, residing at Selhurst, Surrey, and Adelaide Murray, residing at 27 Cloudesley Square, Islington.

These petitioners stated that Mr Allan had assigned to them under the marriage-contract, inter alia, all real and personal property which might be left to him; that there had been left to him certain shops and dwelling-houses at Penicuik to which they had made up a title; that the subjects in question were the only item of property belonging to the trust situated in Scotland,—“The trustees are English, and so also are Mr and Mrs Allan, and as the property is in a somewhat dilapidated condition, and requires more attention than the trustees are able to give to it, they have agreed, at the request of Mr and Mrs Allan, and with their consent and concurrence, to present this petition for warrant to sell the subjects, and to grant a valid conveyance to the purchaser.”

facilities should be given for the administration of trust-estates in Scotland.”

Section 2 enacts,—“In the construction of this Act . . . the words ‘trusts and trust-deeds’ shall be held to mean and include all trusts constituted by virtue of any deed or by private or local Act of Parliament. . . .”

Section 3 enacts,—“It shall be competent to the Court of Session on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed to grant authority to the trustees to do any of the following acts, on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof . . . to sell the trust-estate or any part of it.”

* “NOTE.—The petitioners are English trustees under the will of an English solicitor, and the estate is situated wholly in England, with the exception of a small landed property in Scotland. The beneficiaries are the pupil children of the testator, but the estate is said to be insolvent. If so, the property in Scotland could be attached under bankruptcy proceedings in England. No such proceedings, however, have been taken, and the petitioners apply to this Court to exercise the discretionary powers conferred by section 3 of the Trusts Act of 1867, by authorising them to sell the Scottish property for the benefit of the creditors.

“It seems to me that the Act is inapplicable. Before I could grant the powers craved I should have to inquire whether these were consistent with the purposes of the trust, and expedient for its execution. I should also have to be satisfied that the petitioners themselves had no power of sale. All this would require the construction of an English will, and possibly an inquiry into English law. That is not the duty of a Scottish Judge under an Act the purpose of which is to ‘facilitate the administration of trusts in Scotland.’ The exercise of such a discretionary power is for the Court to which the trust itself is subject. If that Court were to grant the desired authority, and any difficulty were to arise in carrying out the sale, then it would be time enough to apply to this Court for its aid.”

No. 42.

The marriage-contract contained no power of sale.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Carruthers'
Trustees.

The petitioners also produced documents bearing upon certain procedure which had followed on an application made to the English Courts for warrant to sell. These are dealt with by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion noted infra.

Allan's
Trustees.

On 17th November the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) reported the petition to the First Division.*

* "NOTE.—The petitioners are English trustees acting under a marriage settlement of English spouses. The only trust assets, situated in Scotland, consist of dwelling-houses and shops in Penicuik, which have been bequeathed to the husband since the marriage and fall under an acquirenda clause in the marriage settlement. The trustees have completed their title to the subjects by notarial instrument. They now, with concurrence of the spouses, apply under section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, for power to sell the subjects on the ground (1) that the marriage settlement does not confer a power of sale; and (2) that 'the property is in a somewhat dilapidated condition, and requires more attention than the trustees are able to give to it.'

"The Act itself empowers the Court to grant power of sale 'on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust and not inconsistent with the intention thereof.' The petition does not suggest any method by which the Court is to ascertain whether the statutory conditions exist in the case of an English trust. Nor do I find any sufficient ground for deciding—or rather for assuming—that these English trustees have not already a power of sale either under the trust-deed or at common law.

"It appears from documents produced that in April last the spouses applied to Mr Justice Stirling in London, under the Settled Land Act, 1882, to have the trustees of the marriage settlement appointed trustees under that Act with full power to sell and dispose of the Penicuik subjects, and they lodged an affidavit in that application to the effect that it would cost £150 to put the property in sanitary condition and tenantable repair, and that neither they nor the trustees had the money required; that there were no children of the marriage, and that the settled property was absolutely vested in the survivor of the spouses, that there was no power of sale under the settlement, and that they and the trustees concurred in desiring a sale. On 17th June the English proceedings were stayed by consent, the husband undertaking forthwith to proceed to sell the property and to account to the trustees for the price. I was informed that this course was adopted because the Judge was of opinion that he could not grant the power, seeing that section 1 (3) of the Settled Land Act provides,—'This Act does not extend to Scotland.'

"The petitioners say truly that unless the Scottish Court aids them, the trust will be greatly disadvantaged; and they refer to the English proceedings as instructing sufficiently (1) that they have not power to sell the subjects and cannot obtain it in England, and (2) that a sale is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof. I doubt whether the English proceedings fully make out either proposition; but assuming that they do, or that those conditions can be otherwise established, the larger question remains, namely—whether it is competent for the Court to empower English trustees to sell Scotch heritage belonging to the trust. It was suggested that it was not necessary to decide this question, and that a decree of Court professing to confer the power would be sufficient to satisfy a Scottish purchaser. But I do not think that a doubt as to the competency of a statutory proceeding can be thus slurred over.

"I am disposed to hold the petition incompetent under the statute, on the ground that the statute does not apply to a purely English trust. The fact that part of the trust assets is heritable property in Scotland may give

The Court then heard counsel on both petitions.

The petitioners argued ;—The petitions were competently presented, for the petitioners were proprietors as trustees of Scots heritage, and that gave the Scots Courts jurisdiction, if not over the whole subject-matter of the trusts, still in any question affecting the heritage.¹ The terms of the Trusts Act of 1867 were sufficiently wide to include such trusts as these. The object of the Act was declared to be “the better administration of trusts in Scotland,” no matter by whom held. The definition of trusts in section 1, including as it did trusts constituted by Act of Parliament, seemed to extend the scope of the Act beyond merely Scots trusts. The petitioners Carruthers’ trustees were bound to sell in order to liquidate the truster’s debts. The practice of the Scots Courts was to authorise a sale by trustees in such circumstances.² It was not necessary to get the formal opinion of the English Court that a sale was necessary. That was evident on the face of the petition. The petitioners Allan’s trustees had already applied to the English Court, but that Court held that it had no jurisdiction to order a sale, and accordingly had allowed proceedings to be stayed in order that the Scots Courts might be applied to. The present case was the converse of the case of Lawson,³ when the Scots Court awaited the decision of the English Court on a question of trust administration of English heritage.

No. 42.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Carruthers’
Trustees.
Allan’s
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The two petitions which we have now to dispose of,—the one under reclaiming note from Lord Stormonth-Darling’s interlocutor, and the other on the report of Lord Pearson—have certain features in common, which, in my opinion, furnish adequate ground for their decision.

Both are petitions under the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867. In both, the trustees are domiciled Englishmen, acting under the trusts of Englishmen.

The trusts are, in every sense of the term, English trusts, except in so far as the estate in each case comprehends as part some heritage in Scotland.

Now, the first question is that put and answered by Lord Stormonth-Darling—Does the Trusts (Scotland) Act apply to such trustees to any the Court jurisdiction over the trustees to certain effects, and may enable them to invoke the law of Scotland in matters relating to that property. But the petition, while it relates indirectly to that property, has for its primary purpose, and indeed its only purpose, to ask the Court to confer certain powers upon English trustees. Now a trustee’s powers are measured by the law of what is sometimes called the domicile of the trust, and it is antecedently improbable that the Courts of one country would be authorised, even by a common Legislature, to enlarge the powers of trustees who are answerable to the Courts of another country. At all events, I should expect it to be done in express terms, and not to be left to inference and construction. But further, I think that on a sound construction of the statute this petition by English trustees is not within its scope.

“The decisions which have been pronounced on petitions under the 12th section of the statute (Hall and Others, 1869, 7 Macph. 667 ; Brockie, 1875, 2 R. 923) go far to support this conclusion. . . .”

¹ Charles v. Charles’ Trustees, May 19, 1868, 6 Macph. 772, 40 Scot. Jur. 397 ; Ashburton v. Escombe, Dec. 13, 1892, 20 R. 187.

² Erskine, May 13, 1829, 7 S. 594 ; Henderson v. Somerville, June 22, 1841, 3 D. 1049 ; Graham v. Graham’s Trustees, Dec. 21, 1850, 13 D. 420, 23 Scot. Jur. 184.

³ Hewit’s Trustees v. Lawson, March 20, 1891, 18 R. 793.

No. 42.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Carruthers'
Trustees.Allan's
Trustees.

effect, and especially to the effect of enabling them to petition, and us to act, under section 3! In my opinion it does not.

This matter may be easily tested. The Act does two sets of things; it confers certain powers on trustees themselves, and it authorises them to apply to the Court of Session for certain other powers. Now, the 1st section tells us what kinds of trusts and trustees are meant and included by these words; and then the 2d section begins:—"In all such trusts, the trustees shall have power to do the following acts," so to say, at their own hand; it is an enlargement of the inherent powers of trustees. Now, I do not think that it can seriously be maintained that this section applies to English trustees such as are the petitioners, for this would mean that in a statute with a Scots title, Parliament had altered the common law powers of all English trustees, and had done so in the terminology of the Scots law. And yet this section says, in so many words, that it applies to all the trusts to which the Act applies. It seems to me to follow that the limitation obviously suggested by the preamble and the short title section is implied in all the enactments contained in the statute. An examination of the other sections which directly confer powers on trustees confirms the conclusion that they do not apply to English trustees.

Well now, it is, I think, perfectly plain that the trustees who are entitled to apply to the Court of Session are those trustees, and those only, on whom the other sections directly confer the other powers. The sections relating to petitions to the Court give rise, of themselves, to the same argument against their application to English trustees. For instance, if section 3, the one we have to deal with, applies to the petitioners, it would seem to follow that so would section 7, so that virtually all English trusts would be brought under the control of the Scots Courts as well as of the English Courts.

I am for adhering to Lord Stormonth-Darling's interlocutor, and refusing the prayer of the petition to Lord Pearson.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I do not doubt that this Court has power to grant authority to trustees to sell a heritable estate in Scotland. That would be so, for example, when a sale was necessary to enable the trustees to pay debts, or if there were any other unavoidable cause of sale. Certainly, if this Court has not the power, no other Court could grant a power of sale of heritable estate in Scotland. But then it appears to me that these petitions have been brought without putting the Court in possession of the necessary material for the exercise of its jurisdiction. They are petitions under the Trusts (Scotland) Acts, and I agree with your Lordship in the chair that these Acts postulate the entire jurisdiction of this Court over the subject-matter of the case. We have no authority under the Trusts Acts to determine any question of discretion or expediency relating to an English trust by reason of a part of the trust-estate happening to be heritage in Scotland.

I should not wish to suggest that there is any insuperable difficulty in obtaining the necessary powers. If the Court which has jurisdiction over the trust should make an order to the effect that a sale was necessary, and if the parties applied to the Court of Session, I should be disposed to give No. 42.

every facility for explicating the jurisdiction through our intervention.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Carruthers'
Trustees.

LORD KINNAR was absent.

THE COURT adhered in the petition of Carruthers' Trustees, and Allan's refused the petition of Allan's Trustees. Trustees.

CONSTABLE & JOHNSTONE, W.S.—ROBERT D. KER, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER MELVILLE AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).— No. 43.

W. Campbell—Brown.

THOMAS PARK AND OTHERS (Noble's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers). Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

—Ure—Salvesen.

Process—Count, Reckoning, and Payment—Competency—Claim against trustees for interest in respect of failure to invest trust funds.—In an action of accounting brought against testamentary trustees jointly by certain beneficiaries, the trustees produced accounts which shewed that the trust funds had been allowed to remain in bank for a number of years on deposit-receipt. The pursuers contended that the trust-estate fell to be credited with the additional interest which would have been realised if the funds had been invested on heritable security. The defenders maintained that this was a claim for damages for breach of trust, which could not be entertained in an action of accounting. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that it was competent to entertain the question of the liability of the defenders for a higher rate of interest in the action of accounting.

Trust—Administration of Trust—Interest—Trust funds lodged in bank on deposit-receipt—Liability of trustees for higher interest—Indemnity clause.—In an action of accounting by beneficiaries against trustees it was proved that, without deliberately considering the question of investment, the defenders had allowed the trust funds to remain in bank on deposit-receipt for a period of nineteen years from April 1875, during which they yielded interest at the average rate of $2\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. It was proved that during this period safe investments affording over 3 per cent might have been obtained; but that the expense of investment was saved, that for five years the defenders required to keep money in hand to meet advances to beneficiaries, and that deposit in bank would have been necessary while investments or renewals of investments were being considered. The trust-deed provided that the trustees "shall no ways be liable for any omissions in management."

Held (diss. Lord Young, aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) (1) that the trustees had failed to make a proper investment of the trust funds; and (2) (alt. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that they were bound in their trust accounts to debit themselves with interest at 3 per cent on the whole funds for the whole period.

WILLIAM NOBLE, butcher and shipowner in Fraserburgh, died in 2D DIVISION.
1875, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 9th April 1875, Lord Kin- whereby he conveyed his whole estate to James Noble, coal-merchant cairney.
and shipowner, Thomas Park, merchant, Alexander Watson, bank agent, all residing in Fraserburgh, and Andrew Ritchie, fisherman in Inverallochy. He directed his trustees to pay to his widow, inter alia, the interest of the residue of his whole heritable and moveable estate, and the interest of the provisions in favour of his children who might require a home with her. The provisions to children were payable either on majority or marriage, or at subsequent periods, in the abso-

No. 43. lute discretion of the trustees, who had power to make advances from the capital for purposes of business and education.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

The deed contained the following clause :—" And I hereby declare that my trustees shall no ways be liable for any omissions in management, nor for the omissions and neglects of their factors, agents, or cashiers, nor for the responsibility of them or their cautioners, if caution shall be required, or for the responsibility of the debtors or others with whom my trustees may transact, but that they shall be bound to act honourably, and shall no wise be liable singuli in solidum or for one another, but each for himself only, and for his own personal intromissions and wilful default, and no further."

The trustees named accepted office, and entered upon the possession and management of the trust-estate.

The testator was survived by five children of a former marriage, including a daughter Sarah Noble or Melville, who died in 1878, survived by two sons, Alexander Melville and William Noble Melville. The testator was also survived by his widow, and by George Noble, the only child of his second marriage.

The trustees made payments to Mrs Noble under the provisions in her favour until January 1880, when she claimed and received payment of her legal rights.

In December 1894 Alexander Melville and William Noble Melville raised this action of count, reckoning, and payment against Thomas Park, Alexander Watson, and Andrew Ritchie, the surviving trustees.

The defenders admitted that the interests of the pursuers had become vested, and that they were liable to account to them, and they exhibited to the pursuers accounts of their intromissions from the commencement of the trust.

The pursuers lodged objections to the accounts, in which under objection 7 they stated,—“ During the whole course of the trust the trustees have had large sums of money in hand, but they have never made any investments therewith. They have allowed the money to remain on deposit-receipt or in current account with the North of Scotland Bank's branches at Fraserburgh and Invergordon, of which one of the trustees, Mr Alexander Watson, was successively agent. The sums credited in the various accounts produced for interest on deposit-receipts are as follows :—

“ 1. In the account from 23d April 1875 (the date of the truster's death) to 13th February 1880, . . .	£406	13	4
“ 2. In the account to 18th January 1884, . . .	449	5	9
“ 3. In the account to 11th February 1886, . . .	161	15	4
“ 4. In the account to 28th February 1891, . . .	193	11	3
“ 5. In the account to 20th January 1894, . . .	43	19	1

£1255 4 9

“ It was the duty of the trustees to have invested the trust funds, and if they had done so on good heritable securities interest at the average rate at the least of 4 per cent per annum could have been realised.”

The pursuers further stated that there thus remained a sum of £930, 7s. 11d. under-credited for interest on the trust funds which the defenders were liable to make good.

The defenders answered ;—“ Denied. The trustees have accounted for all the money received by them. There is no direction given in the deed of settlement to invest the funds. The beneficiaries knew of the sums lodged in bank, and never made any objection thereto. Mrs Noble and George Noble docketed and approved of the account ending February 1891. At first, and until the widow declared her option between the provisions of the settlement and claiming her legal rights, the trustees could not do otherwise than have the money deposited in bank. Mrs Noble approved of that course. Thereafter it was convenient to have it in bank to be ready for making payments to the beneficiaries. Further, the law-agents of the trustees informed them that they could not get any suitable investment for the money. The claim for a difference of interest beyond what the trustees received is not relevant.”

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

The defenders further founded on the indemnity clause of the trust-deed.

It appeared from a proof that during the periods of the five accounts the largest sums in bank on deposit-receipt were respectively £4500, £4400, £3900, £2450, £1300. Mr J. A. Robertson, C.A., Edinburgh, deponed that during the period of these accounts the rate of interest actually earned was 2½ per cent, that the funds might have been safely invested on heritable security at 4 per cent interest, and that if they had been invested in consols the average rate of interest would have been 2½ per cent, besides an increase of capital from the rise in the price of consols. Mr R. C. Millar, C.A., Edinburgh, gave similar evidence.

On 23d July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—“ Finds (1) that it was the duty of the trustees to invest the funds of the estate, where practicable, in safe investments profitable to the estate; (2) that there was no difficulty in so investing the said funds; (3) that the trustees failed in so investing the said funds; (4) that they thereby lost to the estate the sum of £881, 0s. 1d., as shewn in the state No. 112 of process; (5) that the said trustees are bound to make good the said sum to the estate as at 1st January 1894.”*

* “OPINION.—The principal question discussed at last debate was that raised on objection 7 to the trustees' accounts by the pursuers Alexander Melville and William Noble Melville, sons of Sarah Noble or Melville, a daughter of the truster, William Noble. The objection is that the trustees were bound to have invested the trust-estate so as to have produced an adequate return in the form of interest, and were not entitled to keep the money in bank on deposit-receipt as they had done, and were bound to debit themselves with the difference between such interest as might have been obtained from a prudent and safe investment and the interest which they have obtained from the bank. The pursuers are not said to be in any way barred or precluded from stating this objection. It is admitted that the funds were not invested, but the trustees explain on record that until the widow declared her option to claim her legal rights, they could not do otherwise than have the money deposited in bank; that it was afterwards convenient to have it in bank, that they might be ready to make payments to the beneficiaries, and that the law-agents of the trustees informed them that they could not get any suitable investment. These reasons or excuses are, however, wholly unsupported by the proof, and they were hardly maintained in the argument. I think it is clearly proved that there was no exceptional difficulty about investing, and that the greater part of the trust funds might have been invested safely at four per cent; and the witness Mr Robertson, C.A., has prepared a state purporting to shew that

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had found them guilty of negligence for keeping the trust funds on deposit-receipt instead of investing them in stock. This ground of judgment was incompetent in this action. It was not found within the conclusions of the summons. The action was directed against the defenders jointly for a simple accounting. If the pursuers had wished to make them liable for negligence they should have called them as individuals.¹ The defenders were not even called conjunctly and severally, and therefore could not be found liable as individuals.² Here their only duty was to account. They had done so, but the pursuers desired to import into the action a question of breach of trust. If the income was open to objection the remedy of the pursuers was an action of damages for improper investment. The necessity of making trustees parties in their individual capacity, in order to try such questions of liability, had been already recognised.³

if the funds had been duly invested, leaving sufficient sums on deposit to meet occasional requirements, there would have been on 26th January 1894 a return of interest of £881, 0s. 1d. more than the trustees had actually drawn on the bank deposits at that date. That is to say, that that amount would have been gained to the estate. The correctness of that state has not been challenged, and it, with the evidence of Mr Robertson and Mr Millar, affords the only proof before me on the point. There appear to be no reported cases as to the liability of trustees who have simply lodged their money in bank to account for interest at the rates procurable on proper trust investments. There have been cases where trustees have been held liable for money allowed to remain in bank, and lost through the failure of the bank—Cann v. Cann, 33 Weekly Reports, p. 40; Lewin on Trusts, 9th ed. 315. Such cases stand on a different principle. It is, however, a settled rule that trustees who fail to invest the trust-estate shall be charged with interest at a rate not below 4 per cent—Jones v. Foxall, 1852, 15 Beav. 388; Williams v. Powell, 1852, 15 Beav. 461; Lewin on Trusts, pp. 315, 326; McLaren on Wills, sec. 2254. I think this rule equally applicable where the trustees have without good reason allowed the trust funds to remain on deposit-receipt. The rule as to the duties of trustees is that they are bound to manage the trust-estate with the care and prudence with which reasonable men manage their own affairs; and certainly no one managing his affairs with ordinary prudence, would allow his capital to lie in bank on deposit-receipt. I think that the rule applicable to funds which have not been invested at all is applicable in principle to the case of trust funds left, without excuse, permanently in bank. The defenders appeal to the clause of indemnity, which is no doubt wide and liberal, but still does not differ materially from the usual clause of indemnity in trust-deeds. But I think they are not in a position to avail themselves of that clause. Their neglect of the trust appears proved. There seems to have been no meeting of the trustees at all after 1880. It does not appear that they ever considered the question of investments. They left the management entirely in the hands of their factor and co-trustee, who paid no more attention to this question than they did. In these circumstances, I think that they cannot be protected by the clause of indemnity. It is, of course, always to be much regretted when gratuitous trustees are made to answer for the mismanagement of the estate, but in this case the result seems unavoidable, and I am of opinion that on this point the pursuers must succeed. . . ."

¹ Pearson v. Houston's Trustees, Jan. 29, 1868, 6 Macph. 286, 40 Scot. Jur. 156.

² Carruthers v. Hall, Nov. 25, 1830, 9 S. 66.

³ Donaldson v. Findlay, March 3, 1860, 22 D. 937, 32 Scot. Jur. 398; Cochrane v. Black, Feb. 1, 1855, 17 D. 321, 27 Scot. Jur. 139.

This was an objection of importance. The trustees had lodged a joint defence because they had the same interest as trustees to produce the sum presently in their hands, but it did not follow that their interests as individuals were identical. Their cases might be entirely separate. If a trustee had been assumed subsequent to the alleged acts of negligence it would be unjust to subject him to personal liability under a general summons. The various items of charge might raise questions of varying liability, to cover which the trustees must be called individually. When sued as a body they were only bound to account for what had actually come into their hands, and not for what might have come. (2) In point of fact, the defenders had invested the money by depositing it in bank. It was a loan to the bank which the receiver acknowledged by an obligation to repay the principal and interest thereon. It was an investment on the highest form of security, and the capital was realisable at once. In the peculiar circumstances of this trust this was a desirable feature. (3) Even if such deposit could not be regarded as an investment, the defenders were protected from liability under this head by the indemnity clause. Assuming omission to invest, or error of judgment on their part, they were specially protected against such. The pursuers relied on cases where trustees had not escaped liability in spite of the existence of an indemnity clause, but in all of these part of the capital had been lost. There were four categories under which trustees had been found liable—1. For bad investments; 2, neglect to supervise agents; 3, keeping trust funds in their own hands; 4, where no investment had been made, e.g., where funds had been kept on current account. But there was no instance in which they had been held liable for the difference between a good investment and one which would have yielded a larger return. The instances cited by the pursuers were plain cases of culpa lata. In *Carruthers v. Carruthers*¹ the trustees had committed a breach of a distinct direction of the truster. It was doubtful if they would have been liable at common law. In *Seton*² and *Rae v. Meek*³ the trustees had been guilty of gross negligence. All these cases occupied a different region from the present. The defenders could not be convicted of culpa lata. They had disobeyed no direction, and they had preserved the capital entire. The point of the accusation amounted to this, that whereas they had earned 2½ per cent, they might have earned 2¾ per cent if they had invested in consols. In such circumstances, it was irrelevant to allege that the defenders had not met to discuss investments. They had been guided by the defender Watson, whose position and experience were sufficient guarantees for the course taken, and they had acted prudently in doing so. (4) Assuming liability, 4 per cent was too high a rate of interest. The defenders were gratuitous trustees, and were entitled to have liability calculated upon the lowest rate of recognised trust investment. 3 per cent had been held a reasonable rate,⁴ and in that case the trustees had improperly paid away certain of the trust funds. It was thus a fortiori of the present. (5) In any case, the Lord Ordinary's judgment must be

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.¹ Carruthers v. Carruthers, July 13, 1896, 23 R. (H. L.) 51.² Seton v. Dawson, Dec. 18, 1841, 4 D. 310, 14 Scot. Jur. 115.³ Rae v. Meek, July 19, 1888, 15 R. 1033.⁴ Heritable Securities Investment Association, Limited, v. Miller's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1892, 20 R. 675.

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

restricted. He found that the defenders should have invested in heritable securities. This was too narrow. Further, his judgment applied to the whole estate and all the beneficiaries, whereas the action applied only to one-third of the estate, and the trustees could state a different defence against the other beneficiaries who were contented with the investment, and had docketed the accounts.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The conclusions were directed against the defenders as trustees, because that was the only character in which they were responsible to the pursuers. The question of liability for larger interest arose fairly in an action of accounting. The object of the action was to ascertain the balance due. That was impossible without solving the question of liability for a larger balance than the defenders offered. If the defenders' argument were sound then even in a case of embezzlement trustees would escape liability unless there were personal conclusions against them. But any question of personal liability arising in an accounting might competently be decided,¹ and in that case there were no personal conclusions. When trustees had held funds for years, interest thereon was a part of the estate for which they must account. [LORD TRAYNER.—The question was, where trustees had intromitted with funds, whether reasonable commercial profits were due by them.] There was authority in point.² Where trustees produce accounts, even though these are correct, they will not be discharged unless the Court fully approves of their course of dealing.³ (2) To lodge money on deposit-receipt was not investment. It ought to have been only a temporary deposit till investment was made. There was no contract to pay interest on the deposit, and the bank might have altered or ended interest altogether. Although the capital was thus kept safe no prudent man would have been content with such investment.⁴ Assuming it was an investment, it was only on personal security, and as such was not an investment under the Trusts Acts. (3) The indemnity clause afforded no protection to trustees who had violated a duty undertaken. Trustees must keep a via media. They might not select speculative investments, but they might not altogether fail to invest. Their duty was to discover a reasonable investment. Here they never had applied their minds to the question of investment, and although the terms of the clause seemed to be grammatically wide enough to secure them, the construction by the Court of such clauses was that although they conferred a certain immunity upon trustees who acted honestly, they did not protect trustees who stood by and did not act at all.⁵ (4) Where there had been violation of duty the Court would not allow the lowest rate of interest on the highest class of trust investment, but a rate of interest obtainable from a fair and reasonable investment. At anyrate after 1884 there was a very large field, and 4 per cent could easily and safely have been got. The short result of the cases appeared to be,—1. Where trustees kept money in their own hands they were liable for 4 per cent.⁶ 2. If they used money in their own business, they were

¹ Cochrane v. Black, Feb. 1, 1855, 17 D. 321, 27 Scot. Jur. 139.

² Donaldson v. Finlay, Bannatyne, & Co., March 3, 1860, 22 D. 937, 32 Scot. Jur. 398.

³ Forman v. Burns, Feb. 2, 1853, 15 D. 362, 25 Scot. Jur. 221, 3 Stuart, 194.

⁴ Kennedy v. Kennedy, Dec. 9, 1884, 12 R. 275.

⁵ Knox v. Mackinnon, Aug. 7, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 83.

⁶ Jones v. Foxall, 1852, 15 Beavan, 392, per Romilly, M. R.

liable for 5 per cent compound interest. 3. If in mora in paying No. 43; beneficiaries they were liable for 5 per cent interest.¹

At advising.—

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question now before us is whether the trustees are liable to bring into the trust accounting a return for funds in their hands greater than the interest on deposit-receipt with which they debit themselves. I do not consider it necessary to say anything upon the argument addressed to us to the effect that the trustees being only called as such, the pursuer cannot maintain the case against him. The question now before us is truly one of the balance to be brought out in the trust accounts, on a true accounting. Are they liable, as I have said, to bring into the accounting what are the proper profits of sums in their hands? I am of opinion that the trustees are so liable. Trustees holding trust funds should invest them so as to yield an investment return. I cannot hold that they so invest them by placing them on deposit-receipt with a bank. It is true that many private individuals often keep large sums on deposit-receipt for long periods, but this cannot be called an investment in the usual sense of that term. There is no stipulated return. The interest to be paid may fluctuate at the will of the holders of the money, and it is never equal to the amount which ordinary and recognised investment yields. But had the trustees really addressed their minds to the question of investment and given it consideration, and resolved to keep the trust funds on deposit-receipt, there would have been a great deal to say for the view that if they were wrong it was an omission from error of judgment, and that they might plausibly appeal to the indemnity clause. I do not say that would have exonerated them, but at least they would have shewn intention to do their duty. But here they did not as trustees exercise their judgment. They just let matters slide for twenty years, without giving their duty any consideration. I must therefore hold that they were in breach of the duty they had undertaken in accepting the trust to manage it for the beneficiaries so as to make the capital yield a return from investment.

This being so, the question is, what in the circumstances must be held to be the return that with such management they would have obtained. On this question I am unable to hold that their liability can be tested by merely taking the investment which yields the lowest rate of return, among those investments which were open to them, viz., consols, and ascertain how much consols have yielded for the period in question. I think the question must be decided by considering what they might have got consistently with sound trust management. The Lord Ordinary has fixed the amount at 4 per cent. That, as it appears to me, is too high for the period in question. It is distinctly higher than could have been obtained during the period on first-class heritable securities. And further, the trustees say with some force that (1) the expense of investment was saved; (2) they should be credited with time for making investments; and (3) that for five years at least they required to keep money in hand, as they had large payments to make in the way of advance to beneficiaries. I would suggest to your Lordships that the justice of the case would be met

¹ Ross v. Ross, June 16, 1896, 23 R. 802.

No. 43. by their being charged with 3 per cent interest for the whole period of the trust.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

It is of course only in a question with the present pursuer, and with a view to ascertaining what is payable to him as his share, that this question is decided at present. It will be open to the trustees, in any after question with other beneficiaries, to maintain any plea of bar they may have against them, based upon their knowledge and acquiescence in what was done.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a count and reckoning brought in 1894 against the testamentary trustees of a butcher in Fraserburgh who died in 1875. The pursuers are two of the beneficiaries in the trust. The defenders admit liability to account, and have lodged accounts and vouchers accordingly. The only question argued to us and which we have to consider is that which is raised by the seventh objection by the pursuers to the defenders' accounts. It is whether testamentary trustees who deposit trust money in bank are under any circumstances, or at least under those which occur here, liable to account for more interest than the money yielded at the bank deposit rates.

I think we may take judicial cognisance of the fact that the bank deposit rate of interest is periodically fixed and published by the public banks acting in concert, and that any reduction or rise is immediately announced.

The defenders' intromissions are specified in five accounts. No. 1 embraces the period from 1875 to 1880, No. 2 from 1880 to 1884, No. 3 from 1884 to 1886, No. 4 from 1886 to 1891, and No. 5 from 1891 to 1894. We must consider the question before us on the footing that the accounts are satisfactory, subject only to that question.

The highest amounts in bank on deposit during the period of the first account, was £4500, of the second, £4400, of the third, £3900, of the fourth, £1337, and of the fifth, £1300. It is admitted that the money was all along in perfect safety, and that the defenders have well accounted for it, together with the interest (bank deposit interest) received therefor.

The pursuers' seventh objection (the only one for consideration) is that the defenders ought "to have invested the trust funds, and if they had done so on good heritable securities interest at the average rate at the least of 4 per cent per annum could have been realised." Their case, of course, (and necessarily) is that by putting and keeping the trust money in bank to the extent which they did, instead of investing it on heritable (or other) security at a higher rate of interest than bank deposit rate, they violated or failed in their duty as trustees, and so are liable for the loss or damage thereby occasioned to the trust-estate.

As the bank accounts shew exactly the sums paid in and drawn out by the trustees, with the interest allowed on the balances and credited to them, and as there is no dispute on the subject, I presume that the Lord Ordinary when he allowed the pursuers a proof in support of their seventh objection intended that they should have an opportunity of proving that the sums deposited could have been invested more profitably to the estate. As the result of the proof the Lord Ordinary has found "that there was no difficulty in so investing the said funds," and that had the trustees so invested them they would have received interest thereon exceeding by £881, 0s. 1d. the interest which they drew from the banks on the deposits. His Lordship is of opinion that a loan to a bank on deposit at the current rate of interest is not an investment, and that a trustee who thus deals with trust money acts unwarrantably and in breach of his trust, and incurs the same personal liability as a trustee who himself uses the trust money, referring in support of this view to cases in which it was held (1) that a trustee who allows trust money to remain in his business as a trader (in which the deceased truster had been a partner) is personally responsible for both principal and interest, and (2) that a trustee who puts trust money to the credit of his own private bank account incurs the like liability. I differ from the Lord Ordinary, and think the authorities which he cites are not in point, but deal with another and quite different matter. A trustee who himself uses trust money or puts it to his own credit in bank acts in breach of his trust, and is personally liable accordingly for the principal, plus interest at the rate commonly allowed against anyone who retains the money of another. To say that a trustee who deposits trust money in bank properly earmarked as a trust deposit thereby commits a breach of trust is, I think, quite unwarrantable.

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
 Melville v.
 Noble's
 Trustees.

It has not been suggested that bank deposit is objectionable as investment for trust money because it is unsafe, the bank being known as of good repute. The objection is therefore confined to the rate of interest. But the rate varies according to the rise or fall in the market value of money. At what rate then or down to what rate is bank deposit a lawful investment for trust money, and when does it cease to be? Or, if there is no rule of trust law affording an answer to the questions so put, can we announce this as the rule of law—that trustees will be held to have performed or violated their trust duty in putting and having trust money on bank deposit according to the result of a proof at large on the question whether or not they could by their diligence have invested otherwise at a higher rate of interest? I have already said that in my opinion a bank deposit at the current rate of interest is an “investment,” and we certainly know that millions of pounds sterling are thus invested by quite reasonable and prudent people. But it is, I think, immaterial whether the term “investment” is applicable or not. It is safe and yields interest, and if the interest is as high or higher than an investment in consols would be, as it may be and certainly has been, could it be rationally maintained that the trustees were in duty bound to draw out the deposit and buy consols, the deposit not being an investment?

The Lord Ordinary is of opinion on the evidence that the trustees could have procured safe investments at two per cent more interest than the deposits yielded. Your Lordship in the chair thinks at only one per cent more. I am of opinion that the objection is on the face of it bad in law, and that the proof is quite out of place. The objection is confessedly unprecedented, and so certainly is the proof, as indeed proof on an unprecedented objection was most likely to be.

The Lord Ordinary notices the clause of indemnity in the trust-deed, which, he says, “is no doubt wide and liberal,” but thinks the defenders cannot avail themselves of it because “there seems to have been no meeting

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
 Melville v.
 Noble's
 Trustees.

of the trustees at all after 1880," and because "it does not appear that they ever considered the question of investments." No reason has been pointed out why there should have been a meeting of the trustees after 1880. Nor does it occur to me that the question before us would have been affected had the trustees held a meeting, or any number of meetings, at which they formally directed Mr Watson, the only man of business of the three, to do exactly as he did, that is to say, to put and keep the unspent trust money upon bank deposit. If that was misconduct inferring liability in damages it does not seem to me that its character would have been changed by meetings and resolutions. But I think it only right to add that irrespective of the indemnity clause my opinion is adverse to the pursuers.

I have characterised the liability which the Lord Ordinary has by his interlocutor imposed on the defenders as liability in damages. It can be nothing else, for the whole trust money, principal and interest, has been ingathered, accounted for, and made forthcoming. No ground for a claim of damages has, in my opinion, been proved or even averred. With respect to the defenders Park and Ritchie, I see no ground for any reflection on their conduct. They were, I think, warranted in leaving the deposited money in the charge of Mr Watson, who was in fact, and I assume to their knowledge, qualified by integrity and business good sense to be entrusted with the duty. He in fact performed it with uprightness and safety, and without complaint from anyone interested (and there were several) till this action was brought. With respect to Mr Watson himself, I appreciate what he says in his evidence (which is really more of an argumentative discussion between him and the examining counsel than evidence of facts) otherwise than the Lord Ordinary seems to have done, and I am not prepared judicially to censure his conduct, although it may be true that had he put the matter in the hands of a professional accountant like Mr Robertson he might have got more interest than he did. To hold, upon any facts proved or even averred, that he subjected himself and his co-trustees in damages for breach of trust is what I am not prepared to concur with the Lord Ordinary in doing.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the question as to the liability of the defenders for interest on the trust funds in their hands may competently be inquired into and determined in this action. The purpose of the action is the ascertainment of the balance, on a fair accounting, which the defenders as trustees are owing to the pursuers. Such a balance cannot be struck without debiting the defenders with all sums with which as trustees they are bound to debit themselves, and it does not appear to me to be material whether such debit arises from funds once in their hands having been lost, or funds not recovered which should have been recovered, or not received which should have been received. The funds immediately in question are of the latter class. The defenders are sought to be made liable,—that is, debited in their accounts,—with interest which would have accrued on the trust funds had these funds been properly treated, and which has not accrued or been earned through the neglect or fault of the defenders in the course of their management. Whether the defenders are liable for such interest in the circumstances of this case, is the main question. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that they are. The defenders were bound to deal with the trust funds in the same way as a man of ordinary prudence would deal with his own; and I cannot think that a man of ordinary prudence would leave his fortune, or a very large part of it, lying in bank on deposit-receipt for a period of about twenty years. He would certainly seek some investment which would yield a higher return than bank deposit rate. I think the trustees here neglected their duty. It was not a mere omission in management, it was a total neglect of a duty incumbent upon them, to the direct injury of the trust-estate under their charge.

No. 43.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

I am not satisfied, however, that the defenders could easily have found first-class investments yielding 4 per cent for the whole period of their trust management. I think if the defenders are found liable for 3 per cent that that would represent a very fair return to the beneficiaries. In coming to this conclusion I have been partly influenced by two considerations, first, that some expense would have been occasioned to the trust by the investment of the trust funds which the trust-estate has not actually been put to; and second, that for some part of the period of administration part of the trust funds might, and probably would, have remained in bank while investments or renewals of investments were being sought.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that to leave money in bank on deposit-receipt is not a proper permanent investment for trust funds. It is an excellent temporary use to make of them pending selection of a permanent investment. There might even be circumstances which might warrant trustees if they applied their minds to the matter in leaving trust funds on deposit-receipt for a considerable period. If, for instance, it were necessary for the purposes of the trust frequently to uplift the funds, or if in the state of the market there were serious difficulty in getting safe permanent investments. Evidence that the trustees had honestly applied their minds to the matter might in such a case be held to free them from personal liability, although it might be thought that they had been unduly cautious.

But in the present case I think it is proved that during the whole currency of the trust the trustees did not apply their minds to the investment of the trust funds. They were bound from time to time to consider the question of investment with a view to getting for the beneficiaries as large a return as they could consistently with the safety of the capital. It is proved that they totally neglected this duty; and although it is proved that during most of the time safe investments yielding 4 and 4½ per cent could easily have been obtained, they allowed the money to remain for about twenty years on deposit-receipt. This, in my opinion, was default, not mere omission.

The only remaining question is as to the rate of interest with which they shall be debited. In charging them with only 3 per cent I think we shall impose a very moderate penalty upon them. The evidence shews that a considerably larger return than 3 per cent could have been obtained; and although an investment in consols could not have been objected to, if it had been made, as no proper investment was made we are not bound to take the lowest allowable investment as the measure of the trustees' liability. But

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

of the trustees at all after 1880," and because "it does not appear that they ever considered the question of investments." No reason has been pointed out why there should have been a meeting of the trustees after 1880. Nor does it occur to me that the question before us would have been affected had the trustees held a meeting, or any number of meetings, at which they formally directed Mr Watson, the only man of business of the three, to do exactly as he did, that is to say, to put and keep the unspent trust money upon bank deposit. If that was misconduct inferring liability in damages it does not seem to me that its character would have been changed by meetings and resolutions. But I think it only right to add that irrespective of the indemnity clause my opinion is adverse to the pursuers.

I have characterised the liability which the Lord Ordinary has by his interlocutor imposed on the defenders as liability in damages. It can be nothing else, for the whole trust money, principal and interest, has been ingathered, accounted for, and made forthcoming. No ground for a claim of damages has, in my opinion, been proved or even averred. With respect to the defenders Park and Ritchie, I see no ground for any reflection on their conduct. They were, I think, warranted in leaving the deposited money in the charge of Mr Watson, who was in fact, and I assume to their knowledge, qualified by integrity and business good sense to be entrusted with the duty. He in fact performed it with uprightness and safety, and without complaint from anyone interested (and there were several) till this action was brought. With respect to Mr Watson himself, I appreciate what he says in his evidence (which is really more of an argumentative discussion between him and the examining counsel than evidence of facts) otherwise than the Lord Ordinary seems to have done, and I am not prepared judicially to censure his conduct, although it may be true that had he put the matter in the hands of a professional accountant like Mr Robertson he might have got more interest than he did. To hold, upon any facts proved or even averred, that he subjected himself and his co-trustees in damages for breach of trust is what I am not prepared to concur with the Lord Ordinary in doing.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the question as to the liability of the defenders for interest on the trust funds in their hands may competently be inquired into and determined in this action. The purpose of the action is the ascertainment of the balance, on a fair accounting, which the defenders as trustees are owing to the pursuers. Such a balance cannot be struck without debiting the defenders with all sums with which as trustees they are bound to debit themselves, and it does not appear to me to be material whether such debit arises from funds once in their hands having been lost, or funds not recovered which should have been recovered, or not received which should have been received. The funds immediately in question are of the latter class. The defenders are sought to be made liable,—that is, debited in their accounts,—with interest which would have accrued on the trust funds had these funds been properly treated, and which has not accrued or been earned through the neglect or fault of the defenders in the course of their management. Whether the defenders are liable for such

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

interest in the circumstances of this case, is the main question. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that they are. The defenders were bound to deal with the trust funds in the same way as a man of ordinary prudence would deal with his own; and I cannot think that a man of ordinary prudence would leave his fortune, or a very large part of it, lying in bank on deposit-receipt for a period of about twenty years. He would certainly seek some investment which would yield a higher return than bank deposit rate. I think the trustees here neglected their duty. It was not a mere omission in management, it was a total neglect of a duty incumbent upon them, to the direct injury of the trust-estate under their charge.

I am not satisfied, however, that the defenders could easily have found first-class investments yielding 4 per cent for the whole period of their trust management. I think if the defenders are found liable for 3 per cent that that would represent a very fair return to the beneficiaries. In coming to this conclusion I have been partly influenced by two considerations, first, that some expense would have been occasioned to the trust by the investment of the trust funds which the trust-estate has not actually been put to; and second, that for some part of the period of administration part of the trust funds might, and probably would, have remained in bank while investments or renewals of investments were being sought.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that to leave money in bank on deposit-receipt is not a proper permanent investment for trust funds. It is an excellent temporary use to make of them pending selection of a permanent investment. There might even be circumstances which might warrant trustees if they applied their minds to the matter in leaving trust funds on deposit-receipt for a considerable period. If, for instance, it were necessary for the purposes of the trust frequently to uplift the funds, or if in the state of the market there were serious difficulty in getting safe permanent investments. Evidence that the trustees had honestly applied their minds to the matter might in such a case be held to free them from personal liability, although it might be thought that they had been unduly cautious.

But in the present case I think it is proved that during the whole currency of the trust the trustees did not apply their minds to the investment of the trust funds. They were bound from time to time to consider the question of investment with a view to getting for the beneficiaries as large a return as they could consistently with the safety of the capital. It is proved that they totally neglected this duty; and although it is proved that during most of the time safe investments yielding 4 and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent could easily have been obtained, they allowed the money to remain for about twenty years on deposit-receipt. This, in my opinion, was default, not mere omission.

The only remaining question is as to the rate of interest with which they shall be debited. In charging them with only 3 per cent I think we shall impose a very moderate penalty upon them. The evidence shews that a considerably larger return than 3 per cent could have been obtained; and although an investment in consols could not have been objected to, if it had been made, as no proper investment was made we are not bound to take the lowest allowable investment as the measure of the trustees' liability. But

No. 43. the amount of interest to be charged is a matter in the discretion of the Court, and as during the first five years of the trust there may have been some excuse for leaving the money on deposit-receipt, it may be sufficient to charge the trustees with 3 per cent over the whole period of the trust.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Melville v.
Noble's
Trustees.

Decree in favour of the pursuers will be limited to their own interest in the trust funds.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the second, fourth, and fifth findings in the interlocutor reclaimed against, and in lieu thereof find (1) that the trustees having failed to invest the funds of the trust-estate, a loss has been incurred to the trust-estate of £353, 17s. 11d. as at 1st January 1894 through such failure; and (2) that in a question with the pursuers the defenders are bound in their trust accounts to debit themselves with said sums: Quoad ultra adhere to said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed."

WINCHESTER & NICOLSON, S.S.O.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 44. DAVID WILSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Watt—Horne.
DONALD M'KELLAR AND MRS SARAH M'KELLAR, Defenders (Respondents).—M'Lennan.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wilson v.
M'Kellar.

Poinding—Unlawful intromission with poidned effects—"Summary complaint" to Sheriff—Concurrence of Procurator-fiscal—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 30.—Held that the imprisonment provided by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30, is not in modum pœnæ, but only the usual means of enforcing an order of Court ad factum prestandum, and that a complaint to the Sheriff under this section is a civil process, and does not require the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.

DAVID WILSON, grain-merchant, Greenock, presented this petition in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Dunoon against Donald M'Kellar, baker, Woodburn Place, Dunoon, and Sarah M'Kellar, his wife, and prayed the Court "to ordain the defenders, jointly and severally or severally, to restore to the premises at Woodburn Place, Kirn, the following articles, viz., a brown horse of the appraised value of £8; a set of van harness, &c., the appraised value of the whole, including the horse, being £17, all belonging to the said defender Donald M'Kellar, and in the event of the said defenders failing to restore the said articles to the said premises within such period as the Court shall appoint, to grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend the defenders and commit them to the prison of , therein to be detained until they restore the said effects, or pay the sum of £34 sterling to the pursuer, and to find the defenders liable in expenses."*

The pursuer averred that on 12th November 1895, he obtained a decree against Donald M'Kellar for £91, 10s., with interest from 2d November 1895. Upon 13th March 1896, M'Kellar was charged upon the decree to make payment of £91, 10s., with interest thereon,

* The Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 30, enacts that "if any person shall unlawfully intromit with or carry off the poidned effects, he shall be liable on summary complaint to the Sheriff of the county where the effects were poidned, or where he is domiciled, to be imprisoned until he restore the effects or pay double the appraised value."

but under deduction of £19, 8s. 11d. paid to account, within seven days from the date of the said charge, under pain of pointing. No. 44.

Following upon the charge the articles mentioned in the prayer were pointed in the defenders' premises, and the pursuer obtained a warrant for their sale, which was served personally on M'Kellar, but when the warrant came to be executed, it was found that the pointed effects had been sold by Mrs M'Kellar with the knowledge and consent of her husband. Dec. 11, 1896.
Wilson v.
M'Kellar.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having in breach of the pursuer's pointing unlawfully sold and disposed of the articles therein embraced, the pursuer is entitled to have the defenders ordained to restore the same or to pay him double the appraised value. (2) The defenders having unlawfully intromitted with the effects pointed by the pursuer, decree should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The action is incompetent in respect that the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal has not been obtained.

On 7th August 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Martin) repelled the defenders' second plea in law, and allowed a proof.

On appeal the Sheriff (Wallace), on 20th September 1896, recalled this interlocutor, sustained this plea in law, and dismissed the action as incompetent.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—It was said that in view of the penal consequences attaching to such a complaint the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal was necessary. This was a mistake, as he had no concern with the application. He was an officer of the Crown, and it was his duty to maintain the interests of the fisc, but in this case there was no fine which he could collect for the Crown. The imprisonment craved was not a punishment, but a compulsitor to ensure obedience to the order to restore the effects removed. The defender could prevent imprisonment, or even if imprisoned could end it at any moment by restoring the articles.¹ It was enough that the statute did not require the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. The Sheriff admitted this, and proceeded entirely on an alleged practice. The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, Schedule A, provided a form of complaint for conviction under the Act, and for imprison-

* "NOTE.— . . . As regards the second plea that the action is incompetent without the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, I have delayed giving judgment until I had an opportunity of ascertaining the practice in other Sheriff Courts. The result of my inquiry is that I find it to be the practice in the Sheriff Courts of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, to obtain the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal in petitions for breach of pointing, and I am not prepared to depart from this general practice. The Personal Diligence Act, section 30, under which the present application is made concluding for imprisonment until the pointed effects are restored, or payment made of double the appraised value, is silent as to whether the petition is to be brought with or without the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, and I had an able argument to the effect that breach of pointing is distinguishable from breach of interdict, in which latter case it is, I think, undoubted that the consent of the Procurator-fiscal is necessary where imprisonment is craved. . . . There is great force in the argument, but having regard to what appears to be the general practice and the penal nature of the conclusions of the petition, I am unable to see my way to sustain the competency of the proceedings without the concurrence of the public prosecutor. . . ."

¹ Dickson v. Bryan, May 14, 1889, 16 R. 673; Kennedy v. Cadenhead, Dec. 24, 1867, 6 Macph. 179.

No. 44.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wilson v.
M'Kellar.

ment and forfeiture, which is competent to a private person without the concurrence of the Fiscal. But this was not a suit for a penalty, but for restoration of property. The mere fact of a conclusion for imprisonment did not make the process criminal. At common law, if goods were illegally removed the Court might order restoration, and on failure might imprison for contempt of Court. It was not necessary for the Fiscal to concur in such a process.

Argued for the defenders;—The demand for imprisonment made the application penal, and the Procurator-fiscal must concur. So in breach of interdict, where ex hypothesi the Court has the whole matter under its purview, such concurrence is invariable. The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, section 3, subsection 2, applied, and anything in the nature of a summary complaint must be brought in the form provided by the Act; and in such summary complaints the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal was always required. [LORD TRAYNER.—These are for penalties incurred, but have we not here a crave for a penalty in case of failure to perform?] It was enough that imprisonment might follow. Cases of breach of interdict were analogous. They were highly penal, and the concurrence of the public prosecutor was necessary.¹

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff states that he proceeded on what he has ascertained to be the practice in the Sheriff Courts of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. There may be such a practice, and if so, I suppose it has arisen from the fact that process involving imprisonment requires in certain events the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, and it has probably been assumed that whenever imprisonment is concluded for this concurrence is necessary. As regards the Procurator-fiscal, it is probable that in these cases the concurrence of that official was given as a matter of course, without consideration being given to the question whether it was necessary or not.

Be that as it may, in this case it is necessary to look at the form of process, and it is clear that it is not presented to obtain the punishment of the defender for a past offence, but the whole object of the petition is to have the defender ordained to perform certain acts, and if he fails to obey, to have imprisonment ordered as a compulsitor to the order pronounced. But this prayer for imprisonment is only an invocation of the power inherent in every civil Court to ordain performance of acts within its jurisdiction, and in default to commit the defaulter to prison. A criminal prosecution is of an entirely different nature. It relates to an offence which is past and proceeds in modum pœnas for the punishment of the offender, and “to deter others from committing the like crimes in all time coming,” as it was formerly expressed in indictments. Here a private individual complains to the Sheriff that goods which had been poinded to answer for a debt due to him have been removed from his reach by the owner, and he calls upon the Court to ordain the defender to restore the goods, and in default to commit him to prison until he obeys the order or pays a sum equivalent to twice the value of the goods removed by him.

¹ Duke of Northumberland v. Harris, Feb. 23, 1832, 10 S. 366; Usher v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, March 7, 1839, 1 D. 639.

So far as we have heard, there appears to be no authority for the view that the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal is necessary. It is quite true that in the statute the words "summary complaint" are used, but there is no authority for the statement that these words are so appropriated to a criminal complaint for punishment of an offence that their use alone is sufficient to indicate a process of this character. No. 44.
Dec. 11, 1896.
Wilson v.
M'Kellar.

On the whole matter I am clear that the Sheriff has erred in sustaining the second plea in law for the defenders.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it necessary in this very clear case to say more than that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right and should be returned to.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the view that the plea in law for the defenders which has been sustained by the Sheriff should be repelled.

In one sense this complaint is based upon the Personal Diligence Act. It seeks to vindicate by a decree the right conferred upon the pursuer by statute of demanding the restoration of the goods which were poinded for the debt due to him, but which were removed by the defenders. The application of the creditor is to be made by way of "summary complaint," but there is nothing in the statute to indicate that the complaint is to proceed at the instance of anyone except the private individual who has been injured, and who applies to the Court to have his wrong redressed. The Procurator-fiscal is not interested in the proceeding.

I quite appreciate the argument of Mr M'Lennan based upon the Summary Procedure Act, and if this were a proceeding in modum pœnæ it might require the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. But this is not a proceeding in modum pœnæ, but only an application to the Sheriff which asks that if the defender does not return the goods he shall be imprisoned. Imprisonment in such circumstances is not inflicted as a punishment, but is only the usual means adopted of enforcing an order ad factum præstandum. That such imprisonment is not punishment is clear from the consideration that the defender may at once put an end to it by restoring the goods. Indeed, he may prevent it altogether by restoration of the poinded goods before imprisonment has taken place. Accordingly it appears to me that this is a civil complaint before a civil Court, with which the Procurator-fiscal has nothing to do.

I think it is a mistake to suppose that this statute necessarily uses the term "summary complaint" in the sense in which it is employed in the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. A summary complaint such as this means rather a complaint before the Sheriff which, requiring despatch, is not required to submit to the delays which attend a case going through the ordinary roll. I think that is the sense in which it is used here.

LORD MONCRIEFF.—The only question submitted to us is whether the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal to such an application is essential. In the Court below the defender raised no objection to the form of the application, and although in this Court he was given an opportunity of amending the record he declined to avail himself of it.

I agree with Lord Trayner that the words "summary complaint," as used

No. 44. in the 30th section of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, simply mean a summary application for an order ad factum præstandum as distinguished from an ordinary action. They are used in the same sense in regard to removings in the 8th section of the Sheriff Court Act of 1838, and in the schedule of the Small Debt Act, 1837, the initial event in a civil cause is described as a "summons of complaint." The process is a civil and not a criminal process, the imprisonment concluded for being not in modum pœnæ, but in order to compel restoration.

Dec. 11, 1896.
Wilson v.
M'Kellar.

Even if such an application could be competently brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which may be doubted, it would still be a civil and not a criminal process, and might be sued by a private person without the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal.

I agree with all your Lordships that the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal is not essential, and that the judgment of the Sheriff should be recalled.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Sustain the appeal and recall the interlocutor appealed against : Affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 7th August last, and remit the cause back to the Sheriff to proceed therein as accords."

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 45. A B, Pursuer (Appellant).—Lees—King.
THE NORTHERN ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Salvesen—Cook.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

Insurance—Insurance against accident—Blood-poisoning—Proof—Confidentiality—Medical practitioner refusing to disclose patient's name.—An insurance company granted a policy in favour of a medical practitioner whereby they agreed to compensate him if he should "sustain any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means operating accidentally on the person of the insured, and capable of direct proof."

An indorsation bore that the policy "covered compensation for blood-poisoning which is the result of an accidental injury within the meaning of the policy."

In an action upon the policy for compensation, the pursuer alleged that, in operating on a patient on 14th August 1894, he accidentally inflicted a slight wound on his left hand, and that he then received syphilitic blood-poisoning.

The pursuer proved that, on 14th August, while performing a uterine operation, he scratched a finger on his left hand with the curette he was using, and that about twelve days after symptoms of syphilitic poisoning shewed themselves. Several medical witnesses deponed that they had no doubt that the place of inoculation was the wound on the finger.

The pursuer led no evidence to shew that the patient on whom he operated was syphilitic, other than his own testimony and the medical evidence that the place of inoculation was the wound. He deponed that his father had been treating the patient for syphilis, but he did not call him as a witness, and he refused to disclose the name of the patient to the defenders, on the ground that it would be a breach of professional duty for him to do so.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that the pursuer had failed to prove by the best available evidence that the patient was suffering from syphilis, and so capable of conveying the poison to him, and that the defenders were entitled to absolvitor.

In December 1894 A B, a doctor of medicine, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Northern Accident Insurance Company, Limited, for payment of the sum of £123, in respect of temporary total and partial disablement, under a policy of insurance held by him with the company, under which he was insured for twelve months from 27th April 1894.

No. 45.
Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

The policy provided for compensation being paid to him according to a specified scale, in the event of his sustaining "any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means operating accidentally (sic) on the person of the insured, and capable of direct proof." The policy bore this indorsement,—“It is hereby declared that this policy covers compensation for blood-poisoning which is the result of an accidental injury within the meaning of the policy.”

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

Condition 7 of the policy provided,—“No compensation shall be payable hereunder unless any medical or other agent of the company shall be allowed to examine the person of the insured after any alleged injury within the meaning of this policy, when and so often as the same may be reasonably required, nor unless such evidence as the directors may from time to time require shall, at the expense of the insured, be furnished within the space of seven days after demand in writing as to the statements contained in the within-mentioned proposal and declaration, or as to any alleged accident or injury on the ground of which a claim shall have been made against the company.”

The pursuer averred that, on 14th August 1894, while operating upon a private patient, he accidentally cut the middle finger of his left hand with the “curette” which he was using; that four or five days later the wound became inflamed; that this was followed by the appearance upon his body of marks indicative of the secondary symptoms of syphilis.

He also averred in cond. 10 that, as medical officer of the Magdalene Institutions at Stirling Road and Lochburn, he on 17th August examined at the former place a woman, Sarah C., whose name was given, who was suffering from syphilis, that “the disease was communicated to the pursuer by accidental inoculation through the wound on the middle finger of the left hand. This happened either at the operation at which the wound was inflicted or at the examination of the said” Sarah C., “between 14th and 19th August.”

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having failed to produce, in terms of the policy, evidence of the alleged syphilitic poisoning through the alleged wound, the action is premature, and ought to be dismissed. (3) The pursuer’s illness not being the result of an accident in the sense of the policy, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The following was the import of the evidence led at a proof:—

On 14th August 1894 the pursuer while performing a uterine operation on a private patient accidentally inflicted a slight scratch on the back of the middle finger of his left hand. Dr Dunlop was present at the operation for the purpose of administering chloroform, and confirmed the pursuer’s evidence on this point.

On 18th August a medical friend, Dr Dalziel, noticed a small inflamed sore about the size of a split pea on the pursuer’s finger, and said he should attend to it. It had then no characteristics of syphilis. About the 26th August the pursuer called on Dr Dalziel, who deponed that it had then assumed the characteristics of a primary syphilitic sore, and

No. 45. he asked Dr Fullerton to see it, and that he agreed it was very like a hard chancre. He did not then tell the pursuer his opinion, as he was not quite certain, but recommended him to go from home for a change. The pursuer deponed that he went to Dublin on 1st September, and when there consulted surgeons who pronounced the sore a primary chancre, and that a rash which had broken out over his body was a secondary rash. "There was a slight sign of this rash when I arrived in Dublin, in fact there was a slight sign of it when I left Glasgow, about the end of August or 1st September, and it was very pronounced while in Dublin."

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

The evidence bearing on the question as to time when the pursuer received the syphilitic poison was to the following effect: It was proved that the pursuer did not examine a syphilitic case in the Magdalene Hospital on 17th August, but on 23d August. It was suggested that the pursuer, who had looked at the books of the hospital for the date, had mistaken the figures 17 given as the girl's age for the date of the examination. The case was thus narrowed to the question whether the pursuer received the infection on 14th August.

The medical evidence shewed that if the pursuer received the infection at that date, the primary and secondary symptoms of syphilis shewed themselves at an unusually early date. Some of the medical witnesses were of opinion that a hard chancre might be developed within eight days of infection, and that secondary symptoms might appear at the same time. Other medical witnesses said that the shortest time recognised for the former was eighteen days, and the ordinary time from three to five weeks, and that the ordinary time between the primary and the secondary symptoms was six weeks.

Dr Dalziel, Professor of Surgery in Anderson's College, Glasgow, gave the following evidence:—" (Q.) Can you say by what channel the disease was communicated to him? (A.) From the finger. I have no doubt whatever about that. My reasons for that are the characteristics of the sore as seen on the finger, and from the sequel and the secondary symptoms. At the end of August there was no doubt whatever that the sore was a typical hard chancre. (Q.) And the inoculation must have been at that point? (A.) It must have been at that point. I examined the pursuer afterwards to see if the disease had been contracted in any other way. There was no evidence whatever of there being or ever having been any syphilitic sore on any other part of his body. It was impossible there could be while this sore was on the left hand, so that the examination was quite unnecessary—just a matter of form. . . . Cross.—The shortest period [of development] I know of is eight days. That is not a case recorded in print; it is a case in my own experience. (Q.) And how could you make certain of the date? (A.) From the date of infection. (Q.) May there not have been more than one? (A.) There is always room for doubt. It is possible that patients only mention the last opportunity although there may have been earlier ones, so that we can never be quite sure that eight days is the exact period."

Dr Murdoch Cameron, Professor of Midwifery in the University of Glasgow, deponed,—“I know that pursuer is suffering from syphilis. I have seen the sore on his finger. I think there is no question but that is the initial sore or place of inoculation.”

Dr Newman, Surgeon to the Royal Infirmary, Glasgow, deponed that he crossed to Ireland in the same boat with the pursuer, and that the pursuer shewed him his hand. "The pursuer was anxious about his hand, and I said to him at the time that I considered the sore to be a primary sore of true syphilis. The place of inoculation was on the finger. I could tell that from the sore without the least hesitation." No. 45.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.
Limited.

Dr Hector Cameron, Glasgow, gave evidence to the same effect.

The pursuer, in cross-examination, deponed;—"I say now it would be perfectly impossible to say from whom I got the inoculation. I think possibly I got it from the first case,—I mean from the operation on the 14th August. I think that is the most likely. (Q.) Can you say that, in your opinion as a medical practitioner, the patient was suffering from syphilis? (A.) I would say that I would treat that patient as if she was suffering from syphilis. [Question repeated.] (A.) At that time I would say no, but from the course of the symptoms afterwards I should say yes. . . . She had had several abortions during the last three years. In my opinion, that indicated syphilis. I should say I formed that opinion of the patient shortly after the operation when I commenced to develop this sore, added on to the previous history. I would not label her case one of syphilis purely and simply from the fact of her having abortions, but it is probable, and would make one think of it. (Q.) May we take it that but for the sore on your finger you would not have attributed her condition to syphilis? (A.) I should say now I would attribute it undoubtedly, because she has shewn it in another form, such as her hair falling out at present. (Q.) That is, independently of the injury to you, you are now of opinion she is syphilitic? (A.) She is on anti-syphilitic treatment, and I would not have put her on that treatment unless I believed she had it. The symptoms which indicate syphilis now are hard glands in the groin, and the hair coming out, and slight loss of voice. . . . She was on anti-syphilitic treatment, I think, about the end of October, and she is still continuing it, but prior to the operation she had been having it under my father's care. . . . I saw this patient first when I first started to practise in consultation with my father, in a confinement case. That is about eight years ago, and then for the next four years she was more or less my father's patient, and ultimately drifted under my care. I do not happen to know when my father first began giving her anti-syphilitic treatment. . . . (Q.) Give me the name and address of that patient? (A.) I have taken an oath at college not to divulge it. I decline to give the name and address of that patient, owing to the declaration and oath that I took at the University of Glasgow. On the 14th August I shewed the cut to Dr Dunlop and Mr Robertson at the moment of being cut."

Dr James Dunlop, Glasgow, deponed,—“I was assisting the pursuer at an operation in the middle of August last. I was chloroforming the patient for him. I do not remember the exact date; I took no note of it, it was a friendly transaction. I paid little or no attention to the operation, but there was one portion of it was curetting. . . . I remember distinctly his stopping when he was curetting, and holding up his hand and saying, ‘Dunlop, I have scratched my finger.’ . . .”

The defenders adduced as a witness a medical man in Glasgow, who stated that he was occasionally consulted in the pursuer's absence by one of his patients, whom he named, a respectable married woman with three or four children, that she told him that the pursuer performed an operation upon her in August 1894. That witness never

No. 45. had the slightest cause to suspect her as suffering from syphilis in any of its forms.

Dec. 11, 1896.

A B v.

Northern

Accident

Insurance Co.,

Limited.

Another medical witness, called by the defenders, deponed that in August 1894 he attended a lady of the same name, then residing at a town on the Clyde, which he named, but not permanently residing there. That she was under witness's care with a view to getting up her health before an operation to be performed by the pursuer. That he had no reason to suspect that she was suffering from syphilis in any of its forms, and that he did not make any special examination to find out what disease she was suffering from.

The pursuer declined to say whether the lady referred to by these witnesses was the person on whom he operated on 14th August 1894.

On 27th August 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor :—" . . . Finds that, while performing an operation on 14th August 1894 on a lady in a private home, the pursuer cut his finger, and shortly thereafter a hard chancre appeared on the finger, followed by a rash on the body : Finds further that the pursuer was at the time largely engaged in the prosecution of his profession in obstetrical operations, and it is often impossible for a surgeon to specify distinctly the patient from whom he has received contamination : Finds that, although it has not been actually proved that the lady upon whom the pursuer was operating actually suffered from syphilis, the inoculation must have been received either from the patient in question, or from some other patient upon whom the pursuer was operating at the time : Finds that, when the rash appeared upon the pursuer's body, there was no other sore on his body save the hard chancre on his finger, and although the chancre and rash appeared somewhat early after the alleged inoculation, the medical evidence instructs that it is in accordance with experience for the chancre and rash to have followed from the inoculation on the 14th of August : Finds under the whole circumstances that, having regard to the character of the injuries, and to the kind of proof by which inoculation can be established, the pursuer has proved that the hard chancre and rash arose from external means operating 'accidentally' on the pursuer's person : Finds the pursuer entitled to the sum of £78," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry), on 25th April 1896, pronounced this interlocutor :—" . . . Finds that the pursuer, in the course of performing an operation on 14th August 1894, cut his finger, and that about the end of the same month he shewed symptoms of syphilitic blood-poisoning, which he avers was communicated through the wound : Finds it not proved that the said poisoning was so communicated, or was the result of an accidental injury within the meaning of the policy ; therefore recalls the interlocutor appealed against : Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—It was not said that he was affected with syphilis before August 14th. He had proved that he had accidentally cut himself on that day ; that a sore appeared at the place where the finger was injured, which, in the opinion of his brethren who examined it, was caused by the inoculation of syphilis, and that the subsequent symptoms were the ordinary symptoms of the disease. In stating that to the best of his belief he was inoculated with the disease from the patient on whom he operated on the 14th, he was giving the most probable and reasonable account which could be in such a case expected of him. In short, his evidence was sufficient to entitle him to claim under the policy.¹ It was unreasonable to expect him to disclose the name of the patient on whom he operated. The rules of professional etiquette prevented his doing so, and had he done so he would have exposed himself to an action of damages by the lady. The defenders must be held to have contracted with him in the knowledge that the rule was one which no medical man could be called upon to disregard in any question arising out of the contract.

No. 45.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

Argued for the defenders;—The evidence led by the pursuer as to his having been inoculated with the disease during the operation on 14th August was insufficient to entitle him to claim under the policy. All he had done was to suggest a series of probabilities upon which he asked the Court to pronounce findings in fact in his favour. There was much to weigh against these probabilities, e.g., the rapid development of the disease, and the possibility of mistaking a cauterised wound for a chancre. Even assuming that the pursuer need not be called upon to furnish “direct proof,” he must give the best proof available, and this he withheld when he refused to examine or even name the patient herself. Without her evidence the defenders could not test the pursuer’s story.

The cause was taken to avizandum on 10th June. On 23d June it appeared in the Single Bills by order, and the Court recommended the pursuer to obtain the patient’s consent to be examined.

On 14th July the pursuer lodged a minute, stating that he was willing to divulge the patient’s name to medical men to be named in order that she might be examined, and on 15th July the cause was continued in order that the defenders’ consent might be obtained to a remit to examine the patient. On 17th July the defenders having intimated that they declined to give their consent to this course, the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—“Having heard parties on the minute for the pursuer, on the motion of the pursuer, allow him further proof, and appoint the same to proceed before Lord at such time and place as he may fix, and grant diligence against witnesses and havers accordingly.”

On 3d November the pursuer lodged a minute, in which he stated that the patient upon whom the operation of 14th August 1894 was performed, “has intimated that there has been some misunderstanding as to her consenting to medical examination, and that she declines to submit thereto,” and that he now craved the judgment of the Court upon the proof and argument already submitted.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is now before the Court for decision precisely as it stood when the debate closed. The pursuer in his latest minute has intimated that he so desires it to be disposed of. It is therefore in this position, that the pursuer has failed to give to the defenders the information who it was from whom he accidentally got blood-poisoning, so as to give rise to the present claim, and to afford them the opportunity of examining into the grounds of the claim.

I desire to say that, so far as I can judge, there is no reason to doubt the bona fides of the pursuer, and that in refusing to disclose his patient he ¹ Ballantine v. Employers Insurance Co. of Great Britain, Limited, Dec. 15, 1893, 21 R. 305.

No. 45. is acting on his belief of the honourable duty of secrecy which the rules of his profession lay down for him to observe. But while that is so, it has in my opinion the unfortunate result for him that he does not fulfil the obligation incumbent upon him as a pursuer to make good his claim by evidence according to the contract between him and the defenders. The evidence required—the best evidence available—is not furnished, and therefore I come to the conclusion that the Sheriff was right in finding that the pursuer has not proved his case, and that the defenders must be assoilzied.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it is disputed that if the facts are as averred by the pursuer, and as found by the Sheriff-substitute, the pursuer is entitled to prevail. The only question is, whether the pursuer's averments are true in fact,—that is, whether the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute on the evidence, or that of the Sheriff, is the sounder judgment.

I agree with your Lordship's remark that there is no reason for doubting the honour and good faith of the pursuer, but if that is so, then I have much difficulty in doubting his truthfulness. I think that his statement is true, and reasonably supported by reliable evidence. His medical brethren who heard his account at the time as to how he became affected with the disease which they saw upon him are clear that his account is not only probable, and in accordance with the genesis of the disease and its appearance on his body, but that no other reasonably probable account occurred to them then, or does so now; and indeed no other has been suggested, or can be suggested, without imputing to the pursuer falsehood and immorality without evidence or reason for suspicion. In fact the case presented for the defenders comes to this, that, however candid and credible the pursuer's statements may be, and however much they may be believed and supported by evidence, and although there may be no other way of accounting for his condition than what he alleges, unless you impute immoral conduct and perjury to him, his claim must be rejected, unless he is prepared to do what would confessedly be dishonourable,—that is, to disclose the name of the patient from whom he received the infection. I agree again with your Lordship that his only honourable course was to refuse to do so. It would have been dishonourable, and possibly illegal, to disclose her name. He might have been subjected to a claim of damages for doing so. We have heard lately of a case in which very large damages were awarded for a violation of professional honour, not more flagrant.

It seems to me that we are dealing very hardly with the pursuer in rejecting as insufficient the evidence he has laid before us, unless accompanied by such dishonourable conduct as is demanded of him. On the other hand, I think there is no hardship on the insurance office in holding the case proved without it. Any insurance office, when insuring a medical man against the risk of blood-poisoning, must have contemplated that he could not give them such information. No honourable medical man would insure on such terms, and no honourable insurance company would insure him only upon condition of his being bound to make to them a dishonourable disclosure.

It is conceded that this dishonourable disclosure is all that is wanting to entitle the pursuer to our judgment.

I concur with the Sheriff-substitute, who saw and heard the witnesses, that the case is satisfactorily proved without the unprofessional disclosure demanded of the pursuer; and assuming that it is, I am of opinion that the rule of professional etiquette (or honour) so often referred to, excludes any such prejudicial presumption as may occur when the best available evidence is withheld by the party on whom the onus lies.

No. 45.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuer in May 1894 entered into the contract of insurance with the defenders, the terms and conditions of which are contained in the policy before us. Under that policy the pursuer now claims to be indemnified for loss and injury sustained by him from accidental blood-poisoning, and the question is whether the pursuer has established his claim, regard being had, of course, to the terms of the policy. I have found the determination of this question attended with considerable difficulty. The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute have differed in opinion, and there is a difference of opinion among ourselves. I cannot say that my own opinion is expressed without hesitation or doubt. It is needless to recapitulate all the facts; what is necessary for the purposes of my opinion can be stated briefly. The pursuer performed an operation on the uterus of a patient on 14th August 1894, in the course of which he cut one of his fingers with the surgical instrument he was using. Four days later,—that is on 18th August,—there was an inflamed sore on the injured finger “about the size of a small split pea,” which Dr Dalziel (who so describes it) found on the 26th August to be a primary syphilitic sore. That was followed by the appearance on the pursuer’s body of marks indicative of secondary symptoms of syphilis, and there is no doubt that the pursuer was suffering from syphilis. He attributes this to accidental inoculation arising from his injured finger having come in contact with the syphilitic poison in the course of the operation I have referred to, or otherwise by his having come in contact with the poison while professionally examining a girl named Sarah C. on the 17th of August. I put the latter case out of view. I think that it is proved that the examination of this girl did not take place until the 23d August, and that the sore was then well developed on the pursuer’s finger. The sore, besides, which was seen by Dr Dalziel on the 18th August could not have been the result of contact with the poison on the 17th even if the pursuer was right in saying (I think he is mistaken) that he examined the girl on that day. The question is therefore narrowed down to this: Has the pursuer established that he was inoculated with the poison in the course of the operation performed on the 14th August? Now, I feel the full force of the argument addressed to us on behalf of the pursuer. He was not affected, so far as is known, with syphilis on 14th August before the operation that day performed. His finger was cut or scratched during the operation, and thus rendered him subject to inoculation if his patient was syphilitic. The sore appeared at the place of the injury on the finger, and it follows reasonably as an inference that that sore and the disease which it indicated were the result of inoculation received during that operation. The inference, I admit, is not unreasonable. But the defenders say that inference is not proof; that by the terms of the policy the pursuer can only recover for the consequences of an accident “capable of direct proof”; that if direct proof is not obtainable in cases of blood-

No. 45. poisoning at least the best proof obtainable must be given ; that such proof, namely, the evidence derivable from the patient herself has been deliberately withheld by the pursuer, although frequently demanded, and the name even of the patient withheld ; that there is no proof that that patient was affected with syphilis, and no presumption that she was ; that if she was not so affected she could not have communicated the disease to the pursuer ; and that, therefore, the pursuer has failed to afford the proof necessary to warrant his claim, namely, that the patient operated upon was, in fact, affected with syphilis, and consequently in a condition to communicate it.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

After repeated consideration of the proof and whole case, I have come to the conclusion, not without hesitation as I have said, and I rather think with some reluctance, that the defenders' argument is the stronger of the two. I think the pursuer cannot prove that he was inoculated with syphilis on 14th August as averred, unless he can shew that the patient he then operated on was syphilitic. That patient we have been informed is a respectable married woman with a family. I cannot pronounce a judgment in the pursuer's favour without affirming that that respectable woman was affected with syphilis. I do not see my way to do that. The refusal on the part of the pursuer to give the name of his patient is justified on the ground of professional etiquette. I do not say one word against that professional rule which the pursuer thinks himself bound to observe. But the defenders are not bound by it, and if professional rule prohibits the pursuer from doing what is necessary to ensure success in his action, the remark of the Sheriff appears a just one, that "it is he, and not the defenders, who should suffer." Without the disclosure of the patient's name, the defenders are unable to test the accuracy of the pursuer's averment. When they ask that they shall be put in a position enabling them to do so, I think they only ask what they are entitled to get.

Since the case was last before us, we have been asked by the pursuer to decide the case as it stood when the argument for the parties was concluded, and it is on that view of it that I have proceeded. I think the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Sheriff affirmed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—With great reluctance I have, after repeated consideration, come to the conclusion that the pursuer has not proved his case. No one can read the evidence without at first being impressed with the probability that infection was communicated to the pursuer at the time and in the manner suggested by him. It is proved that upon 14th August 1894, he cut the middle finger of his left hand while performing an operation on a female patient ; that shortly afterwards (about 26th August) a sore appeared upon the wound (whether syphilitic or not is a matter of dispute) ; that about 31st August or 1st September secondary symptoms appeared ; and that on the pursuer subsequently tendering himself to the defenders' medical man for personal examination no trace of any other primary sore could be found on the body.

But when the evidence is examined difficulties appear. There may be a question whether, in order to recover under this policy, the blood-poisoning must be shewn to be coincident or simultaneous with the physical injury, e.g., that it was caused by the dirty condition of the knife or other instrument, or by the condition of the blood of the patient operated on. But it is clear that it is material to know, if possible, the time and way at and in which inoculation took place, in order to ascertain its precise connection, near or remote, with the physical injury through which the virus was absorbed. Now the defenders suggest the possibility of two other ways in which inoculation might have taken place. In the first place there is medical evidence to the effect that secondary symptoms appeared at an abnormally short interval after 14th August; and that therefore the presumption is that inoculation took place before that date. They suggest that the appearance of the sore upon the finger may have been due to caustic. They further maintain that assuming that inoculation took place through the cut, this may have occurred not at the time of the operation, but through carelessness on the part of the pursuer on some subsequent occasion, or in some way as to which there is no evidence.

In these circumstances, the case for the pursuer being at least extremely narrow, it was incumbent upon the pursuer to give the defenders and the Court every available assistance to aid them in determining as to the truth of his statements, and the correctness of his conjecture. But this he has failed to do.

He refused to give the name of the patient on whom he operated on 14th August. It cannot be said that it was not legitimate for the defenders to test the accuracy of the pursuer's statements by inquiring into the circumstances attending the operation of 14th August. On the ground of professional etiquette the pursuer declined to disclose the name. The defenders' agents then, without prejudice to the defenders' right to demand the name, asked the pursuer to obtain from Drs James Dunlop and Robertson, who were present at the operation, their opinion whether the patient operated upon was suffering from such a disease as to inoculate the pursuer with syphilis. The answer was that Dr Dunlop could not state that the patient operated upon in his presence on 14th August was suffering from any constitutional disease which might have been conveyed to the pursuer by inoculation, "although from the history of the case he thinks this by no means improbable." Dr Dunlop is examined as a witness for the pursuer, but he is not asked a question as to the condition of the patient. Evidence is led for the defenders as to a female patient upon whom the pursuer operated in August 1894. Two medical men, the witnesses William Stewart and Robert Pollock, state that, so far as they knew, the lady, a respectable married woman with a family of three or four children, was not suffering from syphilis at that time or since. These witnesses are both cross-examined for the pursuer as to the patient's symptoms, with a view, apparently, of shewing that there were symptoms of syphilis. But when the pursuer is asked whether that lady was the patient upon whom he operated on 14th August, he declines even to answer that question.

The evidence which he gives as to the patient on whom he operated is, in the circumstances, very unsatisfactory. He says that previously to the operation his father had for some time treated the patient for syphilitic symptoms. As the Sheriff points out, it would have been of the last importance to the pursuer to examine his father on this matter, but he did

No. 45.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

No. 45. not do so ; and then there being thus, through his own reticence and failure to adduce available evidence, no means of testing his own evidence, the pursuer proceeds to say that after the operation he formed the opinion that the patient was suffering from syphilis, and gives various distinct reasons for his opinion.

Dec. 11, 1896.
A B v.
Northern
Accident
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

Now, in these circumstances, I think the pursuer has not furnished evidence which should have been forthcoming in order to verify his story. It is his misfortune that he is precluded by professional etiquette from disclosing the name of the patient, but it does not follow that the defenders must suffer on account of that. But apart from that, he might and should have adduced his father as a witness. He has not done so, and he has given no explanation of his failure to do so. Therefore, however probable I may think the pursuer's story, I feel constrained to agree in the very carefully considered opinion of the Sheriff, and hold the case not proved.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Dismiss the appeal : Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor appealed against : Therefore of new assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 46.

ALEXANDER AITKEN, Pursuer (Respondent).—Morison.

ROBERT FARQUHAR, Defender (Appellant).—Glegg.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Aitken v.
Farquhar.

Process—Abandonment—Appeal for Jury Trial—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), secs. 10 and 40.—Where an action raised in a Sheriff Court has been removed to the Court of Session by appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, it is competent for the pursuer to abandon the action in the form appropriate to abandonment under sec. 10 of that Act and Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, sec. 115, as if the case had originated in the Court of Session.

1st Division.
Sheriff of
Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

ALEXANDER AITKEN raised an action of damages for alleged slander against Robert Farquhar in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen.

The Sheriff-substitute having allowed proof, the defender appealed for jury trial under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and thereafter the pursuer lodged a minute of abandonment, abandoning the action "in terms of the statute."

On the pursuer moving the Court to appoint the defender to lodge his account of expenses, the question was raised by the Court whether the abandonment should not have been under sec. 61 of the Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1839, which regulates the power of abandonment in Sheriff Court actions.

The pursuer maintained that the minute of abandonment was in proper form, in respect that an action appealed under sec. 40 of the Judicature Act could be dealt with as if it originated in the Court of Session.¹

The COURT pronounced the order craved.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—JOHN VEITCH, Solicitor—Agents.

¹ Cochrane v. Ewing, July 20, 1883, 10 R. 1279.

WILLIAM THOMSON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—W. Campbell—Cullen. No. 47.
 WILLIAM THOMSON JUNIOR, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—
Shaw—Orr.

Dec. 18, 1896.
 Thomson v.
 Thomson.

Lease—Agreement to transfer engineer's business with plant in consideration of annuity—Implied right to occupy premises—Rent—Summary removal.—In January 1894 A, an engineer, by written agreement assigned and transferred to B “the business of engineer presently carried on” by him in certain premises named which belonged to him, “and the whole stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill thereof, together with the whole machinery and appliances in said premises whether, fixed or unfixed.” B, on the other hand, agreed to pay to A an annuity of £250 during his life, A having a right to resume possession of the business in the event of his annuity remaining unpaid at any time for six months. It was further provided that B should not be entitled to sell the business or any part of the plant during A's lifetime.

Part of the plant consisted of heavy fixed machinery which could not be removed except at great expense and loss of time, and the business had been carried on in the same premises for upwards of twenty years.

A having brought an action of summary removal against B, held that, as in a question between A and B, the agreement imported a lease of the premises during A's life, the rent though not specifically stated being covered by the annuity, and the defender assolviéd.

On 22d January 1894 William Thomson, engineer, Glasgow, as ^{1st Division.} first party, entered into an agreement with his two sons, William Thomson junior and John Thomson, and his son-in-law, Charles Davidson, as second parties, which contained, inter alia, the following clauses:—“Whereas the first party has for a number of years carried on the business of an engineer at 57 Smith Street, Kinning Park, Glasgow, and whereas the first party has resolved to hand over said business and whole stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill thereof, and machinery and appliances used in connection therewith, to the second party on the terms and conditions after specified: Therefore the parties have agreed and do hereby agree as follows, videlicet:—(First) The first party hereby assigns and transfers, as at the date hereof, to the second party, equally among them, the said Charles Davidson as representing and for behoof of his said wife, Marion Stark Thomson or Davidson, the business of engineer presently carried on by the first party at 57 Smith Street aforesaid, whether in his own name or under the style or firm of William Thomson & Company, and the whole stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill thereof, together with the whole machinery and appliances in said premises, whether fixed or unfixed, belonging to the first party. (Second) The first party shall forthwith insert a notice in the Gazette . . . that he has transferred his business to the second party. The first party shall, however, remain as consulting engineer in connection with the business, at such salary as may be agreed upon from time to time, and the second party shall be bound to take the advice of the first party on all points connected with the practical management and development of said business . . . but the first party shall not be responsible in any way for the advice so given, and he shall only give such time and attention to such points as he may think proper. (Third) The second party bind and oblige themselves to pay the whole debts and obligations of the first party in connection with said business at the date hereof. . . . (Fourth) In respect of the assignation of said business and stock, funds, assets, rents, and good-

No. 47.
 Dec. 18, 1896.
 Thomson v.
 Thomson.

will thereof, and machinery and appliances, the second party hereby bind and oblige themselves . . . to pay to the first party an annuity of £250 per annum during all the days and years of his life. . . . (Fifth) In the event of the said annuity remaining unpaid at any time for the period of six months, it shall be in the power and option of the first party, on giving one month's previous notice in writing . . . to enter into the possession and management of said business and stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill, and machinery and appliances, as if these presents had never been granted. . . . (Sixth) The second party shall not be at liberty to dispose, sell, or transfer said business, or any portion of the plant or stock and others, during the lifetime of the first party. . . ."

On the completion of the agreement, the second parties entered into possession of the premises, and carried on the business of engineers, under the name of William Thomson & Company.

At the date of the agreement, the title to the premises stood in name of William Thomson's wife, Mrs Isabella Thomson, the step-mother of the sons and daughter mentioned in the agreement, and her husband held a lease from her dated in 1883 for twenty years from that date. The agreement made no reference to this lease.

Disputes having arisen between the father and his sons, the present action was raised, on 3d June 1895, in the name of Mrs Thomson, against the second parties, concluding for decree ordaining them to remove summarily from the premises.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer had no interest or title to sue, as the subjects had been conveyed to her husband,* and on 10th January 1896 he was sisted as pursuer in her room and place, and certain additional statements and pleas were added to the record.

The pursuer averred that the defenders had been called upon to remove from the premises, but they refused to do so, and continued to occupy them without any right or title.

He also averred,—“The defenders have failed to carry out the obligations incumbent upon them under the said agreement. They have not paid to the pursuer the stipulated annuity. Further, they have declined to consult the pursuer with reference to the business in terms of article 2 of the said agreement. They have even excluded him from the premises by force, and have refused to allow him to do any of the matters specified in the said article of the agreement. The defenders have also, with the view of defeating the pursuer's rights, refused to agree upon the amount of salary to be paid to him in terms of the said article of the agreement, and have paid nothing to the pursuer in name of salary since the date of the said agreement.”

The defenders stated,—“When the agreement above referred to between the said pursuer and the defenders was signed, he represented himself as proprietor of the buildings and whole subjects. He has now become heritable proprietor of the subjects. Since the date of said agreement, the defenders have been in possession of said pre-

* In February 1894 an action had been raised by the judicial factor on Mr and Mrs Thomson's marriage-contract trust-estate against Mr Thomson and his wife for declarator that the subjects in question belonged to the pursuer. Mr Thomson defended the action, and stated that he had purchased the subjects, and had made a donation of them to his wife, which he revoked. It was subsequently arranged, in November 1894, that Mrs Thomson should convey the subjects to her husband, and this was done in January 1896.

No. 47.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

mises, and have continued to carry on and develop the said engineering business. They have observed the whole conditions of the said agreement in reference to the said pursuer, and the latter has repeatedly intimated in writing to the defenders that he insisted on the fulfilment by defenders of its terms. The defenders have paid pursuer's debts and obligations, in terms of article 3 of the agreement, amounting to £183 or thereby. They have also paid to the pursuer, on account of his annuity, the sum of £297, 8s. 3d. or thereby, up to Whitsunday 1895. They have also uplifted and retained, with the knowledge of and without challenge from the pursuer, the rents payable by the parties who occupy part of the foresaid land and premises, namely, Messrs Muir & Houston and James Boag. The defenders, in the belief that they would continue to have undisturbed possession, have considerably increased the capital in said business since the date of the agreement, and they have spent considerable sums in keeping up and improving the stock, machinery, and plant. It was the intention and in the contemplation of all the parties that defenders should carry on the business in the said premises, where it has for a long time been established. These are suitable for the purposes of the business, which could not be transferred elsewhere, unless the defenders succeeded in securing a suitable site, and built new premises thereon, and in any case the expense and delay and loss of business involved in such a transference would be very serious, if not ruinous, to the defenders."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having no right or title to occupy the said subjects, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The defenders are not entitled to found upon the said agreement between them and the pursuer William Thomson, in respect that they have failed and refuse to perform the obligations incumbent upon them in terms of the said agreement.

The defenders pleaded;—(10) This action, at the instance of William Thomson senior, is against the good faith of the agreement between him and the defenders, and the actings of parties subsequent thereto. (11) The defenders are entitled, as in a question with the pursuer, William Thomson senior, to continue in occupancy of the said premises, and the present action at his instance is unfounded and untenable.

Proof was led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court and the Lord Ordinary.

On 14th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) sustained the tenth plea in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof, assolizied them.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action of summary removing brought for the purpose of ejecting the defenders from certain workshops and offices in Smith Street, Kinning Park, Glasgow, which they have occupied since January 1894. When the action was raised, the formal title to the property stood in the name of Mrs Thomson, the defenders' stepmother; but, pendente processu, it passed to their father, who was therefore sisted in room of his wife, and is now the sole pursuer.

"The turning point of the case is a written agreement between the pursuer and the defenders, dated 2d January 1894, whereby the pursuer transferred to the defenders the business of an engineer, which, as the deed narrated, he had carried on for many years in these very premises. The transaction bore on the face of it to be a family arrangement, because the

No. 47.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The pursuer was proprietor of the subjects, and was entitled to remove the defenders summarily, unless they were able to shew some title of possession. They had none. They suggested that the agreement was equivalent to a lease, but it was not. It was silent both as to rent and as to duration, and contained no term which conferred a right to occupy the heritable subjects. Besides (2) the defenders had themselves broken an important condition of the agreement; it was therefore no longer binding on the pursuer.

Argued for the defenders ;—(1) At the date of the agreement the pursuer was de facto proprietor of the subjects. Any defect in his title as such had now been cured. In any view he was not entitled, by acquiring a different interest in the subjects, to break his contract regarding them. The agreement implied a right to occupy the transferees were not only his two sons, who are practical engineers, but his son-in-law, who is a rate collector, and was introduced into the business as representing his wife, the only other child of the pursuer's first marriage. The subjects transferred were 'the business of engineers, presently carried on by the first party at 57 Smith Street aforesaid, . . . and the whole stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill thereof, together with the whole machinery and appliances in said premises, whether fixed or unfixed, belonging to the first party.' In respect of this assignation, the defenders undertook to pay to the pursuer an annuity of £250 during his life. They also took over the whole debts and obligations of the business. There was a provision enabling the pursuer in the event of the annuity remaining unpaid for six months to enter into possession and management of all the subjects transferred; and the defenders were prohibited from disposing of the business or of any portion of the plant or stock during the pursuer's lifetime. There was also an ill-considered and unworkable stipulation to the effect that the pursuer was to remain as consulting engineer in connection with the business 'at such salary as might be agreed upon from time to time'; and that the defenders were to take his advice upon all points connected with the practical management of the business. These are the chief heads of the agreement, which certainly contains no express provision with regard to the business premises. The question is whether any such provision is implied, at all events to the effect of barring the pursuer from summarily ejecting his transferees. The question with him is thus essentially different from what it might have been with his wife.

"At the date of the agreement the pursuer was ostensibly tenant of the premises under a lease from his wife for twenty years from Whitsunday 1883 at a rent of £40. I say ostensibly, because he was to all intents and purposes proprietor. He had erected the buildings and the fixed machinery at his own cost; he had regularly paid the ground-annual, just as a proprietor would have done; and he had paid no rent to his wife. But on paper he was tenant merely. It followed from this that he could assign his right of occupancy down to Whitsunday 1903, validly enough so long as his wife did not object. It followed also that the machinery which he had erected and affixed to the soil had become a part of the heritable property belonging to his wife, subject only to his power of restoring its moveable character by removing it at or before the termination of the lease—(Miller v. Muirhead, 21 R. 658). The right to remove it was one which he could also assign, and he undoubtedly did so by assigning the fixed machinery itself. But the natural inference, as it seems to me, from his so assigning it, was that he did not intend the removal to take place until the end of the lease, and, if so, that he intended his assignees to remain in occupation of the premises till that period arrived.

"Another stipulation in the agreement which points strongly in the premises,¹ and was equivalent to a lease. The duration was the pursuer's lifetime. The rent was included in the annuity. If effect were given to the pursuer's contention, then the agreement quoad the business would continue, but the occupancy of the business premises would be terminated. Such a result was extravagant. The fixed plant would have to be left, and the remaining assets would be practically valueless. It was obviously contrary to the intention of parties that the business should be carried on outwith the premises in Smith Street. It was not necessary to consider what the effect of the agreement would be in a question with a singular successor. (2) The defenders had duly implemented their part of the agreement.

No. 47.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

same direction is the assignation of 'rents.' The pursuer in his evidence was not at all candid about this, but it is clearly enough established what these rents were. They were small payments made by Muir and Houston and Boag in respect of their occupation of stores in the Smith Street premises. Previous to the agreement these were drawn by the pursuer; since the agreement they have been drawn by the defenders till the present question arose. If any meaning at all is to be given to the word 'rents,' it is one which necessarily, I think, implies that the defenders were to be middlemen in the occupation of the premises, and therefore in a position to draw the rents.

"Again, there is the assignation of 'goodwill.' I do not say that every assignation of goodwill implies a right to occupy the premises in which the business is conducted. But this business had been conducted there for nearly twenty years. It was a business according to the evidence requiring for its success a situation in that locality. It was a business also requiring heavy fixtures—a steam hammer and the like,—which could not be removed and re-erected except at a large expenditure of time and money. If the profits are only £400 a year, as the defenders say they are (and the pursuer says nothing to the contrary), out of which the pursuer himself was to receive £250, it seems out of the question to suppose that the parties intended that new premises might at any moment have either to be bought or leased, and the fixed machinery torn up and removed there. My firm belief is that the parties intended nothing of the kind, and that the annuity of £250 was to be the consideration not only for the assignation of the business and the stock and machinery, but for the right to occupy the premises, or in other words, was to include the rent of the premises so long as the pursuer could give that right. He is now in a position to give it for the full period during which the annuity is to run, i.e., for the remainder of his life; and I think he is bound to do so, so long as the annuity is regularly paid. I arrive at the conclusion, both on a construction of the agreement as a whole, and also on the evidence of the conduct of parties, for I cannot otherwise explain the forbearance to demand any other rent than the £250 for a period of nearly two years on the part of one so little disposed as the pursuer seems to be to forego any of his supposed rights.

"An attempt was made to shew that the defenders had broken the agreement by not employing the pursuer at a salary as consulting engineer. There is evidence that the father and sons were on deplorably bad terms, and there may have been faults of temper on both sides. But I do not find that the fulfilment of so loose and unbusinesslike a stipulation was ever brought to a proper test, and I cannot therefore hold that the defenders committed any breach of their contract in this respect. They have regularly paid or tendered the annuity, which was the main thing.

"I shall therefore sustain the tenth plea in law for the defenders, and assolzie them, with expenses."

¹ Ewart v. Cochrane, March 22, 1861, 4 Macq. 117.

No. 47. At advising.—

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

LORD ADAM.—The question at issue between the parties depends upon the construction of an agreement, dated 22d January 1894, entered into between the pursuer and defenders, and the question appears to me to be whether that agreement contains in gremio, either expressly or by reasonable implication, a lease to the latter of the premises as in a question between them.

At the date of the agreement the title to the premises stood in the name of Mrs Thomson. The pursuer Mr Thomson was in possession of them, and carried on in them the business of an engineer.

He held a lease of them from Mrs Thomson for twenty years from Whitsunday 1883 at the rent of £40, but he was at the same time maintaining that he was the proprietor, having purchased them with his own money and made a gift of them to his wife, which he had revoked. That, and other matters, became the subject of litigation between the husband and wife, which resulted in an agreement, dated 4th November 1894, by which, inter alia, it was stipulated that Mrs Thomson should grant a valid title to the pursuer of the subjects in question. That was subsequently done, and the pursuer was, on 10th January 1896, sisted in her room and place as pursuer of this action.

It will be observed that the agreement of 22d January 1894, to which I have now to direct attention, contains no reference to the lease which at the time the pursuer held from his wife. It does not profess to assign that lease, or to grant a sublease, but all the stipulations contained in it proceed on the footing that the pursuer was in a position effectually and validly to contract as to them—(His Lordship then quoted the agreement).

This agreement has been duly implemented. The defenders are in possession of the premises, stock, plant, &c., under it. They have paid the debts of the pursuer in connection with the business at its date, and they have paid him the stipulated annuity. Nevertheless he now seeks to remove them summarily, on the ground that they have no lease or other title to possession of the heritable subjects.

It seems to me to be clear that the agreement was primarily one for the transfer of the pursuer's business as an engineer to the defenders. The business which was so transferred is described in the agreement as the business carried on by the pursuer at 57 Smith Street aforesaid, i.e., the premises in question—and looking to the nature of the business of an engineer—and that part of the plant transferred consisted of heavy fixed machinery which could not be removed except at great expense and loss of time, and that the business had been carried on in the premises for twenty years, and had necessarily acquired a certain goodwill—it appears to me that it was clearly the intention of the parties to the agreement that the business should be carried on in the same premises as theretofore. If that be so, it was and is necessary that the defenders should have a right to the occupancy of the premises for that purpose. I therefore think that the agreement contains an implied lease of the premises to the defenders for the period of its duration,—that is, the lifetime of the pursuer.

But it is said that there can be no lease without a rent stipulated for, and that there is none here. That might, no doubt, create a difficulty in a case with a singular successor, but in this case I think the rent formed part of the sum agreed to be paid by way of annuity and is included in it. As between the parties it was not necessary to distinguish in respect of what particular obligations the annuity of £250 was payable. Indeed, it appears to me that if it had not been intended that the business and premises should be inseparable during the currency of the agreement, there would have been a separate sum stipulated for as the rent of the premises.

No. 47.
Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

It cannot have been intended that the defenders should pay to the pursuer the same amount of annuity whether they were or were not in possession of his premises. I think, therefore, that we find in the agreement a lease of the premises for a definite period, viz., the lifetime of the pursuer, and at a rent which, although the amount thereof is not definitely fixed, is yet included in the annual sum payable by the defenders to him, and that, I think, is sufficient to give them a valid title to the possession of the subjects as in a question with the pursuer.

I concur in the Lord Ordinary's observations as to the inference arising from the assignation of the "rents" and "goodwill," to which I have nothing to add.

The result at which I have arrived might possibly have been different if Mrs Thomson had continued to be the pursuer of the action. In that case various pleas stated on record as against her would require to be disposed of. But I do not think it necessary to do so, because we have now only the present pursuer to deal with, and whether he was or was not de facto proprietor of the subjects when he entered into the agreement, he has now become proprietor, and is bound to do all he can to implement that agreement, and to do nothing to invalidate it; and it appears to me that the case must be dealt with in the same way as if he had been proprietor of the subjects when he entered into the agreement.

But the pursuer further maintains that the defenders are not entitled to found on the agreement, because they are themselves in breach of it. This refers to the clause in the agreement by which it was stipulated that the pursuer should remain as consulting engineer, and that the defenders should take his advice as to the practical management of the business, and so on. Of this it is alleged the defenders are in breach. I agree with what the Lord Ordinary says as to that matter, and have only to add that, even if it were true that the defenders had failed to implement the contract in this respect, it would not give rise to an irritancy of the lease, and the consequent removal of the defenders, if I am right in thinking that there was a lease.

I observe that the Lord Ordinary has sustained the tenth plea in law for the defenders, which is to the effect that the action is against the good faith of the agreement. I think that ground of judgment is somewhat vague, and I should prefer to rest the judgment on the ground that the action is contrary to the terms of the agreement.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the defenders should be assoilzied.

LORD M'LAREN.—The first question for consideration is, what is the true meaning of the agreement between the pursuer and the defenders so far as

No. 47.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

relates to the occupation of the heritable property in which the business was carried on which is the subject of sale. Now, this is not the case of a sale of a commercial business carried on in a shop and warehouse where the migration to other premises would involve nothing more serious than the removal of the stock in trade from one building to another.

The business was the manufacture of certain descriptions of ironwork, and it was carried on in buildings and sheds specially arranged for work of this description, and with the aid of a steam-hammer and other machinery, partly fixed and partly moveable. It is in evidence that it would not be easy to find a suitable site for such a work in the locality where the Thomsons' business has been carried on, and where it is necessary that it should be carried on if the business connection of the firm is to be maintained. Moreover, even if a site were obtained, the removal of the fixed machinery and plant, and the erection of the buildings and sheds which are necessary for its accommodation, could not be accomplished without the expenditure of several hundred pounds, while it is the fact, and it was necessarily known to the pursuer, that his sons at the time of the agreement had no means, and could not possibly have taken over the business if it were to be carried on elsewhere than in the premises in which it was then placed. These considerations make it clear that a transference of the business to other premises was not in the contemplation of either of the parties to the agreement. The defenders could not have met the expense of establishing a new workshop, the pursuer would not have got his annuity, and the whole arrangement would have been a meaningless form.

But this is not all. The heritable property was purchased in the name of the pursuer's wife, who was the defenders' stepmother, and while the pursuer held the subjects under a lease terminating in 1903, he never paid any rent: It is not disputed that the cost of erecting the buildings and providing the machinery and plant was defrayed by the pursuer, and it is in evidence that the pursuer claimed the land in property as having been purchased with his money. In these circumstances the pursuer entered into an agreement with his sons, under which he assigned to them the whole stock, assets, &c., of the business described as carried on by him at Smith Street, Kinning Park, Glasgow, in consideration of an annuity for life of £250 and certain other advantages. I think this was a conveyance in general terms of every right which the pursuer had in relation to the business, and that it is no objection to the generality of such a conveyance that heritable estate is not specially mentioned in it.

It follows, in my opinion, that the assignment carried with it such a right to the occupation of the subjects during the pursuer's life as he was able to give, and that the annuity and other considerations were intended to include the rent which would otherwise be payable to the pursuer if he was proprietor, or the rent which the pursuer had agreed to pay to his wife if he were only a leaseholder.

It was of no consequence to the defenders to know what the precise title of their father was, because they were willing to take the premises and business with such right as their father was able to give them, which, as they calculated, was sufficient for their purposes.

Again, it is equally plain that there is nothing in the conditions of the bargain making it improbable that the pursuer should have so bound himself. I mean there is no such improbability and no such inequality in the bargain as ought to influence a Court of law to depart from the plain natural meaning of the words used, and to cast about for some more restricted kind of conveyance in order to remove difficulties which do not exist.

No. 47.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

The rights of the pursuer were fully protected by the clause which empowered him to resume possession if his annuity were not punctually paid. In other respects the terms of the agreement are such as are usual and suitable to the case of the head of a firm retiring from business, and desiring to be secured in a moderate income and to be relieved from the trouble and anxiety incident to the conduct of a business which depended on personal supervision.

Now, in the absence of words of special conveyance of the tenant's right, or words of special grant of a new leasehold right, it would not be consistent with principle to hold that the premises in Smith Street were warranted absolutely. I think, however, that there was an implied warranty of a more limited character, which imported this much, that the pursuer could not by abandoning the existing lease, and acquiring the land in property from his wife, defeat the rights of his assignees. Whatever title he might acquire to the land would, in my opinion, be burdened by the right of his assignees to possess the property so long as they were able to fulfil their engagements.

These considerations, as I think, suffice for the disposal of the case. I ought also to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the clause in the agreement assigning the rents of certain small subjects which the firm were in use to let is evidence that in the intention of the parties the defenders were to be the principal tenants of the subjects as a whole. It is not disputed that the defenders have regularly paid the annuity, and I think that the Lord Ordinary's observation regarding the employment of the pursuer as consulting engineer is well founded, viz., that this condition has never been brought to a test, because it has not been proved that the defenders have had occasion for the services of a consulting engineer.

While we may not admire the conduct of the defenders to their father, as brought out in the evidence, we have in this case only to consider the question of civil right, and I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to the decree of ejection which he claims.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have thought this case one of some difficulty. We cannot add a term to a written contract, and the plea which the Lord Ordinary has sustained appears to me to rest the defence not on any direct contractual obligation but upon some indefinite understanding or principle of good faith which is supposed to arise partly from the intention of the contract, and partly from extrinsic facts. I should not be disposed to concur in sustaining that plea, but upon consideration I have come to agree with your Lordships that a better ground of judgment may be found in a fair construction of the contract itself.

The purpose of the agreement is to transfer a going business from the pursuer to the defenders, and in carrying out that intention the pursuer assigns to the defenders the business of engineer carried on by him in the premises in question, and the whole stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill

No. 47.

Dec. 18, 1896.
Thomson v.
Thomson.

thereof, together with the whole machinery or plant, whether fixed or unfixed, belonging to him. The material points seem to me to be that at the date of this agreement the pursuer was in fact, as he is now in title also, the owner of the premises in question, that he had carried on his business for many years in these premises, that he had erected the buildings and fixed machinery for the purpose of the business, which, as the Lord Ordinary says, required a situation in that locality, and also required the use of heavy fixtures which could not be removed and re-erected except at the expenditure of a large amount of time and money. I think that by this agreement the defenders undertake to carry on the business as it was at this date. It is for this purpose that the fixed machinery is transferred to them. They have no right to remove that machinery during the subsistence of the agreement any more than to sever any other part of the heritable subjects from the remainder, but are bound to make use of it for the purposes of the business within the pursuer's premises. I think that an agreement of this kind for the transfer of the assets, goodwill, and plant of the business imports and carries with it a licence to the transferees to occupy the premises for the purpose of the business and during the subsistence of the agreement, provided they fulfil the obligations which they have undertaken in consideration of the rights conferred upon them.

I agree with Lord Adam, therefore, that the agreement contains the terms that are necessary to the personal contract of lease. It is not necessary to consider what might be the defenders' rights in a question with singular successors, but during the pursuer's life I think that he is not entitled to turn them out of the premises, so long as they continue to carry on the business and perform the stipulations in his favour.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT varied the interlocutor reclaimed against by deleting therefrom the words "sustain the tenth plea in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof," and quoad ultra adhered.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—GEORGE INGLIS & ORR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 48.

Jan. 5, 1897.
Soeder v.
Soeder.

JOHANN JJACKO LOUIS SOEDER, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

MRS JANE SOEDER, Defender (Respondent).—Baxter—Orr.
WILLIAM SHAW, Co-Defender.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Adultery—Relevancy—Latitude as regards time.—In an action of divorce by a husband against his wife on the ground of adultery the pursuer averred that the defender had committed adultery with persons named "during" periods which extended over from one year to three years, but specified no precise date or occasion within the several periods. The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) refused to allow a proof of these averments.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was an action of divorce on the ground of adultery at the instance of Johann Jjacko Louis Soeder against his wife, and also against William Shaw as co-defender, there being a conclusion for payment of £500 in name of damages against the co-defender.*

* Mr Shaw died during the dependence of the action.

The condescendence contained thirty-five articles, and in some of these the pursuer specified the date, and the place of alleged acts of adultery committed by the defender. No. 48.

Jan. 5, 1897.
Soeder v.
Soeder.

Articles 11, 15, 24, and 25 were as follows:—(Cond. 11) "During the said years 1893, 1894, and 1895 the defender was in the habit of visiting the said co-defender Shaw at his said shop at No. 2 . . . Edinburgh, and she then within his said shop on the occasion of such visits committed adultery with him. These visits were made for the sole purpose of obtaining drink and for immoral purposes. On such occasions the defender was shewn into Shaw's private room in his said shop, where she remained with him for hours. They frequently left this shop and went to the house of a Mrs M. at No. 4 . . . , and the pursuer avers that they committed adultery there." (Cond. 15) "During the year from July to December 1893, and during the year 1894, and from January to April 1895, Shaw used frequently to meet the defender at the house of a Mrs B., tenanted by her at No. 11 . . . Street, Edinburgh, from Whitsunday 1893 to Whitsunday 1894, and subsequently at No. 38 . . . Street there, which she occupied from Whitsunday 1894 to Whitsunday 1895, and which houses were well-recognised houses of ill-fame, and well known as such to the defender, and were frequented by men and women for immoral purposes. On the occasion of all such visits the said defender committed adultery with Shaw." (Cond. 24) "The pursuer avers that the defender and [a man] Berthout were in the habit of frequently meeting at the house of the said Mrs B., at No. 11 . . . Street aforesaid, during the years 1893 and 1894 while she resided there, and that the defender then committed adultery with him." (Cond. 25) "The pursuer further avers that the said Berthout, during the year from Whitsunday 1894 to Whitsunday 1895, frequently met the said defender at B.'s house at . . . Street aforesaid, and that she committed adultery with him there. The pursuer reserves all claims of damages competent to him against the said Berthout."

On 25th November 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed parties a proof of their averments in twenty of the articles of condescendence and relative answers, but not of, inter alia, the averments in articles 11, 15, 24, and 25.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The latitude taken was not too wide. The allegations were to the effect that the defender had been living a life of habitual adultery and frequenting brothels. In such a case it was not necessary to specify precise dates and particular occasions.¹ Besides, with reference to the specific averments of

* "NOTE.—I have refused to allow a proof of certain articles of the condescendence, because they are in my view much too vague to be admitted to probation. With regard to articles 15 and 24, inasmuch as the averments refer to visits by a married woman to a house of ill-fame, I should have been disposed to allow proof if the pursuer had been able to assign a good reason for taking so great a latitude in point of time as two years, but he has not done so, and I am not satisfied that he has taken the usual and proper means of ascertaining what evidence is available to him, and thereby of making his averments as specific as possible. Indeed, I have never seen the condescendence in an action of divorce for adultery so vague and discursive in its whole scheme."

¹ Walker v. Walker, July 20, 1871, 9 Macph. 1091, 43 Scot. Jur. 477; Graves v. Graves, Dec. 15, 1842, 3 Curtis, 235; Smith v. Smith, Nov. 3, 1859, 29 L. J. Matrim. Cases, 62; Steel v. Steel, July 10, 1835, 13 S. 1096.

No. 48.

Jan. 5, 1897.
Soeder v.
Soeder.

which a proof had been allowed, the proof of these would be facilitated by the evidence led to establish the more general averments, for these would shew clearly the relations of parties.

Argued for the defender;—Proof had been allowed of twenty articles of the condescendence, some of which contained averments of specific instances of adultery, and it was difficult to see what benefit the pursuer could take from proving the general averments. But, in any view, the latitude of time taken was far too wide. Notice to the defender of what she really had to meet was entirely wanting. The rule was that the averments must be as precise and pointed as they could be made,¹ and that rule was not followed here. The averment in Walker's case² was that the parties met clandestinely during nine months. In Smith's case,³ it was said that the parties were living together in the same house. In Graves' case,⁴ the charge was of habitual criminal intercourse for four months. These cases did not therefore support the pursuer's contention.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is the usual, though by no means the invariable, practice, when a summons is held relevant, to allow to each party a proof of his averments. Such an order does not imply that everything averred is relevant or a proper subject of probation, and where the averments are remitted to proof generally it is always understood that evidence as to particular facts may be objected to on the ground of non-relevancy or insufficient notice on the record.

These qualifications of the effect of a general allowance of proof seem to be especially necessary in divorce cases, which are of a nature cognate to criminal proceedings. But I think it is primarily a matter for the discretion of the Judge making the order for proof whether he is to make a general order, reserving such questions as I have alluded to for determination at the proof, or whether he should limit the proof to those matters as to which he thinks a relevant averment has been made.

Now, the pursuer comes into Court with a condescendence consisting of thirty-five articles directed to the establishment of a case of adultery against his wife, and he has so little confidence in his case that he wishes to be allowed to prove those charges that are objected to on the ground of indefiniteness in preference to those which are clear and specific. This seems eminently a case for the revision of the record by the Lord Ordinary with a view to extracting from it the proper issuable matter. The Lord Ordinary has done so in the present case with great care, specifying the articles which he thinks not objectionable, and giving his reasons for rejecting one or two where there might be a question. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has dealt properly with the action in limiting the proof as he has done. If he had limited it still more probably we might not have differed, but his Lordship has proceeded on the principle of giving the pursuer leave to prove every fact which is stated with the latitude of place and time allowed in criminal proceedings.

¹ Tulloch v. Tulloch, Feb. 22 and 28, 1861, 23 D. 639, Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 644, 33 Scot. Jur. 314.

² 9 Macph. 1091.

³ 29 L. J. Matrim. Cases, 62.

⁴ 3 Curtis, 235.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I think the Lord Ordinary has No. 48.
 allowed the pursuer a very large latitude as regards time by the interlocutor reclaimed against. The particular articles of the condescendence of which Jan. 5, 1897.
 the pursuer now seeks to be allowed a proof are 11, 15, 24, and 25. Soeder v. Soeder.
 Article 11 covers a period of three years without specifying a single date or any one particular occasion on which an alleged call was made. Now to allow a proof of so vague and general a statement would be very unfair to the defenders, and I am certainly not disposed to allow a proof of it. The other articles in question appear to me to be open to the same objection, that they fail to specify any one particular date or a single occasion so that the defender can be in a position to meet any evidence that may be led in support. I therefore agree that the reclaiming note should be refused.

LORD KINNAR.—I agree.

The LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree.

THE COURT adhered.

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—BUCHAN & BUCHAN, S.S.C.—D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—
 Agents.

JOHN FLEMING AND OTHERS, Complainers (Reclaimers).—Jameson— No. 49.
Clyde.

THE LIDDESDALE DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF Jan. 6, 1897.
 ROXBURGH AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Shaw—Graham Stewart. Fleming v.
 Liddesdale

Police—Burgh—Special Lighting District—Oil as an illuminant—Burgh Police Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 99.—Section 99 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, enacts,—“The Commissioners shall make provision for lighting in a suitable manner all the streets and all other places within the burgh, which in their judgment should be lighted at the public expense, and shall provide . . . lamps . . . and cause to be lighted such lamps by means of gas or such other light of an improved kind, subject to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act of 1882, or any Act or Acts amending or superseding the same, as they may find expedient.”
 District Committee.

Held that the use of oil as an illuminant is not excluded by the terms of the section.

When a District Committee of a County Council, which had adopted section 99 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, for a special lighting district, proposed to light a village within it by oil lamps, interdict against their doing so refused.

Per Lord M'Laren,—“It seems to me that in a measure of this kind, intended to apply to large towns and small, and even to mere villages, the District Committee would be taking a very inadequate view of its powers and duties if it merely approached the subject of lighting from the point of view, which is the best of all known illuminants? They have to consider which is the most suitable for the requirements of their district.”

ON 11th February 1896, the Liddesdale District Committee of the 1st Division.
 County Council of the County of Roxburgh, upon consideration of a re-Ld Stormonth-quisition from the Parish Council of Castleton in terms of subsection 1 Darling. of section 44 of the Local Government Scotland Act, 1894, formed the Parish of Castleton into a special district for the purpose of lighting, and resolved that sections 99, 100, 101, and 105 of the Burgh Police

No. 49.

Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

(Scotland) Act should be adopted within the said special district, and appointed a Lighting Committee. Section 99 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 99, enacts,—“The Commissioners shall make provision for lighting in a suitable manner all the streets and all other places within the burgh which in their judgment should be lighted at the public expense, and shall provide . . . lamps . . . and shall light, or shall enter into contracts for lighting, and cause to be lighted, such lamps by means of gas, or such other light of an improved kind, subject to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, or any Act or Acts amending or superseding the same, as they may find expedient.”

The Lighting Committee having proposed to light the village of Newcastleton with oil lamps, John Fleming, farmer, Roan, Newcastleton, and others—persons liable to be assessed as occupiers in the district—presented this note of suspension and interdict against the Liddesdale District Committee and the Lighting Committee, praying the Court to interdict “the respondents from lighting, or entering into contracts, or otherwise making provisions, for the public lighting of the special lighting district of the parish of Castleton, or any part thereof, by oil lamps, or by lamps other than gas lamps, or lamps lit by means of light of an improved kind, subject to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, or any Act or Acts amending the same.”

The complainers stated;—(Stat. 5) “The respondents, the said Lighting Committee, with the sanction and approval of the said District Committee, do not propose to light any part of the said special district except the said village of Newcastleton. . . . The respondents, however, propose to carry out their lighting scheme by means of the same oil lamps which have been in use for the last fifteen years in the village. For this purpose they have acquired by donation, or for a merely nominal price, the said lamps, and are about to light and maintain the same at the expense of the whole district, and are about to acquire additional lamps of exactly the same kind in order to extend the lighting of said village. The said lamps are ordinary oil lamps, without any improvement or modern contrivance, but of the kind which were in use prior to the introduction of gas lighting; they are of the commonest pattern, and not capable of giving any light of an improved kind. In windy weather they are blown out or become so blackened as to give almost no light. At the best, the light they produce is greatly inferior in every respect to that given by ordinary street gas lamps or by electric light. The said oil lamps are not in any sense ‘light of an improved kind,’ nor is it possible to apply to them the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882. The complainers object to the respondents carrying out the lighting scheme in said special district in a manner which is inconsistent with the terms of said section 99 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. . . .”

The respondents answered;—(Ans. 5) “Admitted that the respondents propose to light certain parts of the parish with the oil lamps formerly in use and some additional lamps of a similar character. Quoad ultra denied.” The respondents further stated that the light given by the lamps in question was equal to that given by an ordinary gas street lamp, and that they were willing to use annular burners, which gives a light of from 40 to 45 candle power. “There are no works in the parish for the manufacture of gas or electric light, and hitherto the place has been lighted by paraffin lamps. The respondents have received these lamps in gift, and the whole cost of lighting per annum will be about £15, while if gas or electric light were to be employed the expense would be infinitely greater, without any corresponding benefit."

No. 49.
—
Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

The complainers pleaded;—The scheme of lighting the said special district by means of oil lamps being illegal and contrary to statute, and particularly to the terms of section 99 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the complainers are entitled to interdict as craved.

On 15th December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed parties a proof of their averments.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Having regard to the terms of sec. 99 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, it was illegal to light with oil lamps. Permission to use oil was not given by the statute, and the words "such other light of an improved kind" must mean such other illuminant of an improved kind. The section contemplated the use of gas or electric light, and any new illuminant which might be discovered or invented. This view was supported by the terms of section 126 of the Police Act of 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), which gave power to light by means "of oil or gas, or such other light of an improved kind as they may find expedient." The word "oil" there included was omitted in the Act of 1892 now in force. (2) In any view the proof should be restricted. A general proof would be unworkable—there ought to be some finding as to the meaning of "light of an improved kind."

Argued for the respondents;—The Burgh Police Act did not exclude the use of oil. The word "improved" must not be too strictly construed; what was meant was some superior light suitable for the locality, and of the suitability the committee were to be the judges. To confine the lighting to gas or electricity would mean enormous expense to a small community like this.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary allowing proof, and under the reclaiming note we have raised the question of the limitation of proof, and also the question of the relevancy of the defences. It is difficult to consider this question without considering also the relevancy of the note of suspension under which the question has been brought before us. The note craves an interdict against lighting the parish of Castleton "by lamps other than gas lamps, or lamps lit by means of light of an improved kind, subject to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, or any Act or Acts amending the same," quoting the clause of the Burgh Police Act condescended on.

Now, the Court in general will not grant an interdict which is merely an echo of a statutory provision. An interdict must be directed against some specific act which is alleged to be in contravention of the statute, and not merely against doing anything which is contrary to the statute, and the reason is obvious. The party interdicted must be told plainly what are the acts which he is enjoined not to do, in order that he may regulate his conduct in conformity with the interdict. Therefore I do not think that in any view we could grant interdict against lighting the streets of New-castleton otherwise than by gas or "other light of an improved kind."

No. 49.

Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

But we are also moved to grant interdict against lighting this town or village by means of oil. The complainers' argument is rested on the 99th section of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, as made applicable by the Local Government Act of 1894, and it proceeds on the narrative that the parish of Castleton has been formed into a lighting district under the provisions of this statute, and that the district authority has determined to put in force the powers of this 99th section. We are asked to find that the system of lighting which has been introduced is contrary to the powers conferred by this section. The provision of the statute is,—“The Commissioners” (i.e., the District Committee) “shall make provision for lighting in a suitable manner all the streets and all other places within the burgh” (i.e., the parish or parishes) by erecting lamps, and shall “cause to be lighted such lamps by means of gas, or such other light of an improved kind.” I pause here to say that while only one illuminant is mentioned, other lights of an improved kind are permissible, and it is quite evident from the generality of the expression that it was not considered desirable to limit the powers of the administration of the district to any particular kind of light, but rather to give them a discretion to substitute any suitable equivalent. Then the statute proceeds,—“subject to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, or any Act or Acts amending or superseding the same.”

Now, this expression is perhaps somewhat elliptical; for electric lighting had not been mentioned in the antecedent part of the clause, but we must take it that, if electric light were adopted, it would be subject to the provisions of that Act of 1882. Then come the words, “as they may find expedient,” which I cannot help thinking are words governing the construction of the whole antecedent part of the clause. There is a general reference to the question of expediency, and the decision of such questions is left to the governing body constituted by statute for the purpose. Of course it might happen that some antiquated or perverse system of illumination was adopted by a Local Authority, it might be for the purpose of defeating the intention of the Act. In such a case I have no doubt that the Court has jurisdiction to say that the powers conferred by the clause had not been fairly exercised, and that the resolution was invalid. But before we can pronounce the resolution to light the streets of Castleton by oil lamps of the character described to be null, we must be satisfied that a radical case of excess or abuse of power is alleged. Because, if the necessary averments do not come up to an abuse of the power, I am afraid the question whether oil is an improvement or not is a matter of opinion, and that is just the thing which is referred to the District Committee under the general reference of the expediency of the particular illumination.

It seems to me that in a measure of this kind, intended to apply to large towns and small, and even to mere villages, the District Committee would be taking a very inadequate view of its powers and duties if it merely approached the subject of lighting from the point of view, which is the best of all known illuminants? They have to consider which is the most suitable for the requirements of their district.

The argument was directed against the use of oil, and, as I understood it, was to the effect that oil light was not within the powers conferred by the statute, because it could not be described as an improved method of illumination. Following up that argument, I suppose that gas and electric light, being the things mentioned in the statute, are what are intended to be universally introduced, or at most these two coupled with some unknown illuminant, which may be hereafter invented. I am unable to agree with that construction of the statute. If, for example, it were proposed to establish a system of electric lighting for a small community like this, it would be difficult to resist the argument that that was a perversion of the powers of the statute by the introduction of a light too expensive and unsuitable for the locality. That is not the subject of consideration, but I am unable to find anything in the words of the Act which prohibits the District Committee from illuminating by oil, if they can find a system of oil illumination which satisfies the general words of the Act, as being of an "improved kind."

No. 49.

Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

I adopt the observation made by Mr Shaw that such expressions are not to be tested by rigid rules of criticism. The language is popular, and "improved light" just means any good and efficient quality of light, of which the District Committee are to be the judges.

The chief difficulty in disposing of this case consists in the curious position in which the parties have been placed with reference to the question of proof. The ordinary case is that a proof is moved for by the pursuer, who has to establish his case by evidence, while the defender resists. But here the Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof, and the complainers have reclaimed against that order, with a view to appealing to the Court either to restrict it or to give a judgment without any proof at all. I am not sure in what way it is sought to restrict the proof, for if the proof is to enable the Court to interpret the statute, and find out what is an improved description of light, it would be very difficult to limit it at all. The defenders, again, while not expressing any enthusiasm for the proposed inquiry, have not directly moved us to disallow a proof.

It appears to me that as the complainers under their reclaiming note have raised the whole question of proof, and as they have satisfied me that this is not a case in which the construction of the statute can be aided by evidence, the whole matter of proof or no proof is before us. My own opinion is that it is a very doubtful principle to allow a proof in order to construe a statute. It might be necessary where there is a patent ambiguity, but it is one which we are not familiar with, and which I should hesitate to pronounce competent at all. In the present case, my view is that proof is entirely unnecessary, because upon the facts as stated the District Authority has not exceeded its powers as defined by the statute. While the complainers have satisfied me upon their first proposition, they have failed to convince me that under no circumstances can oil be used as an illuminant within the meaning of the Act. It appears to me that it is entirely within the discretion of the committee to introduce a system of lighting by oil which in their opinion is an improvement,—that is to say, a system of lighting as good as can be obtained consistently with economy and the requirements of the case. It follows, in my opinion, that the note should be dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—The complainers here seek to have the respondents interdicted from lighting the special district of the parish of Newcastleton

No. 49.

Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

But we are also moved to grant interdict against lighting this town or village by means of oil. The complainers' argument is rested on the 99th section of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, as made applicable by the Local Government Act of 1894, and it proceeds on the narrative that the parish of Castleton has been formed into a lighting district under the provisions of this statute, and that the district authority has determined to put in force the powers of this 99th section. We are asked to find that the system of lighting which has been introduced is contrary to the powers conferred by this section. The provision of the statute is,—“The Commissioners” (i.e., the District Committee) “shall make provision for lighting in a suitable manner all the streets and all other places within the burgh” (i.e., the parish or parishes) by erecting lamps, and shall “cause to be lighted such lamps by means of gas, or such other light of an improved kind.” I pause here to say that while only one illuminant is mentioned, other lights of an improved kind are permissible, and it is quite evident from the generality of the expression that it was not considered desirable to limit the powers of the administration of the district to any particular kind of light, but rather to give them a discretion to substitute any suitable equivalent. Then the statute proceeds,—“subject to the provisions of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, or any Act or Acts amending or superseding the same.”

Now, this expression is perhaps somewhat elliptical; for electric lighting had not been mentioned in the antecedent part of the clause, but we must take it that, if electric light were adopted, it would be subject to the provisions of that Act of 1882. Then come the words, “as they may find expedient,” which I cannot help thinking are words governing the construction of the whole antecedent part of the clause. There is a general reference to the question of expediency, and the decision of such questions is left to the governing body constituted by statute for the purpose. Of course it might happen that some antiquated or perverse system of illumination was adopted by a Local Authority, it might be for the purpose of defeating the intention of the Act. In such a case I have no doubt that the Court has jurisdiction to say that the powers conferred by the clause had not been fairly exercised, and that the resolution was invalid. But before we can pronounce the resolution to light the streets of Castleton by oil lamps of the character described to be null, we must be satisfied that a radical case of excess or abuse of power is alleged. Because, if the necessary averments do not come up to an abuse of the power, I am afraid the question whether oil is an improvement or not is a matter of opinion, and that is just the thing which is referred to the District Committee under the general reference of the expediency of the particular illumination.

It seems to me that in a measure of this kind, intended to apply to large towns and small, and even to mere villages, the District Committee would be taking a very inadequate view of its powers and duties if it merely approached the subject of lighting from the point of view, which is the best of all known illuminants? They have to consider which is the most suitable for the requirements of their district.

The argument was directed against the use of oil, and, as I understood it, was to the effect that oil light was not within the powers conferred by the statute, because it could not be described as an improved method of illumination. Following up that argument, I suppose that gas and electric light, being the things mentioned in the statute, are what are intended to be universally introduced, or at most these two coupled with some unknown illuminant, which may be hereafter invented. I am unable to agree with that construction of the statute. If, for example, it were proposed to establish a system of electric lighting for a small community like this, it would be difficult to resist the argument that that was a perversion of the powers of the statute by the introduction of a light too expensive and unsuitable for the locality. That is not the subject of consideration, but I am unable to find anything in the words of the Act which prohibits the District Committee from illuminating by oil, if they can find a system of oil illumination which satisfies the general words of the Act, as being of an "improved kind."

I adopt the observation made by Mr Shaw that such expressions are not to be tested by rigid rules of criticism. The language is popular, and "improved light" just means any good and efficient quality of light, of which the District Committee are to be the judges.

The chief difficulty in disposing of this case consists in the curious position in which the parties have been placed with reference to the question of proof. The ordinary case is that a proof is moved for by the pursuer, who has to establish his case by evidence, while the defender resists. But here the Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof, and the complainers have reclaimed against that order, with a view to appealing to the Court either to restrict it or to give a judgment without any proof at all. I am not sure in what way it is sought to restrict the proof, for if the proof is to enable the Court to interpret the statute, and find out what is an improved description of light, it would be very difficult to limit it at all. The defenders, again, while not expressing any enthusiasm for the proposed inquiry, have not directly moved us to disallow a proof.

It appears to me that as the complainers under their reclaiming note have raised the whole question of proof, and as they have satisfied me that this is not a case in which the construction of the statute can be aided by evidence, the whole matter of proof or no proof is before us. My own opinion is that it is a very doubtful principle to allow a proof in order to construe a statute. It might be necessary where there is a patent ambiguity, but it is one which we are not familiar with, and which I should hesitate to pronounce competent at all. In the present case, my view is that proof is entirely unnecessary, because upon the facts as stated the District Authority has not exceeded its powers as defined by the statute. While the complainers have satisfied me upon their first proposition, they have failed to convince me that under no circumstances can oil be used as an illuminant within the meaning of the Act. It appears to me that it is entirely within the discretion of the committee to introduce a system of lighting by oil which in their opinion is an improvement,—that is to say, a system of lighting as good as can be obtained consistently with economy and the requirements of the case. It follows, in my opinion, that the note should be dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—The complainers here seek to have the respondents interdicted from lighting the special district of the parish of Newcastleton

No. 49.

Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

No. 49.

Jan. 6, 1897.
Fleming v.
Liddesdale
District
Committee.

"with oil lamps," and so on. As I read that interdict, it means an interdict against lighting with oil lamps of any kind whatever. There are observations of an unfavourable character made as to the oil lamps used or proposed to be used by the respondents in the lighting of Newcastleton. But this interdict does not strike at the use of any particular oil lamps. The real question is, are the respondents entitled or not to use oil lamps, it may be of the best description, to light the village?

Mr Clyde maintained that they were not so entitled, because upon a construction of section 99 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, it was ultra vires of the respondents to use oil lamps at all. His construction was that the only competent light would be by means of gas, or some kind of illuminant, such as electric light, of an improved kind as compared with gas. He says oil is not an illuminant of an improved kind, and therefore the respondents have no power to use it.

But I do not agree with that construction of the statute at all. I do not think that these words were meant to institute a comparison between gas and electric light on the one hand and oil light on the other. I think the words mean no more than light of an efficient kind, of a good kind, of a modern kind; it may be an improved kind with reference to the use of oil itself,—the use of an oil as compared with the oil used before the introduction of modern oils and methods of burning it.

Therefore I think that it was quite within the powers of the District Committee—and it is to them that discretion is given—to employ oil lamps if they thought proper, and it would be a very serious matter if we were to hold anything else. According to the complainers' view, no village can be lighted at all unless you are to establish a gas manufactory or an electric installation. How could a small village afford an expensive establishment of that sort, upon pain of being left in total darkness?

I think therefore that the interdict ought to be refused.

But Mr Clyde went on to say that, in any view, he objected to the proof allowed here. He was quite right in that contention. But he did not say what proof he desired, or what the limitation should be. I quite agree with him that a proof at large is out of the question. But I go a step further than Mr Clyde, and I agree with Lord M'Laren that, the whole question being open, there should be no proof, and that we should decide this case upon the construction of the statute alone in favour of Mr Shaw's clients.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

The LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and dismissed the note of suspension and interdict.

STRATHERN & BLAIR, W.S.—TURNBULL & HERDMAN, W.S.—Agents.

MISS CATHERINE M'ELROY AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).— No. 50.
Watt.

THE LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION, Defenders (Reclaimers).
 —Ure—Clyde.

Jan. 6, 1897.
 M'Elroy v.
 London
 Assurance
 Corporation.

Insurance—Fire—Agreement to Insure—Occurrence of fire before premium paid—Payment to Agent—Relevancy.—In an action brought against an insurance company to recover loss arising from a fire which took place in May, the pursuer averred that in April he “insured with the defenders’ agent A certain subjects, that a policy was duly prepared by the defenders, and the premium due thereunder was paid to A as defenders’ agent, who has remitted the sum to them less the usual commission allowed for obtaining the insurance and collecting the premium as the agent of the defenders.” The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant on the ground that the pursuer did not aver that the policy had been delivered or that the premium had been paid prior to the fire, and that A was authorised to receive payment on behalf of the company.

Observations on the effect of delivery of a policy without payment of a premium, and of payment of a premium without delivery of a policy.

ON 22d June 1896 Misses Catherine, Mary, and Agnes M'Elroy, ^{1ST DIVISION.} residing in Glasgow, raised an action against the London Assurance Corporation concluding for a decree against the defenders for payment of £80. <sup>Lord Kincairney.</sup>

The pursuers averred;—“(Cond. 2) In or about the end of April 1896 the pursuers insured with the defenders’ agent, Mr Thomas M'Elroy, writer in Glasgow, against loss by fire for one year from that date the household furniture and personal effects belonging to them within said dwelling-house, for the sum of £700, and a policy of insurance was duly prepared by the defenders, and the premium due thereunder was paid to the said Thomas M'Elroy, as defenders’ agent, who has remitted the same to them, less the usual commission at 15 per cent allowed for obtaining the insurance and collecting the premium as the agent of the defenders.”

They further averred that in the end of May a fire occurred which resulted in the destruction of furniture and other effects belonging to them to the value of £80, and that the defenders refused to indemnify them for the loss.

The defenders stated;—“(Stat. 1) On 29th April 1896, the defenders’ inspector casually met Mr Thomas M'Elroy, who is a brother of the pursuers, and was asked by him, on behalf of his sisters, to prepare a policy of fire insurance for £700 in names of the pursuers over their furniture, &c., . . . The said Thomas M'Elroy was not an agent of the defenders’ company, he held no appointment as such, and he could not in any way bind the defenders’ company. . . . (Ans. 1) Admitted that the insurance was instructed by Mr M'Elroy (who is pursuers’ brother) through the defenders’ inspector. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that, both at the meeting when the insurance was instructed, and previously, the defenders’ inspector had solicited the said Thomas M'Elroy to secure insurances for the defenders, as an agent for the company, on the understanding that he would be paid the usual agent’s commission. (Stat. 2) The policy was duly prepared, and on 2d May 1896 the defenders wrote to the said Thomas M'Elroy, stating that it would be sent to him on payment of the premium. (Ans. 2)

No. 50.
 Jan. 6, 1897.
 M'Elroy v.
 London
 Assurance
 Corporation.

The policy and letter* are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. . . . Explained that said policy is dated 1st May 1896, and that the insurance thereunder took effect from that date. (Stat. 3) The said Thomas M'Elroy and the pursuers, so far as the defenders are aware, took no notice whatever of the letter; and, at all events, the payment of the premium was not made to the defenders at the date of the alleged fire, and the policy is still in the hands of the defenders. . . . (Ans. 3) Believed to be true that said policy is in defenders' hands. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that in said letter from the defenders to the said Thomas M'Elroy, the defenders state,—(Letter of 2d May 1896 quoted). Said commission is allowed to agents for obtaining the insurances, and for trouble in collecting the premiums thereunder; and it was so allowed in the present case to the said Thomas M'Elroy. Explained further that, upon 6th June 1896, the said Thomas M'Elroy wrote a letter to the defenders' manager in Glasgow, sending him 12s., being the said premium, less his commission as agent. Upon 8th June 1896 the defenders' said manager replied as follows to said letter:—'Glasgow, 8th June 1896.—Dear Sir,—2 Spring Gardens—We are in receipt of your favour of 6th inst., enclosing postal order for 12s., being the amount of premium, less commission, for the insurance of £700 over furniture in this dwelling-house. We shall forward a policy in a few days. Meanwhile, pending delivery of that document, we hand you covering note to keep matters in order.†—Yours faithfully, T. S. BROWN, District Manager.' Explained further, that it was only after the fire in question had occurred, and also after the said Thomas M'Elroy had remitted the said premium, less commission, that the defenders, for the first time, intimated that the policy had been cancelled."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent as laid, or otherwise, separatim, the action is excluded by the arbitration clause in the policy. (2) The pursuers' averments being irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the defenders should be assoilzied therefrom.

On 4th December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) repelled the first plea in law for the defenders, and before further answer allowed a proof.‡

* Mr T. S. Brown, District Manager, to Mr Thomas M'Elroy,—“Dear Sir,—We have prepared this policy in accordance with your instructions, and shall be glad to receive the premium as undernoted at your convenience, when the policy, which is the receipt of the first year's premium, will be sent you,—14s., less 15 per cent commission, 2s. = 12s.”

† The covering note was in the following terms:—“8th June 1896.—Misses Catherine, Mary Annie, and Agnes M'Elroy having this day made a proposal to insure the sum of £700, and having paid the sum of 14s. as premium, the property as described in the proposal shall be held insured by this receipt for a period not exceeding thirty days from the date hereof.”

‡ “OPINION.—This is an ordinary petitory action for £80. It is explained on record that it is the estimated damage sustained by the pursuers through a fire by which the pursuers' furniture and personal effects were destroyed or injured. It is averred that the furniture and personal effects were insured against fire with the defenders.

“The defenders pleaded that the action was incompetent, because there was no conclusion for declarator that the subjects had been insured, and because the amount of the damage fell to be ascertained by reference. I

No. 50.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The action was incompetent. The summons proceeded on the assumption that there was a contract of insurance. That was disputed. No policy had been issued. There should have been a declaratory conclusion. Moreover, the amount of damage—if the action were to be taken as limited to that question—fell to be ascertained by arbitration. (2) The action was irrelevant. It was not said on what date the premium was paid, or that it had been paid prior to the fire. Before the issue of a policy—and none was issued here—or the payment of a premium, there was no concluded contract.¹ The description of Thomas M'Elroy merely as defenders' agent was insufficient. The scope of his authority should be stated. The Lord Ordinary had mistaken the purport of the letter to which he referred.

Jan. 6, 1897.
M'Elroy v.
London
Assurance
Corporation.

Argued for the pursuers;—The action was competent. The only remedy open to the pursuers was to sue for the loss sustained. The policy was not in their hands, and they could not know its exact terms and conditions, but they were willing to refer the amount of damages, and had at once offered to do so. (2) The statements in cond. 2 were a relevant averment of an agreement by the defenders to insure, and that the pursuers had duly paid the premium of insurance to the defenders' agent. The cases cited for the defenders were not in point, for they were decided on the ground that there had been a change of circumstances before the payment of a premium; but in this case it was impossible to read cond. 2 except as meaning that the premium had been paid before the fire took place.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuers of this action aver that they insured the furniture in their dwelling-house against loss by fire with the defenders, the London Assurance Corporation; that a fire took place causing damage to the extent of £80, and that they have raised this action to recover that sum. The defenders meet their claim with sundry objections, the objection giving rise to the most serious consideration being set out in the defenders' second plea in law, viz., that the pursuers' averments are irrelevant.

The only material averment bearing on this question is contained in cond. 2—(Quotes it).

see no necessity for a declaratory conclusion, and think it sufficient that the contract of insurance should be averred on record. It may be that the amount of the damage must be referred to arbitration, and the pursuers had no objection that it should be so ascertained. But it must, in the first place, be decided whether there was a completed contract of insurance, and if that be decided in the affirmative, then it may be that the amount to be paid may be adjusted by agreement. I am therefore of opinion that the defenders' first plea is bad.

"As to the relevancy I have more difficulty, but think that the safer course is to allow a proof before answer. I might not have done so but for the letter of the defenders' manager, printed on record. He there accepts a premium. The defenders say that that was a premium for a new policy about to be made out, and not for the policy which had been made out in the beginning of May. That, however, seems to involve a question of fact."

¹ Canning v. Farquhar, 1886, L. R., 16 Q. B. D. 727, Lord Esher, M. R., at p. 731; Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited, v. General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, July 12, 1892, 19 R. 977.

No. 50.

Jan. 6, 1897.
M'Elroy v.
London
Assurance
Corporation.

I agree with the comment which has been made on that averment, that it is clear that the alleged policy was never delivered to the pursuers. There is no averment that it was. All that is said is that a policy was duly prepared by the defenders. I infer from that that it was not delivered. Arising from the fact that there is no averment of delivery, a subsidiary objection was taken by the defenders to the form of action. They maintain that the action should not have been a simple petitory action for a sum of money, but that it should have been for delivery of a policy, and failing delivery, for damages. I understand, however, that the defenders do not now desire to press that objection, as the result—whatever was the form of action—would be the same.

Taking the averments above quoted, even though the policy were still in the hands of the Corporation, I should be disposed to take a more favourable view of the pursuers' case if there were any relevant or proper averment that payment had been made by them of the premium to Mr M'Elroy as agent for the defenders, and duly authorised to receive such premium, and that the payment had been made before the fire took place. But that is where the blot on this record lies. There is no such averment. If it be the fact that a premium was so paid, then it is a fact entirely within the knowledge of the pursuers, and they were bound to make a clear averment of it.

If, however, we are entitled to assume that the payment of the premium was not made before the fire took place, then I am of opinion that the defenders were quite within their right to resile from the proposed insurance.

The Lord Ordinary, I gather, would have taken that view but for a certain letter written by the defenders' district manager to Mr M'Elroy. That letter is referred to on record, and when we examine it we find that it is plainly not an acceptance of the premium in question. On the contrary, the district manager accepts the sum enclosed, but at the same time sends a covering note which shews quite clearly that he accepts the premium for a new risk running from the 8th June. It may be that the manager had no right to accept and keep the money sent to him on these terms, on the ground that it was not sent to him for that purpose. But if that be so, it only means that he is bound to return it when asked. Accordingly, as there is no averment that the premium was paid before the fire took place, I am for recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and dismissing the action.

LORD M'LAREN.—Under this action the pursuers sue an insurance company on a claim to be indemnified for loss arising from fire, and the question which we have to consider at this stage of the case is, whether there is set out a relevant statement of a contract of indemnity under which the pursuers are entitled to sue.

As I have always understood,—indeed I think it is perfectly settled in the law of Scotland,—a contract of insurance can only be made in writing. It is true that in the somewhat parallel case of cautionary obligation a practice had grown up of allowing parole evidence in proof of mercantile guarantees,—a practice which was afterwards corrected by statute. But

No. 50.

Jan. 6, 1897.

M'Elroy v.

London

Assurance

Corporation.

there was no such practice in regard to insurance, and no argument or decision was offered to the contrary. Either a policy or some informal writing followed by res interventus is requisite. A policy is the proper mode of constituting the contract, and I rather think that, as such a policy is a stampable instrument, the interest of the Revenue makes it necessary that there must always be a policy. But the parties may be bound by a preliminary contract in terms of the formal deed which is afterwards executed. If the insurance company delivers a policy without requiring immediate payment of a premium, they incur responsibility for the risk, because having delivered the policy, they are held to have given credit for the premium. That is constantly done, e.g., in marine insurance a running account is kept by the brokers, in which the premiums are noted on one side of the account and the losses on the other. But, then, the company are not bound to deliver a policy without payment of the premium. If they accept a premium before delivering a policy, I should be disposed to hold that the acceptance of the premium and the delivery of a receipt therefor was sufficient to create the obligation to issue a policy. The question is not likely to occur, because, as I understand, the practice is, whenever a premium is paid in advance, to issue what is called in this branch of insurance a covering note—a slip as it is called in marine insurance—by which the party is insured until the insurers have time to consider whether they will accept the risk. It is, then, essential to a relevant averment of a contract under which this company can be made liable that it should be stated either that a policy was delivered, credit being given for the premium, or that the premium was paid and unconditionally accepted. I do not find either statement in this record. There is only a general statement that the pursuer is insured. There is also a statement that a premium was paid, but then that statement is consistent with the hypothesis (I do not say fact) that the payment was made subsequently to the fire, and that the premium was declined. The Lord Ordinary apparently was induced to allow a proof only because of the letter of 8th June, to which we have been referred, because he says,—“I might not have done so but for the letter of the defenders’ manager printed on record. He there accepts a premium.” That letter, it was explained to us from the bar, is the letter of 8th June. I think the Lord Ordinary must have proceeded on the view that writing of some kind was necessary to constitute the contract, but when we examine the letter it is impossible to put the construction on it which the Lord Ordinary has done. The letter bears to be the acceptance of a premium under reference to a covering note, and when that note is read it is seen to have reference to a new insurance commencing at a date subsequent to the occurrence of the fire. We had the same element in the case of the Sickness and Accident Assurance Association,¹ in which one insurance company sued another for contribution. The question in the case was whether the insurance had been completed before the casualty occurred. The party proposing to be insured sent the premium, but the latter was not received until two days after the accident, and in answer to the letter sending the premium, the defendant company accepted the payment as for an insurance

¹ 19 R. 977.

No. 50.

Jan. 6, 1897.
M'Elroy v.
London
Assurance
Corporation.

commencing the day after the accident occurred. We held that, while the company might not be entitled to alter the conditions of the proposed contract, as the parties were not agreed as to the terms, there was no contract. So when we examine the letter of 8th June along with the enclosed "covering note," we find that it is absolutely contradictory of the pursuers' averment. The effect of it, if any, would be to create a contract which the pursuer repudiates, and not to support the conclusions of the present action.

I concur with Lord Adam in holding that the action should be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The pursuers' case is that, although no policy was issued, a valid insurance was effected by reason of the pursuers having tendered and the defenders having accepted payment of a premium in performance of a contract to insure. I assume that that may be a good ground of action, but to entitle us to sustain the action on that ground, it must be relevantly averred, first, that the premium was paid to and accepted by the company before the fire took place, and second, that it was paid to and accepted by the company, or by an agent duly authorised by the company to accept it, and so to bind them. I find neither of these averments on record.

There is no specific averment of the date when the premium was paid, but it is said that we can gather, on a fair construction of the statements, that the pursuers intend to say that the premium was paid in the end of April. I do not think the pursuers are entitled to ask the Court to draw an inference with regard to such a matter, for this fact, which is indispensable to support their case, is within their own knowledge, and they should have no difficulty in setting it out in clear and unambiguous terms. Even assuming that it is reasonable to get at the fact by way of inference, I am hardly able to draw the conclusion that the pursuers did so intend, for all I find stated is—(Quotes cond. 2). I see no suggestion there from which I should infer that the premium had been paid before the occurrence of the fire.

The second material fact is not averred sufficiently by the mere use of the word agent, as describing M'Elroy. That is an extremely vague and indefinite word, and may cover many varieties of authority. What it was really necessary to aver was that M'Elroy had due authority to accept the premium and to bind the company.

I agree that the attention of the Lord Ordinary seems not to have been sufficiently directed to the exact terms of the letter which his Lordship refers to, for the Lord Ordinary reads that letter as if it were an acceptance by the company's manager of a premium for a policy about to be issued as for the 30th April; whereas it is clear, when the letter is read along with the covering note to which it refers, that the risk was to run from the 8th June. The matter appears to me to involve not a question of fact but the construction of correspondence, and on that I think no doubt can arise.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, found that the averments of the pursuers were not relevant, and dismissed the action.

PATRICK & JAMES, S.S.C.—J. A. CAIRNS, S.S.C.—Agents.

REV. MATTHEW GARDNER, Minister of Peebles, Pursuer.—Constable. No. 51.

DAME ANNE HAY AND OTHERS (Sir D. E. Hay's Curators) AND OTHERS, Heritors of Peebles, Defendants.—Pitman.

Jan. 8, 1897.
Minister of
Peebles v.
Heritors of Peebles.

Teinds—Augmentation—Procedure where dispute as to the existence of sufficient free teind.—In a process of augmentation the heritors admitted the existence of free teind, but denied that it was sufficient to meet the augmentation craved, and moved for an order on the minister to lodge a condescendence of the free teind which he alleged to exist. The Court granted the augmentation craved, leaving the question whether sufficient free teind existed or not to be determined in the process of locality.

In a process of augmentation raised by the minister of Peebles against the heritors, the pursuer moved for an augmentation of five chalders to the stipend, and of £5 to the allowance for communion elements. TEIND COURT.

Dame Anne Hay and others (Sir D. Hay's Curators), and other heritors, opposed an augmentation of more than three chalders, and denied that there was sufficient free teind to meet an augmentation of five chalders. They moved the Court to order the minister to lodge a condescendence of the free teind which he alleged to exist in the parish.

Argued for the minister;—A condescendence was only ordered when the heritors denied the existence of any free teind. What the Court required was that the minister should make out a prima facie case.¹ Here the admission of the heritors that there was free teind sufficient to meet three-fifths of the augmentation craved shewed that the minister had a prima facie case. That being so the Court should grant the augmentation craved, leaving the question of the existence of free teind to be determined in the locality. That was the course followed in the Banchory-Devenick case,¹ and in the cases cited by the defenders.²

Argued for the defenders;—The invariable practice was to order a condescendence when the heritors denied the existence of free teind. Here the amount of free teind alleged by the minister was disputed, and the same order should be pronounced. In the cases cited, although the question of the existence of free teind was ultimately left to be determined in the locality, a condescendence had in the first instance been ordered.² In the case of *Banchory-Devenick*¹ founded on by the minister, it was only after there had been first a remit to the Lord Ordinary to examine and report whether there appeared to be any free teind, and then a condescendence lodged by the minister, that the Court held that the minister had made out a prima facie case.

THE COURT granted an augmentation of five chalders, and £5 additional for communion elements, "and remit to the Lord Ordinary to prepare a locality, but declaring that this modification and the settlement of any locality thereof shall depend upon its being shewn to the Lord Ordinary that there exists a fund for the purpose."

J. B. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Minister of Banchory v. The Heritors, July 1, 1863, 1 Macph. 1014, 35 Scot. Jur. 586.

² Frood v. Earl of Stair (Glenluce case), Nov. 9, 1874, 2 R. 76; Minister of Bonhill v. Orr Ewing, Feb. 22, 1886, 13 R. 594.

No. 52. THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE AND OTHERS (the Duke of Hamilton's Trustees), AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson
—Deas.

Jan. 9, 1897.
Duke of
Hamilton's
Trustees v.
Woodside
Coal Co.

THE WOODSIDE COAL COMPANY AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).
—D.-F. Asher—W. Campbell—Ross Stewart.

Process—Proof—Refusal of diligence to recover writings.—When a Lord Ordinary had allowed a party a proof of his averments, held that the Lord Ordinary was not entitled to refuse a diligence for the recovery of documents on the ground that the averments remitted to probation were irrelevant.

1ST DIVISION. THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE AND OTHERS, the Duke of Hamilton's
Ld. Kyllachy. testamentary trustees, and as such proprietors of the estate of Netherburn, in the county of Lanark, and William Barr & Sons, their tenants in the minerals of Netherburn, raised an action against the Woodside Coal Company, and Joseph Hutchison, the only known partner of the company, concluding for payment to the pursuers of £2000 and £12,000 respectively.

Mr Hutchison was the proprietor of the estate of Woodside, which adjoined Netherburn.

The pursuers averred that the defenders had, in working out the minerals in Woodside at a place where it marched with Netherburn, made encroachments on and worked out the minerals in a triangular area of ground forming part of Netherburn.

The defenders admitted that the manager of the Woodside Coal Company had made encroachments. Mr Hutchison stated that these were made without his authority, and that he had only recently come to know of them.

The defenders further made a detailed statement of encroachments, which they alleged the pursuers and their authors had made on the Woodside minerals. "By the acts of the pursuers above condescended on, or some of them, the pursuers induced the defenders' manager to believe that he was entitled to take minerals from the Duke of Hamilton's estate, in places where such minerals could be most conveniently or only worked from Woodside, and he accordingly made the encroachments upon the triangular area referred to in the present action. The minerals in that area were, and are, not workable to profit except from Woodside. The defenders' manager acted in good faith, and in accordance with the system of working established by the pursuers." "The defenders are about to raise an action against the pursuers in respect of the encroachments and illegal actings above referred to."

On 10th November 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) closed the record, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments.

Thereafter the case was transferred to Lord Kyllachy.

The parties subsequently lodged specification of documents, and moved for a diligence for their recovery.

It was not seriously disputed that the documents covered by the defenders' specification were in the main relevant to the averments contained in the defenders' statements.

On 18th December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) granted diligence in terms of the specification for the pursuers, and refused the defenders a diligence in terms of their specification, and granted leave to reclaim.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The question raised by the interlocutor was really the relevancy of the defence. The Lord Ordinary had doubts about its relevancy, and had therefore refused the diligence de plano. But the defence had been remitted to probation, and the defenders were therefore entitled to prove it in the ordinary way. It was incompetent for the Lord Ordinary to reconsider the matter of relevancy.¹ The interlocutor allowing proof had been acquiesced in. The pursuers did not now seek to have it reviewed, even if that were competent.

No. 52.
Jan. 9, 1897.
Duke of Hamilton's
Trustees v.
Woodside
Coal Co.

Argued for the pursuers ;—The defence in its essential features was irrelevant, and the Lord Ordinary was right in refusing the diligence. It was always open to the Court to limit the scope of an inquiry by refusing to allow evidence to be led about an irrelevant topic, and that was what the Lord Ordinary had done. He was entitled to refuse the diligence altogether, even though some of the articles in the specification were relevant.² The defenders were really taking advantage of the general allowance of proof to obviate the necessity of raising the separate action which they had threatened.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by the proprietor of certain lands and his mineral tenants in these lands. These lands, as I understand, adjoin and are bounded by lands belonging to the defender Hutchison, and the allegation upon which the action is founded is that the defender, who also through a tenant or manager works the coal on his side of the march, has trespassed upon and removed coal from a particular area of ground, the property of the pursuers. The action is to recover the loss and damage so occasioned.

The defence is not a denial of the fact that the defender has, through his tenant or manager, here encroached upon and removed coal from the ground in question, but the defenders set up a distinct and substantive defence, in support of which they make a series of statements of fact which culminate in pleas to the following effect : that the defenders not having authorised the encroachments complained of, they are not liable in damages, and that in the circumstances stated the pursuers are barred by their actings from claiming damages in respect of the said encroachments.

Now, the record was closed upon these averments. There seems to have been no discussion on the relevancy of the defence set up, and upon the 10th November 1896 the Lord Ordinary closed the record, and allowed parties a proof of their averments on a day to be afterwards fixed. That allowance of proof was not brought before us by reclaiming note. The question was raised before us, whether the present reclaiming note entitles us to consider the interlocutor of 10th November, but no motion has been made to us by the Solicitor-General on the part of the pursuers in any way to modify or alter that interlocutor, and it appears to me that we must dispose of the question before us—namely, whether or not this specification should be granted, on the footing that the defenders are entitled under that interlocutor to prove all their averments—I mean all the averments relevant to support the distinct and substantive case which they have set up. For

¹ Barr v. Bain, July 17, 1896, 23 R. 1090.

² Silver v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Jan. 23, 1894, 21 R. 416.

No. 52.

Jan. 9, 1897.
Duke of Hamilton's
Trustees v.
Woodside
Coal Co.

myself, if the matter of the relevancy of these averments in defence had been brought before us, it might or might not have been my opinion that one or more of them should not have been remitted to probation, but we are not in that position. The question now is, whether in the present position of the case we are entitled to assume that the whole of these averments are irrelevant—for that is what it comes to—and ought not to have been remitted to probation. I cannot say that that is so. If in the course of the defenders leading evidence in support of their case, any particular piece of evidence, whether oral or written, should not be relevant to support that case, that question is reserved under the ordinary procedure. But that is not the matter which we have now to consider; and in the position in which we are placed it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary was not entitled altogether to refuse this specification de plano as being unwarranted and inadmissible. I think the case ought to go back to him to adjust the specification.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action of damages for encroachment by a mineral proprietor and his tenants against an adjoining proprietor, and the Lord Ordinary before whom the case was first taken made an order—I presume because he was not asked to take any different course—allowing to both parties a proof of their averments. Now, it is perfectly clear that such an allowance of proof leaves all questions of relevancy open to further consideration, and that the words “before answer,” which are often inserted for the purpose of reserving questions of law and relevancy are unnecessary. It seems to me that, looking at the matter very strictly, as the relevancy is reserved, the question of relevancy might be raised at any subsequent stage of the case, and even on a motion for a diligence. At the same time it is clear enough that that is a very inconvenient mode of starting a legal question, and that if the question is to be raised before proof or trial, the proper time for raising it is when the Lord Ordinary is moved to make an order for proof. In this case the action had been transferred to Lord Kyllachy from another Judge, and his attention having been called to the defences, it was explained to us that his Lordship thought that the special defences were altogether irrelevant, and that there was no question for consideration except the amount of damages. In that view, as I understand, his Lordship rejected the specification. It appears to me that that was practically reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary who had already allowed a proof; at all events it amounts to a different mode of exercising the discretion which a Judge has before the trial of dealing with the relevancy.

A motion for a diligence is as I have said an inconvenient motion for raising questions of this kind, and I therefore agree with Lord Adam that the refusal of the defenders' specification on this ground cannot be maintained, and I am prepared to grant the diligence, subject to adjustment, which counsel said could readily be done. I am the more disposed to take this course because the granting of the specification does not necessarily make the documents evidence in the case. It will still be open at the proof to object to any documents being put in evidence; and according to my view a document may be objected to upon the ground of want of relevancy, because if the Lord Ordinary has power, as he undoubtedly has, to dispose of any question of law or relevancy in giving judgment upon the case, it must be within his competency, if he has a clear opinion on the question, to exclude matter in the course of the proof, thereby keeping the case within proper bounds, and making his duty more easy when he comes to consider the effect of the evidence which he has allowed.

No. 52.
Jan. 9, 1897.
Duke of Hamilton's
Trustees v.
Woodside
Coal Co.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. I think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary has decided, and for the purposes of this question finally decided, that the averments contained in the defenders' statement of facts are to be admitted to probation. Whether the interlocutor by which he remitted the whole averments of both parties to probation could be competently brought under the review of this Division now, if the pursuers had taken advantage of the defenders' reclaiming note and maintained that that brought up the previous interlocutor, it is unnecessary to consider, because, whether it could be so brought up or not, we have had no motion put before us to review that interlocutor, and therefore for the purposes of the present question it must be considered final.

I think that that interlocutor determines the question of relevancy in this sense, that it decides that the averments of both parties on record are to be remitted to probation. It may still be a question, assuming them to be proved, what the effect of the facts set forth by the defenders ought to be upon the pursuers' claim. Whether it is open to the Lord Ordinary or not to decide that upon the merits the averments which he has remitted to proof are relevant or not relevant to affect the pursuers' claim, it would certainly be open to this Court to do so, because I presume that there can be no question that a reclaiming note against a final interlocutor would bring up all the previous interlocutors. Therefore it appears to me that the question on the merits is unaffected by any decision we pronounce now, and that the question of what averments are to be remitted to probation is finally decided by an interlocutor which we are not asked to review. Upon that ground I think we must recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor refusing to allow the specification altogether. It will of course be open for his Lordship to determine what documents are recoverable by diligence on the assumption that the case alleged by the defenders has been sent to proof.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against so far as it refused diligence to the defenders in terms of their specification, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to adjust the specification, &c.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOSEPH DAVIS, Pursuer (Respondent).—Rankine—Ralston.
ANNA MARGARET CADMAN, Defender (Reclaimer).—Sharro—Cook.

No. 53.

Jurisdiction—Reconvention—Foreign.—C., a domiciled Englishwoman, brought a note of suspension to have D., the holder of a bill which bore to be accepted by her, interdicted from noting, protesting, or charging upon it. She stated that she was afraid that D., if not prevented, would pro-

Jan. 18, 1897.
Davis v.
Cadman.

No. 53.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Davis v.
Cadman.

test the bill, and having registered the protest and taken out a certificate of registration in terms of the Judgment Extension Act, 1868, would proceed to attach her effects in England. In her condescendence and pleas she set forth various objections to the validity of the bill.

D. having brought an action against C. for the amount of the bill, she pleaded "no jurisdiction."

Held (diss. Lord Adam, rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the defender had not rendered herself liable to the jurisdiction of the Court reconventionne in respect that she had brought the note of suspension of necessity, to protect herself, and with the object of excluding the jurisdiction of the Court.

Process—Summons—Action founded on bill of exchange—Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), section 1, and schedule A—A. S. 31st October 1850.—Held (by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that where an action is founded on a bill of exchange, the bill must be set forth in the conclusions of the summons.

Opinion by the Lord President to same effect.

1st Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

THIS was an action raised in April 1896 by Joseph Davis, Edinburgh, against Anna Margaret Cadman, of Trinity Lodge, Grove Park, Denmark Hill, in the county of Surrey, for payment of £200.

The amount sued for was alleged to be due under a bill, dated 10th July 1895, drawn by the pursuer upon and accepted by the defender and her sister, Mary Loetitia Cadman. The bill was not mentioned in the conclusions of the summons.

The pursuer, inter alia, averred;—(Cond. 6) "On 14th January 1896, the present defender and her said sister raised proceedings in the Supreme Courts of Scotland, against the present pursuer, seeking to interdict him from doing summary diligence under the said bill, and the said proceedings are still in dependence. In virtue thereof the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland ex reconventionne. In answer to the defender's explanation, the proceedings in said note of suspension and interdict are referred to. It is denied that the question of the defender's liability for the sum contained in said bill is competently raised and can be determined in said process."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) In respect the present defender and her sister raised proceedings in the Supreme Courts of Scotland against the pursuer, seeking to interdict him from doing summary diligence under the said bill, and the said proceedings are still in dependence, the defender is in virtue thereof subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts in Scotland ex reconventionne.

The defender stated that she was a domiciled Englishwoman, and pleaded;—(1) No jurisdiction. (2) The action is incompetent.

The note of suspension referred to had been raised by the defender and her sister in January 1896. The prayer was for interdict against the respondent "noting, or protesting, or charging upon, or taking any steps to enforce by diligence the payment of the sum of £200, bearing to be contained in, and alleged to be due by the complainers under, a bill for the sum of £200, bearing to be dated the 10th day of July 1895, and bearing to be drawn by the respondent upon the complainers."*

In support of their application for interdict the following state-

* The grounds of suspension set forth in the note as presented in the Bill-Chamber are given in Lord Adam's opinion. The statements and pleas which follow are taken from the closed record in the Court of Session.

ments were made by the complainers:—Bills previously granted by the complainers to the respondent's firm of J. Davis & Sons, Limited, of which he was manager, had been protested. The protests had been extracted and registered, and a certificate of registration issued in terms of the Judgment Extension Act of 1868. These certificates had been presented in pursuance of said Act, for registration in England, and upon the registration being effected the respondent's firm had, without notice to the complainers, taken steps for the purpose of attaching their furniture. After certain proceedings in England on 4th December 1895 a compromise was effected, which the complainers understood to include all claims against them. (Stat. 4) "Upon 6th January 1896 the complainer Anna Margaret Cadman received an intimation from the respondent that an alleged acceptance by herself and her sister to him for £200 became due upon the 13th inst., and was payable at No. 4 George Street, Edinburgh. The complainers have ascertained that the said acceptance bears to be dated 10th July 1895, and to be signed by them, but it contains the name of no drawer. . . . At the hearing of this note before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, on 1st February 1896, the respondent voluntarily and deliberately produced said bill, founded upon it in support of his pleas, and lodged it in process as one of his productions. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills, after renewed discussion upon the terms of the bill, passed the note without caution, in respect that the bill was not signed by the person giving [sic] and the respondent reclaimed against this judgment. He again founded upon the bill, which was still unsigned by any drawer, and was again unsuccessful. It cannot now be completed. It is not, and never was, a valid document of debt. The complainers received no value for said bill, and the whole of the indebtedness by them, or either of them, to the respondent's company was extinguished at the time when said compromise was effected. No sum has ever been received by the complainers, or either of them, from the respondent in loan, and no sum is now due by them, or either of them, to the respondent. Looking to the past conduct of the respondent's firm (which is entirely controlled and directed by him, and in which he has a large interest) the complainers fear that if steps are not taken to prevent him, the respondent will protest the alleged acceptance and proceed to levy execution upon it without notice or intimation to them, as in the case of the previous acceptance before referred to, and they are accordingly under the necessity of making the present application for interdict in order that the respondent may be interdicted from proceeding to do diligence upon the said acceptance."

The complainers' pleas were, inter alia:—The respondent ought to be interdicted from proceeding to do diligence upon said alleged acceptance in respect—(a) that he is now seeking to enforce his rights under it by ordinary action; (b) that it was produced by the respondent in judgment while unsigned by him or any alleged drawer; (c) that it does not comply, and cannot now be made to comply, with the provisions of section 20 of The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882; (d) that ex facie of the alleged bill the respondent has no right thereto; (e) that no value was received by the complainers for said bill; and (f) that no sum is due or payable by the complainers, or either of them, to the respondent.

In respect of an undertaking by the pursuer not to proceed by summary diligence on the bill, the note of suspension was on 5th June 1896 refused by Lord Kincairney.

No. 53.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Davis v.
Cadman.

No. 53.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Davis v.
Cadman.

In the present action the Lord Ordinary on 28th July 1896 pronounced the following interlocutor:—" (1) Finds that this Court has jurisdiction to entertain the question raised in this action, in respect of the dependence when it was brought into Court of an action at the instance of the defender, and of Miss Mary Loetitia Cadman, against the pursuer, in reference to the bill the contents of which are now sued for; (2) repels plea 1 . . . for the defender; (3) finds that the action is raised on a bill, and that the said bill is not set forth in the conclusions of the summons, in conformity with schedule A of the Act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, and allows the pursuer to amend the summons so as to bring it into conformity with the said schedule." *

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this case is a money-lender carrying on business in Edinburgh. The defender is an unmarried lady resident in England, and the pursuer seeks to recover from her the sum of £200 said to be due by a bill signed by the defender's sister, Mary Loetitia Cadman, now bankrupt, and herself. The pursuer's averment is that he advanced to Mary Loetitia Cadman £175 upon the bill; that she agreed to get the name of the defender to the bill as her surety; that the defender signed the bill and handed it back to her sister, Mary Loetitia Cadman, 'with authority to put the same in circulation and hand it to the pursuer, and which was so done.' Neither counsel was able to explain what was meant by the words 'to put the same in circulation.' The question on the merits is whether the defender is liable to pay the sum in the bill to the pursuer.

"Several preliminary questions of considerable difficulty and of some importance have been raised by the defender.

"The first plea is 'no jurisdiction,' the defender being an Englishwoman. This is met by the plea that the defender is 'subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts in Scotland ex reconventione.' I am not sure that this plea is quite correctly expressed, but the grounds of it are distinctly stated. It is rested on a note of suspension and interdict by the Misses Cadman against the present pursuer, in which they crave that the pursuer should be interdicted from noting or protesting, or enforcing by diligence, the bill which is now in question. In that case the note was passed in the Bill-Chamber without caution, and the case was afterwards brought into Court, and a record was made up and closed. It was in dependence when this action was brought, but the note was afterwards refused on the undertaking of the pursuer, Davis, not to proceed by summary diligence on the bill. I understand it is now out of Court.

"Now, the defender maintained that this action could not warrant the plea of reconvention. It was submitted that an action of reconvention was only permitted for the protection of a native defender in the primary action brought by the foreigner, and that here Miss Cadman was in substance the defender although nominally the pursuer of that action, because the action was of the nature of a suspension of a threatened charge. But I think that was not so, for Davis had not protested the bill, and had never threatened to use diligence on it. I think the present defender must be held to have been one of the pursuers of that action, as she appeared on the face of the petition to be. Further, the defender contended that the plea of reconvention only arose where the two actions were of the nature of cross actions, and where the one claim could be set against the other. No doubt the plea of reconvention usually arises in such circumstances.

"Now, it does at first sight seem rather paradoxical to say that an action brought to prevent the enforcement of a bill by the pursuer should enable him to raise an action in this Court for the bill. The consequence was, I daresay, not contemplated by the defender.

"I am of opinion, however, in this case, that the plea of no jurisdiction

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—On the question of jurisdiction.—Reconvention was an extension of the doctrine of compensation, and was a protection given to a defender. It was founded upon the equity that a foreigner who appealed to a Scottish Court must submit to the jurisdiction of the Court in such actions raised by the native defender as were necessary to enable the Court to do justice between the parties.¹ In every case the Court would consider whether it was fair that the foreigner who had come to this Court for redress should be made subject to its jurisdiction in all matters ejusdem generis. In the present case, the defender had not convened the pursuer to this Court to have the question of her liability under the bill decided, but in order to prevent him attaching her effects in England. A protest once registered was a judgment of the Scots Court, and the English Court would not inquire into its validity. The defender's object in bringing the suspension was accordingly to exclude the jurisdiction of the Scots Court, and she had really been is bad, and that the Court has power to entertain this action, and that in respect of the dependence of the former action when this action was brought into Court.

"If the former action had raised no other question than whether summary diligence could proceed on the bill, there might have been a good deal to say for the argument that it could not support jurisdiction in this action. But if the record be referred to it seems plain that it did more than that, because the whole questions on the merits were raised in that action, just as they are raised here. There was, no doubt, another question, viz., whether the bill could warrant summary diligence. But the whole merits were raised, and the question whether the Misses Cadman were liable on the bill was submitted to the Court by the Misses Cadman themselves. That is to say, the present defender, being one of the pursuers of that action, submitted to the Court the question whether she was liable for £200 under this bill. That is the question on the merits submitted in this action by Davis, the pursuer. The two actions are not about similar or connected matters, but about precisely the same matter, and I conceive that the defender, having submitted to the Court that question, cannot now turn round and plead no jurisdiction when the same question is submitted by the pursuer. The case stands the test expressed by Lord Kinloch in Thomson v. Whitehead, 25th January 1862, 24 D. 331, 349, where he says,—'I should be disposed to limit the admissibility to the case where there is such contingency as would make it proper that actions should be conjoined.'

"In Morison and Milne v. Massa, 8th December 1866, 5 Macph. 130, the Lord President says,—'The broad principle is this, that a party appealing to the jurisdiction of the Court renders himself amenable to that jurisdiction, and eminently so in reference to the same matter of dispute.' It might be contended that the present defender, by her pleadings in the former action, had prorogated the jurisdiction of the Court to try the question of her liability under the bill, and there is high authority for the view that jurisdiction by reconvention is a species of prorogated jurisdiction,—per Lord Deas, in Morison and Milne v. Massa, and in Thomson v. Whitehead. It does not greatly signify by what name the power of the Court to entertain the question is expressed.

"I am of opinion, on the grounds expressed, that the defender is barred ¹ Thompson v. Whitehead, Jan. 25, 1862, 24 D. 331, 34 Scot. Jur. 163; Morison and Milne v. Massa, Dec. 8, 1866, 5 Macph. 130, 39 Scot. Jur. 57; Allan v. Wormser, Harris, & Co., June 8, 1894, 21 R. 866.

No. 53.
Jan. 13, 1897.
Davis v.
Cadman.

in the position of defender in instituting that process. There was no equity in subjecting her to the jurisdiction of the Scots Court, as she had various defences to the pursuer's claim which would require the presence of witnesses resident in England. The present was not a cross action raising a counter claim to one previously made by the defender.

Argued for the pursuer;—On the question of jurisdiction.—The doctrine of reconvention was in part founded on the principle of implied consent.¹ The defender in the present action had, in the suspension, raised the question of the validity of the bill as a document of debt, and the proceedings were clearly cognate the one to the other. The contingency of the processes was such that it would have been appropriate to conjoin them, and to such cases the principle of reconvention was clearly applicable.²

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defender is a domiciled Englishwoman; and, unless she has in some way subjected herself to the jurisdiction of this Court in the matter of the present action, her plea of no jurisdiction must be sustained. The Lord Ordinary has repelled the plea in respect of the dependence when this action was brought into Court of an action at the instance of the defender and of Miss Mary Loetitia Cadman against the pursuer in reference to the bill the contents of which are now sued for.

Now, it is clear that the soundness of this reason must depend on the nature of the original action, for it cannot be affirmed as a general proposition that the mere fact that the first action had reference to the ground of action of the second will support the jurisdiction in the second. We must see why the foreigner applied to this Court,—was it of choice or of necessity? and what was it she asked the Court to do about this bill? The from objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court to decide the very question which she herself submitted in the previous case.

"It does not signify that the former action is, or may be now, out of Court.—Allan v. Wormser, Harris, & Co., 8th June 1894, 21 R. 866.

"I have felt a little difficulty arising from the statement by the pursuer on the record,—‘It is denied that the question of the defender's liability for the sum contained in said bill is competently raised, and can be determined in said process,’ meaning the action of interdict. That is rather a plea in law than a statement of fact. It is extremely adverse to the pursuer's plea of reconvention, and I should have had much difficulty on the question of jurisdiction had I thought the proposition sound. But I do not think it sound. I think the question of the defender's liability could have been determined in the action of interdict, although I doubt whether the pursuer Davis could have got an efficient remedy in that action.

"2. The defender pleaded that the action is incompetent, because it is an action on a bill, and because the action is not in the form of schedule A of the Court of Session Act, 1850. I am satisfied that the action is laid on the bill. It has no other ground. No contract between the pursuer and defender other than that constituted by the bill is averred. The action is not in terms of schedule A, as it ought to have been, and must be. But the summons may be amended so as to make it conform to the schedule, as was done in Milne's Trustees v. Ormiston's Trustees, 14th May 1893, 20 R. 523. . . ."

¹ Thomson v. Whitehead, 24 D., per Lord Deas, at p. 355; Morison & Milne v. Massa, 5 Macph., per Lord Deas, at p. 137.

² Thomson v. Whitehead, 24 D., per Lord Kinloch, at p. 349.

answer to these questions is to be found in the prayer of the note of suspension. The note asked the Court to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the present pursuer from noting or protesting this bill, or charging upon it, or taking any steps to enforce it by diligence. The reason for making this application, as set out in the statement of facts, was that, in relation to other bills, the present pursuer had noted and protested them in Scotland, had got the protests extracted and registered in the Books of Council and Session, and then taken out a certificate of registration in terms of the Judgments Extension Act, and had proceeded to seize the defender's furniture in England.

No. 53.

Jan. 13, 1897.

Davis v.
Cadman.

Upon this I observe, first, that the proceedings of the defender in coming to the Scotch Courts was purely defensive and protective; and, second, that she came to the Scotch Courts, not by choice to try the question of her liability under the bill, but by necessity, because no other Court was competent to disarm her opponent of the weapon of summary diligence by stopping the Scotch procedure of noting, protesting, and registering in the Books of Council and Session. It is quite true that, being in the Scotch Court, the defender stated the pleas she had got against the validity of the bill; but this does not alter the nature of her suit. Indeed, the nature of the proceeding was finally adjudged by this Court, which, so soon as the pursuer judicially stated that he did not intend to do summary diligence, found it unnecessary to proceed with the action, and, on that ground, dismissed it.

Well, now, where is the ground for holding that the dependence of a proceeding of this character at the time when the present action was raised precludes this Englishwoman from having her liabilities under this bill tried in the Courts of her own country, according to the ordinary rule of international law?

I do not think it is fair that this lady, obliged to come to the Scotch Courts to stop an illegal use of their process, because she went on to say that the bill was bad, and would be bad even in an action, should be caught hold of as having "submitted to the Court" those questions, or as having "appealed to its jurisdiction" on the merits of this bill, for these are the phrases used by the Lord Ordinary. Accordingly, even assuming that the defender would be liable to our jurisdiction in the present action, if in the former action she had come into Court in order to get the validity of the bill decided, and her action had somehow miscarried, I do not think that in fact she did so.

Again, it cannot be said that owing to the institution of the former action complete justice cannot be rendered if the ordinary rule be given effect to. No equity will fail if the action is tried in England, or would be furthered if it were tried in Scotland.

None of the cases cited by the pursuer seem to me to apply, and the principles laid down in the elaborate discussion of reconvention in *Thompson v. Whitehead*¹ are, in my judgment, opposed to his argument.

I hold, therefore, that there is no jurisdiction; and in this view there is no room for the consideration of the other pleas discussed by the Lord Ordinary. It may be convenient, however, on a matter of practice, to note that the summons as it stands is clearly incompetent, as the bill is not

¹ 24 D. 331.

No. 53. libelled, the incompetency arising from the combined effect of 13 and 14
 Jan. 13, 1897. Vict. cap. 36, schedule A, and the Act of Sederunt, 31st October 1850,
 Davis v. passed in virtue of sec. 1 of that Act. The proper course, as I conceive, Cadman. had there been jurisdiction, would have been to allow the pursuer to state what amendments if any he proposed to make on the summons, and not to have disposed of any pleas (other than that of jurisdiction) before the summons was put in competent form.

LORD ADAM.—The defender, with her sister, presented a note of suspension and interdict craving the Court to interdict the present pursuer from “noting or protesting or charging upon, or taking any steps to enforce by diligence, the payment of the sum of £200 bearing to be contained in” the bill referred to. It is material to observe the grounds upon which the note was presented, and these are to be found in the fourth statement of facts for the complainers, where they say: “The complainers have ascertained that the said acceptance appears to be dated 10th July 1895, and to be signed by them, but the complainers have no recollection of signing said acceptance, and they believe and aver that said acceptance is not genuine and was not signed by them. In any event they received no value therefor, and the whole of the indebtedness by them, or either of them, to the respondent's company or to himself was extinguished at the time when said compromise was effected, and no sum is now due by them or either of them to the respondent.” The pleas to support the prayer of the note were: “The respondent ought to be interdicted from proceeding to do diligence upon said alleged acceptance, in respect (a) that it was not executed by the com-plainers; (b) that no value was received by them therefor; (c) that all claims and demands at the instance of the respondent or his said company were discharged under the compromise referred to upon record.”

It is material to my mind to observe that the complainers by their note of suspension raised the whole question of the validity of the bill, and it is clear to me that any judgment against the present pursuer sustaining any of these pleas would have been conclusive as to the validity of the bill. Now, that being the case as brought, and the grounds on which it was brought, what took place was, that after certain procedure which it is unnecessary to mention, the Lord Ordinary, on 6th March 1896, passed the note, and so the note of suspension became a pending action in this Court, and all these pleas became pleas in that action. Now it is quite true that although the bill might be a good and valid bill, it might not be a bill upon which summary diligence could be done, and accordingly to avoid this difficulty, and to bring the whole matter before the Court, the present pursuer brought the present action for payment of the amount alleged to be due under the bill.
 It appears to me that this is the material time to consider whether this Court has jurisdiction or not. If there was jurisdiction then, I do not think that the complainers can claim that anything which was done afterwards by which the note was dismissed can alter or affect the jurisdiction of the Court. That being so, I humbly think that the Lord Ordinary was right in the conclusion at which he arrived. As I have said, the suspension and the action relate to the same subject-matter, namely, the liability of the defender on the bill, and beyond doubt there is the closest contingency between the two processes, and I think that that is enough to establish jurisdiction against the present defender. No. 53.

With reference to the other pleas disposed of by the Lord Ordinary, ^{Jan. 13, 1897.} as Davis v. Cadman. it is to be held that this Court has no jurisdiction, I have nothing to say in regard to them.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is admitted that, apart from the effect of the previous action, the Court has no jurisdiction to try the question of the liability of the defender under this bill of exchange, and the action will fall to be dismissed unless it can be maintained on the principle of reconvention.

Now, let me ask what is the meaning of reconvention? I do not understand that there is any dispute as to the nature of the jurisdiction so constituted. It means just this, that where a pursuer or complainer, being a foreigner, takes proceedings in the Court of this country, and thereby submits the matters in dispute to the judgment of the Court, he is not allowed to plead want of jurisdiction in any counter action which may be necessary for completely determining the rights of the parties which are in dispute. That being so, it does appear to me that there is no room in this case for jurisdiction on the ground of reconvention. Miss Cadman applied to this Court for protection against proceedings which were to be made effectual against her in England through the medium of a charge upon a warrant issuing from the Register of Deeds in Scotland. If an action had been brought against her in this Court she might have appeared and pleaded that the Court had no jurisdiction against her because she was resident in England. The contract was made in England, and nothing had been arrested to found jurisdiction against her. But the holder of the bill did not propose to proceed by way of action, but by summary execution. It appears to me that in taking this protective proceeding Miss Cadman was in exactly the same position as if she had appeared and pleaded want of jurisdiction in defence to an ordinary action. No doubt other pleas were stated in the note of suspension which she was prepared to argue in case her objection to the jurisdiction had failed, and if after stating her plea to the jurisdiction she had waived it and had gone on to discuss the merits of the dispute between her and the present pursuer, I do not say that the principle of reconvention might not have been applicable to any consequential action that might be found necessary. But as she was entitled to have the diligence stopped on the ground that the Court of Session and its extractor of decrees had no authority to issue summary diligence, it must be taken that the question of jurisdiction was the only question which could competently be tried. It was the question which the Lord Ordinary and the Court had to consider first in order, and when the conclusion was reached that the Court or its extractor had no power to grant a decree against the complainer, the process of suspension attained its object and necessarily came to an end.

In these circumstances it seems to me that to apply the principle of reconvention to the new action is an impossible view, because it amounts to this, that if a person comes to this Court protesting against an attempted exercise of jurisdiction against him, he is by that very act held to have admitted the jurisdiction. I am unable to admit the validity of the reason-

No. 53. ing that leads to this result, and I think, for the reasons stated, that the circumstances upon which Lord Adam has founded his opinion do not really exist in the case.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Davis v.
Cadman.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that to sustain the plea of reconvention here would carry the doctrine further than it has ever been carried in previous decisions, and further than, I think, would be justified by any general principles laid down in these decisions. As I understand the authorities cited, the plea of reconvention only arises when it is necessary to do full justice between parties already litigating. On that principle it has been laid down by a very high authority that a summary process would not form a basis for sustaining jurisdiction which cannot otherwise be supported on the mere plea of reconvention; and I agree with your Lordship in the chair and Lord M'Laren that the note of suspension, which is said to found the plea here, is a mere summary process to stop summary diligence. I sympathise in the difficulty felt by Lord Adam, arising from the fact that the statements appended to the note of suspension raise questions as to the validity of the bill, which might properly form the subject of an ordinary action. But then I think the statement of these questions was quite relevant to shew why summary diligence should not be allowed to pass on the bill. It was not necessary to discuss them, but only to say,—“These questions should be decided before summary diligence is allowed to pass on the bill”; but then it did not follow that these questions should be tried here, since it was competent for the respondent to bring an action in the Court to whose jurisdiction the complainer was subject.

On the whole matter, I agree with your Lordship that the plea of reconvention should not be sustained.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first plea for the defender, and dismissed the action.

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—PRINGLE & CLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 54. GEORGE WATSON NEISH AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Neish's Marriage-Contract Trustees), First Parties.—Chisholm.

Jan. 13, 1897.*
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

GEORGE WATSON NEISH AND OTHERS (William Neish's Trustees), AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Chisholm.

MISS JANE AMELIA NEISH AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Macfarlane.

Marriage-contract—Discharge—Construction.—Under a marriage-contract the marriage-contract funds fell to be paid by the marriage-contract trustees on the death of the spouses to the children of the marriage equally in absolute fee.

The husband survived his wife, and died leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, under which his estate fell to be divided equally, one share to be paid over to each of his sons in absolute fee, and one share to be held for behoof of each of his daughters in liferent and her children in fee, with a clause of survivorship in the event of the failure of a daughter's children in favour of the testator's other children.

At the time of his death the father was indebted to the marriage-contract trustees in the sum of £16,000, which constituted the whole of the marriage-

No. 54.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

contract estate. After his death his children, six sons and two daughters, who were all sui juris, granted a deed of discharge under which, on the narrative that they had agreed to renounce their rights under the marriage-contract to the effect that the funds falling under the same might be retained and administered by the testamentary trustees as part of the testamentary trust-estate, they requested the marriage-contract trustees to discharge the testamentary trustees of their father's obligation, and they themselves discharged their whole claims under the marriage-contract. The marriage-contract trustees, by separate deed, discharged the testamentary trustees accordingly.

The two daughters thereafter called on the testamentary trustees to pay over to them £2000 each, as being their equal share of the marriage-contract funds, maintaining that the discharge was revocable by them in so far as it inferred a gratuitous surrender of their rights to payment in fee under the marriage-contract.

For the determination of this question a special case was presented by (1) the marriage-contract trustees, (2) the testamentary trustees and the sons, and (3) the daughters, in which it was stated that the object of the discharges was to release the marriage-contract trustees, because there was no cash available for the £16,000, and it was thought expedient to obviate the necessity of a forced sale of the testator's estate.

Held that the discharge by the daughters was irrevocable, and that the £16,000 which remained in the hands of the father's testamentary trustees fell to be administered as part of the father's testamentary estate.

WILLIAM NEISH of Clepington was married to Miss Margaret Ann Watson, daughter of the late George Watson of Calcutta, in 1848. By antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr Neish and Miss Watson, he, on his part, assigned to the trustees thereby appointed a sum of £8000 out of the first and readiest of his means and estate, to be paid at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which should happen six months after his decease; and directed the trustees to pay the annual income thereof to Mrs Neish in the event of her surviving him; and after her death, or in the event of him surviving her, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which should happen six months after his death, to pay "the said principal sum of £8000 to the child or children of the marriage, and the heirs of their bodies secundum stirpes equally, or in such proportions if more than one child, and with and under such conditions and restrictions as the father shall have directed by any writing under his hand, and failing which, as the mother may direct in the event of her surviving him."

Miss Watson, on her part, conveyed to the trustees her rights under her father's settlement, directing that they should pay the income from the sum thus accruing (which amounted to £8000) to her "in liferent for her liferent use only, and after her death shall pay the principal to her children in such proportions as she may appoint by any writing under her hand, and failing such appointment, to her children equally on their respectively attaining twenty-one years of age,—and in the event of her dying without issue, shall pay the same to her heirs or otherwise as she may direct by any will or writing under her hand."

In 1854 Mr Neish borrowed the sum of £8000 from the marriage-contract trustees, and granted a bond and disposition in security over his estate of Clepington for that sum in favour of the trustees.

Mr Neish died in 1886, predeceased by his wife. There were six sons of the marriage, and two daughters, who all survived their father, and were all sui juris at the time of his death. One of the daughters was married and had children; the other daughter was unmarried.

No. 54.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

Mr Neish left a trust-disposition and settlement under which the trustees were directed to hold the trust-estate for the testator's children in equal shares; but so far as the shares of the testator's two daughters were concerned, they were directed to pay the income only to each daughter during her life, and after her death to hold the capital and income in trust for her issue, whether children or remoter descendants, payable "at such age or time, in such manner, and if more than one in such shares, as each such daughter shall appoint," or failing any appointment, for such daughter's children equally; and in the event of any daughter dying without leaving issue, then the capital of such daughter's share was appointed to accrue to the testator's other children, sons and daughters, but so that the further share accruing to each such daughter should be retained and held by the trustees subject to the like trusts and powers as were thereinbefore declared concerning the original share of that daughter.

During his life Mr Neish did not do anything beyond granting the assignation contained in his marriage-contract towards paying or securing the provision of £8000 appointed to be paid at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which should happen six months after his decease; and the bond granted by him in 1854 was undischarged at the date of his death.

A discharge dated 29th September and 3d and 10th October 1886, was executed by all the children of Mr Neish, on the narrative of the marriage-contract, and on the further narrative that the funds of the marriage trust consisted of—(1) the sum of £8000 contained in the bond and disposition in security granted by Mr Neish; and (2) the provision of £8000 which, under marriage-contract, Mr Neish bound himself to provide for his wife and children; that the trustees acting under said contract of marriage would, in the due execution of the trust created by said contract, fall to obtain payment from the testamentary trustees and executors of Mr Neish of the sum due under the foresaid bond and disposition in security, as well as of the foresaid provision of £8000, and to pay over the same to the children of Mr Neish, they having all attained majority, and there being no children who had died leaving issue, in terms of the directions contained in said marriage-contract; "and considering further, that we, the whole granters hereof, in place of requiring fulfilment of the provisions in our favour contained in the said contract of marriage, have agreed and resolved to request and authorise the trustees acting under said contract not to require repayment of the sum due under said bond and disposition in security or payment of said provision, and we have further agreed and resolved to renounce and discharge our whole claim, rights, and interests under said marriage-contract, to the effect that the funds falling under same may be retained and administered by the testamentary trustees of the said late William Neish as part of his testamentary trust-estate: Therefore we, the whole granters hereof, do hereby (first) request, authorise, and desire the foresaid trustees acting under said contract of marriage to discharge the foresaid bond and disposition in security and the foresaid provision of £8000, made and undertaken by the said William Neish under said contract of marriage; (second) discharge and renounce the whole provisions in favour of us, or any of us, contained in or falling to us in virtue of said contract of marriage in any way, as well as the said contract of marriage itself, whole tenor, contents, and clauses thereof."

In connection with this discharge, and partly as authorised by the provisions thereof, an additional discharge was executed of the same dates by the trustees original and assumed acting under the marriage-contract for themselves and their own right and interest, and at the special desire and request of, and as authorised by, the whole sons and daughters of Mr Neish, as the beneficiaries under the contract of marriage, by which deed, and, inter alia, upon the narrative that no consideration had been paid to them, the said trustees, for executing the same, the granters discharged (first) the said bond and disposition in security for £8000 and all interest due thereon, and they declared to be redeemed and disburdened thereof, and of the infestment following thereon, All and Whole the lands and others thereby conveyed in security; and (second) All and Whole the provision of £8000, which under said contract of marriage Mr Neish had bound himself to provide, from payment of which provision it was by said additional discharge declared the testamentary trustees and executors of Mr Neish should be for ever freed and discharged.

No. 54.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

On 31st October 1896 a special case was presented for the determination of questions as to the effect of these discharges upon the rights of the two daughters under the marriage-contract.

The first parties were the marriage-contract trustees. The second parties were the trustees under Mr Neish's trust-disposition and settlement, his six sons, and the children of Mrs Gordon, his married daughter. The third parties were the two daughters of Mr Neish, and Mr Gordon, the husband of the married daughter.

The case stated:—"The object of the discharges was to release the then trustees of the contract of marriage, because at that time there was no cash fund available for payment of these two sums of £8000 each, and it was thought expedient to obviate the necessity of a forced sale of part of the testator's estate. The trustees of his will have now in their hands funds amply sufficient to satisfy the daughters' shares of the said two sums."

The following question of law was stated (besides others directed to points not now reported):—" (4) Assuming that, by virtue of the said discharges, the said two sums of £8000 each were transferred to the trustees acting under the will of Mr Neish, and to be administered as if they formed portions of his testamentary estate, is this transfer, so far as effected by the third parties, revocable by them?"

The third parties maintained, as regarded both these sums;—The discharges, on being read together, imported no more than the creation of a trust in the testamentary trustees of Mr Neish, but which was capable of being recalled or revoked by the third parties, each of whom now claimed payment from the testamentary trustees of £2000 forming her share of the said sum of £16,000.

The first and second parties maintained;—Any right to the capital of the two sums belonging to the third parties was effectually discharged by the deeds of discharge, to the effect and subject to the condition that their share of the aggregate sum of £16,000 should be retained and administered by the testamentary trustees of Mr Neish as part of his testamentary trust-estate, which by the terms of his will, so far as the third parties were beneficially interested therein, was bequeathed to them in liferent and to their children equally in fee, and subject to the further direction that in the event of either of the third parties dying without issue, then her share was to accrue to the testator's other children.

Argued for the first and second parties;—There was no question

No. 54.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

here of reducing the discharges; the only question was as to their meaning and effect, the contention of the third parties being that the only effect of the discharges quoad them was to create a voluntary trust in their father's trustees, which they might revoke at any time, just as if they had each handed over £2000 to their father's trustees, and told these trustees to administer that money subject to their respective directions. There were two answers to that contention. In the first place, the daughters handed over no money to their father's trustees. They had merely assented to their father's estate being disburdened of certain obligations, and as they had done so without reserving any rights of their own the necessary result was that their father's trustees were bound to administer his estate according to the trusts of his will freed absolutely of the obligations discharged. Then, secondly, even assuming that the effect of the transactions was the creation of a trust by each of the daughters, it was not a mere trust in suam, for the children of the daughters nati et nascituri took a jus quasitum under it.

Argued for the third parties;—If the contention of the other parties was sound, it was clear that the daughters had, without any consideration whatever, surrendered valuable rights in favour, not merely of their own children, but also of their brothers. Such a result was certainly not to be presumed, and was not the necessary result of the discharges here. The legal effect of the discharges was just as if the daughters had each received payment of £2000 from the marriage-contract trustees, and handed it over to their father's trustees, with directions to hold it for themselves in life, and to pay the fee on their death to their children, and failing children to their brothers. Such an arrangement was purely testamentary and revocable at least as regarded the brothers. Possibly the children of the daughters—at least the children of Mrs Gordon, who were in existence—might have a jus quasitum; but even as regarded them, it was to be borne in mind that the discharges were not marriage-contracts, or contracts of any sort except as between the parties discharging and the parties discharged; and because the daughters had concurred in discharging the marriage-contract trustees in order to facilitate arrangements of purely family convenience, it was not to be inferred that they had gratuitously surrendered rights which they enjoyed under the marriage-contract. In order to reach such a result words of positive and unequivocal obligation were necessary, and there was nothing of that sort here.¹

LORD YOUNG.—This case appears simple enough, and the law regarding the rights of the parties, as to which it is very proper that the trustees should be informed, is, I think, not difficult, and capable of being stated without direct reference to the questions put in the case.

Mr Neish died in 1886 leaving a family of six sons and two daughters. He had entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract in 1848 with Miss Watson, and by that marriage-contract he came under an obligation that his executors after his death should pay over £8000 to the marriage trustees. The lady whom he married conveyed to the same marriage trustees—of course by the same contract—all that she should be entitled to under the will of her father, Mr Watson. Mr Neish left a will, and the trustees under his will are nearly identical with the trustees under the marriage-contract. He had borrowed the sum of £8000 from the marriage trustees, being the sum which they had received from the wife's father's estate under her marriage-contract obligations. He never implemented his obligation to pay £8000 over to the marriage-contract trustees, so that at his death he was indebted to the marriage-contract trustees in these two sums of £8000 each, the one of them being his marriage-contract obligation to pay that sum to the trustees, and the other being his bond for the £8000 which he had borrowed from these trustees. His estate was so situated, though it turned out very well ultimately, that it appeared to his family of six sons and two daughters that it would not be desirable that any part of the testamentary estate should be sold for these two sums, and to avoid that they entered into a deed whereby they requested and authorised the marriage trustees to discharge the bond and disposition in security and the provision of £8000, and they then renounced all their rights under the marriage-contract. The marriage trustees, as so requested and authorised by the only persons who had an interest in the marriage-contract, and who were sui juris, did discharge the testamentary trustees of these two sums, and it was explained to us that there was no other marriage-contract estate. The one sum of £8000 was that under the husband's obligation, the other £8000 was that which had been paid under the wife's obligation, and had been lent to the husband subsequently. By the same deed by which these discharges are granted, the parties thereto say, really in terms, that they will be satisfied to take under their father's will—his testamentary disposition. Well, none of the children have suffered from this, because the testamentary estate consists of more than £16,000, only the sons benefit a little at the expense of the daughters, for the daughters are limited to a lifereit, with a fee to their children. One of the daughters has two children, and therefore the fee will go to them if they live. The other is unmarried, and therefore has only a lifereit, and if she dies unmarried and without children that share of hers—about £2000 I think it was stated—will go to the brothers, and if the married daughter dies childless,—that is to say, if her existing children die,—her share will also go to the brothers.

¹ Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027; Wightman v. Costine, March 20, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 13; Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell, Dec. 20, 1895, 23 R. 332.

The question which we have to deal with is the question whether this authority given to the trustees to discharge the debtors to the trust, and whose debts constituted the whole trust-estate, and which was acted on, was valid and effectual, and is now binding, and I am very clearly of opinion that it was, and is valid and effectual, that the marriage trustees have well discharged these claims,—and I think that was not disputed by Mr Macfarlane,—and that to that extent it is quite good.

But then Mr Macfarlane argued that “Notwithstanding of that, and notwithstanding that there is no marriage-contract estate, I am entitled,—or we, the daughters, are entitled,—to have the testamentary estate under the will of the deceased, to the extent of our shares under the marriage-contract, administered, not according to the will under which they are trustees, but according to the marriage-contract, which is at an end, and our rights under which are discharged, and under which there is no estate.” Now, I cannot

No. 54.

Jan. 13, 1897.
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

No. 54.
Jan. 13, 1897.
Neish's
Trustees v.
Neish.

assent to that argument. I am of opinion that, notwithstanding the apparent, not great but still stateable, hardship to the daughters, they must stand by what they have done, and that they must take from the testamentary trustees according to the provisions of the testament, and not according to the provisions of the marriage-contract.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I also concur. The discharge blocks the way. Owing to the shape which that transaction took, it is now too late to separate the marriage-contract funds from the testamentary funds of Mr Neish. Therefore the parties must take under the will and in terms of the will.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find and declare that the discharge dated 29th September and 3d and 10th October 1886 is valid, binding, and irrevocable ; that the whole children of the late William Neish have thereby renounced and discharged their whole claim, rights, and interests under the marriage-contract of the said William Neish and his wife ; and that the funds which fell under the said marriage-contract fall to be administered by the testamentary trustees of the said William Neish as part of his said testamentary trust-estate : Find and declare accordingly, and decern : Find the whole parties to the case entitled to their expenses as the same may be taxed out of the testamentary trust-estate of the said William Neish."

HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S., Agents.

No. 55.
Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

THE ELECTRIC CONSTRUCTION COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Salvesen—Constable.

HURRY & YOUNG, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Clyde.

Contract—Construction—Contract to supply dynamo.—A maker of dynamos contracted to supply to an electrical engineer "a No. 3 dynamo giving 115 volts, 40 ampères, at approximately 1070 revolutions."

In an action for the price, the purchaser pleaded that the dynamo delivered was disconform to order. The import of the proof was as follows :—

The dynamo (which was used for lighting) when started at 1020 revolutions produced 115 volts, but as it became heated the voltage declined until the maximum heat was attained, when the loss of voltage was 10 per cent. The maximum heat was attained about three hours after starting the machine, and the voltage then became constant, but the light was insufficient.

When the dynamo was started at 1070 revolutions it produced at first 125 volts, and when the maximum heat was reached 115 volts, but the initial voltage injured the lamps.

There was evidence to shew that in a good machine the loss of voltage would not have exceeded 4 per cent, and that this would not have seriously affected the light.

The pursuers proved that the dynamo could be regulated so as to produce a constant voltage of 115 volts in two ways, either (a) by starting the dynamo at 1020 revolutions and by raising the speed once or twice during the three hours till the maximum heat was attained ; (b) by starting the dynamo at 1070 revolutions, and introducing a regulator termed a shunt resistance, to prevent undue pressure on the lamps, till the dynamo attained its maximum heat. The regulator would have required adjustment occasionally till that point was reached, when its use became unnecessary. The objection to the first alternative were that alteration of the speed of the driving-engine was injurious to it, and that an attendant was necessary; to the second, that it required an additional appliance, and that adjustment was necessary during the first three hours after lighting.

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

Opinion per cur. (1) that the contract was to be construed as a contract to supply a dynamo to produce 115 volts when started, with no greater fall in voltage than was usual in well-constructed dynamos; and (2) that the fall in voltage in the machine delivered was excessive, and that the machine was not conform to order.

Sale—Disconformity to contract—Rejection—Right to retain goods and set up breach of warranty in extinction of price—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57. Vict. cap. 71), sec. 11, subsec. 2, and secs. 35 and 53.—Held (1) that where the purchaser of a machine intimated rejection of it as disconform to contract, and thereafter continued to use it for three months, he was not entitled to found on his alleged rejection; and (2) (diss. Lord Kinnear) that the purchaser having elected to reject was not entitled thereafter to fall back upon the alternative remedy provided by the Sale of Goods Act of retaining the machine and claiming compensation on the ground that the seller had failed to perform a material part of the contract.

Observations by Lord Kinnear as to the correct measure of damage where a purchaser retains goods sold and claims damages.

ON 22d September 1894 Messrs Hurry & Young, electrical engineers and contractors, Edinburgh, ordered from the Electric Construction Company, Limited, London, "one No. 3 dynamo, giving 115 volts, 40 ampères, at approximately 1100 revolutions, with extra bearing and slides for lightening belt, and also balance wheel about 1 cwt. (compound-wound) as per quotation, £57, 16s., of the 10th and 13th September."

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

The Electric Construction Company accepted the order by letter dated 24th September, and the dynamo was forwarded to Messrs Hurry & Young on 11th October, and was put up by them in the premises of Messrs Latimer, jewellers, Lothian Road, Edinburgh, for whom it had been ordered. In consequence of complaints by Messrs Latimer as to the working of this dynamo, it was removed by the Electric Construction Company, and a new one was supplied in February 1895, stamped 1070 revolutions.

Messrs Latimer having made complaints as to the working of the new dynamo, the Electric Construction Company supplied a new armature on 11th April 1895. Complaints, however, continued to be made to the effect that after running for some hours there was an excessive loss of voltage, and that consequently the lights lost brilliancy and became too dim for the proper lighting of the shop, and after some correspondence Messrs Hurry & Young wrote to the Electric Construction Company, on 14th September 1895,—“We have been in communication with experts re fall of pressure in Latimer's dynamo, and now definitely tell you that if you cannot make the machine work without a loss of more than 4 volts, you will have to remove it, as both Messrs Latimer and ourselves are satisfied that the machine is not right. You may take what action you care to, and we will do our best to defend ourselves in the matter.”

The Electric Construction Company refused to admit that the machine was disconform to contract, and left it in the premises of Messrs Latimer, who continued to use it.

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

On 18th December 1895 the Company raised an action against Messrs Hurry & Young for payment of the contract price of the dynamo.

The pursuers averred that the dynamo was conform to contract, and pleaded;—(2) Separatim, the defenders having failed timeously to reject said dynamo, and having retained and used it, are not entitled to found on any alleged disconformity to contract.

The defenders denied that the dynamo was conform to contract, and averred that its disconformity rendered it of no value to them, as they would not be able to dispose of it, and further, that they had suffered damage, which they estimated at £500, through the pursuers' failure to implement their contract.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having failed to implement the contract between them and the defenders, the price of which is sued for, by delivering a dynamo conform to the defenders' order, the defenders are not liable in payment of said price, and should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. (3) The defenders having suffered loss and damage to an extent greatly exceeding the sum sued for in consequence of the pursuers' failure to implement their contract as aforesaid, are entitled to absolvitor.*

Proof was allowed. The result of the evidence as to the quality of the dynamo supplied sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord M'Laren, and was to the effect that the dynamo was disconform to contract.

On 18th June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) sustained the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.†

* Section 11, subsection 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), enacts:—"In Scotland, failure by the seller to perform any material part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages."

Section 35 enacts:—"The buyer is deemed to have accepted the goods when he intimates to the seller that he has accepted them, or when the goods have been delivered to him and he does any act in relation to them which is inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, or when, after the lapse of a reasonable time, he retains the goods without intimating to the seller that he has rejected them."

Section 53 enacts:—" (1) Where there is a breach of warranty by the seller, or where the buyer elects or is compelled to treat any breach of a condition on the part of the seller as a breach of warranty, the buyer is not by reason only of such breach of warranty entitled to reject the goods, but he may (a) set up against the seller the breach of warranty in diminution or extinction of the price, or (b) maintain an action against the seller for damages for the breach of warranty. . . . (5) Nothing in this section shall prejudice or affect the buyer's right of rejection in Scotland as declared by this Act."

Section 62 enacts:—" (1) In this Act, unless the contract or subject-matter otherwise requires . . . As regards Scotland, a breach of warranty shall be deemed to be a failure to perform a material part of the contract."

† "OPINION.—The first question is, whether the dynamo supplied by the pursuers to the defenders was conform to contract.

"The original contract was for a 'No. 3 dynamo, giving 115 volts, 40

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The machine was not disconform to contract. (2) The defenders were barred from now rejecting the machine by delay, and by having continued to use it after knowledge of its alleged defects, and after intimating their rejection of it. The Sale of Goods Act was a codifying statute, and accordingly the law remained the same as before it was passed, except in so far as expressly altered. But prior to that Act it was settled that a buyer was not entitled to use goods which he had rejected,¹ nor a seller to use an article rejected by a buyer,² if he did not accept the rejection, the principle being that a man was not entitled to use an article which was the property of another. (3) The contract contained no warranty, and no material part of the contract could be specified which had not been fulfilled. A material part was not the same as a material term or condition of a contract. The case was one of total breach or nothing, and therefore the sections of the Sale of Goods Act upon which the defenders founded were inapplicable. Further, the alleged defect in the machine was known to the defenders in Febru-

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

ampères, at approximately 1100 revolutions.' I think, however, that the contract may be held to have been varied to the not very important extent of substituting 1070 revolutions for 1100, because the dynamo now in question is a second dynamo which was supplied by the pursuers upon complaints being made in regard to that which was sent in the first instance, and the number of revolutions stamped upon the second dynamo is 1070. No objection was taken at the time to that number of revolutions, nor is anything now founded upon the fact that it was somewhat below the number originally contracted for.

"The objection taken to the dynamo is that the fall of voltage is excessive. Thus, if it is set agoing at a speed which produces 115 volts, and the same speed is maintained, there is a fall in from three to five or six hours of at least 10 volts, with the result that the lights become dim and insufficient.

"The pursuers' contention is (1) that the fall in voltage is not excessive for a dynamo of the size of that in question, and which has not been specially constructed so as to ensure that the fall shall be smaller; (2) that the fall of voltage during the first few hours of working such a machine requires to be counteracted, either by increasing the speed as the dynamo becomes heated, or by using what is called a 'shunt resistance'; and (3) that when the dynamo has attained its maximum heat, 1070 revolutions or thereby will thereafter maintain a constant voltage of 115. The pursuers further say that the number of revolutions specified in the contract or marked upon the machine denotes the number necessary to give the required voltage after the dynamo has attained its maximum heat.

"It is admitted that the voltage always falls to some extent as a dynamo becomes heated, but the defenders' witnesses say that the fall should not exceed 2 or 3, or at the very utmost 4 per cent. If the latter amount is exceeded the light becomes seriously affected.

"The pursuers, on the other hand, say that in a dynamo of the size of that in question, which has not been constructed under special stipulations, the ordinary fall of voltage runs from 7 to 10 per cent.

"In regard to the actual fall of voltage which takes place in the dynamo in question, I think that the result of the trial which was made by the pursuers' witness Professor Bailey, and checked by the defenders' witness Mr Ogilvie, may be accepted as a fair test of what the machine can do. Mr Bailey started the dynamo at 1021 revolutions, which produced 116½

¹ Chapman v. Ceuston, Thomson, & Co., March 10, 1871, 9 Macph. 675, 43 Scot. Jur. 326.

² Croan v. Vallance, May 18, 1881, 8 R. 700.

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

ary 1895, and they were not entitled to keep the machine and use it and plead damage. Besides, a buyer must elect his remedy. Here he elected to reject, but failed to do so properly, and he could not now fall back upon the alternative remedy given by the statute.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The dynamo was disconform to contract. (2) It had been timeously rejected. The new armature was only supplied in April, and from that date until October lighting would be required at the most only for a very short time each day, so that the defect of the machine would not be apparent. The letter of 24th September was therefore a timeous rejection. A buyer was not bound to return a defective machine to the seller, or put it into neutral custody. He did all that was required of him if he intimated that he did not accept it, and requested the seller to remove it.¹ If the seller left the machine with the buyer, the latter was entitled even to use it, especially if the seller denied the alleged disconformity to contract. It could not be said, for instance, that a manufacturer who had been supplied with a defective engine could only preserve volts. After running at the same speed for some hours the voltage dropped to 106. The speed was then increased to 1065 revolutions, when 115 volts were obtained. The result of the trial was therefore to shew that, even with the most skilled handling, the drop of voltage was between 9 and 10 per cent. The drop, therefore, is not far short of the limit stated by the pursuers themselves. The trial further shews that if the dynamo was started at 1070 revolutions a greater amount of voltage would be produced than could with safety be put upon the lamps. As I have said, 1021 revolutions gave, when the dynamo was cold, 116½ volts. It appears that an increase of speed of 50. revolutions would increase the voltage by about 10. If, therefore, the dynamo was started at 1070 revolutions, it would give from 124 to 126 volts, which admittedly would injure the lamps. The trial, however, also shews that after the dynamo has been fully heated it will continue to give the stipulated number of volts at approximately 1070 revolutions.

"The first question is, whether the fall in the voltage is excessive for a small machine, in regard to which no limit of fall has been specified. I have already said that the pursuers' view is that the normal fall of voltage in an ordinary dynamo of small size is from 7 to 10 per cent, and they put into the witness-box several gentlemen well qualified to express an opinion, who supported that view. One of the pursuers' witnesses, however—Mr Hunter—admitted upon cross-examination that his opinion was that a fall of 10 volts was excessive, and that a customer would be entitled to reject a dynamo which shewed so great a fall. For the defenders four electrical engineers of large experience gave evidence to the effect that a fall of voltage of from 7 to 10 per cent was altogether excessive. They say that it is not the case that so great a fall is to be expected in a properly constructed dynamo, of whatever size it may be, and that they would not take a dynamo shewing anything like so great a fall off the maker's hands. Mr Cox-Walker gives his practical experience of a number of dynamos of very much the same type as that in question—some of them made by the pursuers—and he says that he never found the fall in voltage to be more than 2 or 3 volts. He says that in every case, if the dynamo was started at the given number of volts, its speed did not again require to be altered.

"Where there is such a direct conflict between the skilled witnesses, it is not unimportant to inquire what are the considerations upon which the question of what is an excessive fall of voltage depends. In the regulations issued by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts for ensuring his right of rejection by stopping his factory, and so enormously increasing his claim of damages. In *Chapman's*¹ case the subject of sale was fungibles, and the common law recognised a distinction between the case of fungibles and machinery.² In that case also some of the goods in every lot had been consumed. Goods might be rejected timeously although the purchaser had resold them in whole or in part to a third party without examination.³ In any view, the defenders had a right under the Sale of Goods Act to retain the machine, and plead damage in answer to the pursuers' claim for the price. The distinction which existed in England between a representation and a warranty was not recognised in Scotland. A warranty in Scotland was just a term or condition of the contract.⁴ In England it was a collateral agreement. Here the condition as to voltage, which was essential to the purpose for which the machine had been supplied, had been broken, and as the machine would in consequence not repay the expense of taking it out of the premises where it had been fitted up, the Lord Ordinary's decision was right.

¹ Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 36.

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

a proper and sufficient supply of electrical energy, it is provided that 'the variation of pressure at any consumer's terminals shall not under any conditions of the supply which the consumer is entitled to receive exceed 4 per cent from the declared constant pressure.' It is admitted that the meaning of that rule is that the voltage may vary 4 per cent in either direction.

"For example, if the declared constant pressure was 100 volts, the rule of the Board of Trade would be infringed if the voltage ran above 104 or fell below 96. The reason of the rule is obvious. If the pressure rises more than 4 per cent it injures the lamps; if it falls more than 4 per cent the light is dimmed.

"I think that probably a dynamo which had a fall of voltage of 8 per cent might be within Board of Trade regulations, because if it was started at a speed which gave 4 per cent above the constant pressure it would fall to 4 per cent below that pressure. The dynamo in question, having a fall of over 9 per cent, would therefore exceed, although not to a great extent, the Board of Trade limit, and the pursuers accordingly contend that the Board of Trade regulations were very stringent, and could not be held to apply to an ordinary commercial dynamo. I do not think that it is proved that the Board of Trade regulations are stringent; and they are certainly not nearly so stringent as the requirements which the defenders' witnesses say they enforce and obtain in practice. I imagine that the object of the Board of Trade was to secure that on the one hand the supply of energy should be sufficient to give a proper light, and, on the other hand, should not be so strong as to injure the lamps. I see no reason why the Board of Trade should have made the rule more stringent than was necessary to accomplish these objects. Indeed, I think that the pursuers practically admit that the Board of Trade rule is not unnecessarily stringent, because they do not contend that the dynamo in question—which only exceeds the variation allowed by the Board of Trade by a little over 1 per cent—can be satisfactorily worked at a constant rate of speed. They say that the proper way of working the dynamo is either to increase the speed or to use a resis-

¹ Chapman v. Couston, Thomson, & Co., July 19, 1872, 10 Macph. (H. L.) 74, 44 Scot. Jur. 402.

² Pearce Brothers v. Irons, Feb. 25, 1869, 7 Macph. 571, 41 Scot. Jur. 302.

³ Magistrates of Glasgow v. Ireland & Son, June 27, 1895, 22 R. 818; McCaw, Stevenson, & Orr, Limited, v. Maclaren & Sons, Feb. 28, 1893, 20 R. 437.

⁴ Bell's Prin. sec. 93 and 111.

No. 55. At advising,—

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

LORD M'LAREN.—The defenders, who are designed electrical engineers and contractors, after some preliminary correspondence, ordered from the pursuers "one No. 3 dynamo, giving 115 volts, 40 ampères, at approximately 1100 revolutions," at the price of £57, 16s., "to be delivered by earliest." The order was on 22d September 1894, and was accepted in course. The descriptive words "No. 3 dynamo" refer to the corresponding number in the pursuers' trade catalogue; but I observe that the specification does not precisely correspond to the catalogue, because the nearest specification in the catalogue is that of a machine designed to give an electro-motive force of 100 volts at 1100 revolutions per minute. This is partly explained by the preliminary correspondence, and partly by the defenders' letter of 7th September, where they say, "the E.M.F. would be 115, and the machine to run about 1200 or 1250. We suppose that machine would do if it were speeded up." But I do not think it necessary to clear up this discrepancy, because if the pursuers chose to accept an order for a machine tance coil, these being both expedients which are only required if the dynamo cannot properly accomplish its work at a uniform rate of speed.

"If, as the pursuers say, a dynamo should be held to be satisfactory if the voltage can be kept steady by regulating the speed, I have difficulty in seeing what is the precise principle upon which the limit of 10 per cent is fixed. I suppose that it would be said that to allow a larger fall of voltage would impose upon the engine which drives the dynamo an unduly great variation of speed, although in the present case it seems to me (if I understand the evidence aright) that it would be as easy to meet a fall of 15 volts as of 10 volts. On the other hand, the view that the fall in voltage should not exceed what is required, at a uniform rate of speed, to maintain the light with safety to the lamps, appears to me to rest upon a definite and reasonable principle.

"If it had been shewn that it was well known to persons skilled in the matter that small dynamos had (apart from special orders) a fall of voltage which required to be met by an increase of speed or other device, the case would have been different. But half of the experts who were examined say that they never heard of such a rule, and deny its existence. It seems to me that the natural meaning of a contract to supply a dynamo which will produce a stated number of volts at approximately a given speed is, that if the dynamo is worked at a speed reasonably approximating that which is stipulated, a voltage will be produced sufficiently near the stated amount to maintain a sufficient light on the one hand without, on the other hand, putting an undue strain on the lamps.

"There are various considerations which point to that being the true construction of the contract. Thus, where, as in this case, the motive power is a gas-engine, it appears that the speed cannot be altered from time to time each night without injury to the engine. Further cases may occur in which it is impossible to alter the speed, as where the same engine is used to drive the dynamo and also other machines. Again, where the dynamo is wanted to light a shop or a house, the method of working proposed by the pursuers would be most objectionable. They say that for a period extending to from three to six hours the speed of the engine must from time to time be increased, or that a resistance coil must be put on at first and gradually cut off. That would involve that, during a great part of the year, the whole time during which the light was required would be taken up in getting the dynamo into working order, and that it would only attain which was to furnish a definite number of ampères at a definite electromotive force, and at a given price, it is no answer to say that their No. 3 machine would not be equal to the demand made upon it. The makers were bound by their contract to provide a machine capable of performing a definite amount of work, and if this could only be done by a larger or more powerful machine than a No. 3, they must bear the loss. It is of course a circumstance to be taken into consideration, that the order was given by an electrical engineer, who would presumably have knowledge of the capabilities of such machines; but I do not think that this circumstance would absolve the pursuers from their obligation to furnish a dynamo capable of producing 115 volts, 40 ampères, at approximately 1100 revolutions per minute.

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
 Electric Construction Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Hurry &
 Young.

The dynamo was intended for the use of a customer, Mr George Latimer, in his place of business, Lothian Road, Edinburgh. Mr Latimer was dissatisfied with the dynamo first supplied to him (October 1894); this was taken back, and another dynamo was supplied in February 1895. In con-a condition in which it could give constant results when the lights were no longer required.

"I have therefore come to the conclusion that the dynamo was not conform to contract.

"The next question is, whether it is still open to the defenders to refuse payment of the contract price. As the law stood prior to the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, I think that it is extremely doubtful whether, in the circumstances which have occurred, the defenders could have pleaded breach of contract to the effect of resisting a claim for the price.

"The defenders, no doubt, all along objected to the dynamo, and called upon the pursuers to make it right, and finally they told the pursuers that if they could not make it work without a fall of more than 4 volts they must remove it. The pursuers did not remove it, and it has continued to be worked in Messrs Latimer's shop until the present time. Under the old law, I think that the defenders would have put themselves in the wrong by continuing to work the dynamo. When it became apparent that the pursuers would not or could not put it right, I think that it would have been incumbent upon the defenders to replace it as soon as possible, and either to return it to the pursuers, or to put it in safe keeping at their risk.

"But the Sale of Goods Act has made an important alteration upon the law. A buyer is no longer bound to reject or return goods which are disconform to contract, and to repudiate the contract; but, if he has not expressly or by implication accepted the goods, he can retain them and claim damages, or set up the breach in diminution or extinction of the price.

"That I take to be the effect of the 11th, 35th, 53d, and 62d sections of the Act.

"By section 11 (2) it is provided that in Scotland 'failure by the seller to perform any material part of the contract of sale is a breach of contract which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages.'

"The buyer's remedies are further specified in section 53. It is there, inter alia, provided that, 'where there is a breach of warranty by the seller,' the buyer may '(a) set up against the seller the breach of warranty in diminution or extinction of the price.'

"By the 62d section it is enacted that—'As regards Scotland, a breach

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

sequence of complaints as to its performance, a new armature was afterwards supplied. I mention these particularly, because it is fair to the pursuers to keep in view that they gave due attention to the defenders' demands so long as these amounted only to a requirement that the machine should be made complete and put into good order, and did not take the shape of a claim to reject or rescind the contract of sale.

I pass from the admitted facts of the case to the question in dispute, as to which a proof was taken before the Lord Ordinary. Mr Latimer was still dissatisfied with the performance of the dynamo; and it appears from the evidence that he had some reason for dissatisfaction, because, while it was no doubt possible in the early part of the evenings to get an electro-motive force of 115 volts from the dynamo, yet after it had been run for two or three hours the voltage fell off to the extent of 8 to 10 per cent, and continued falling; this of course involved a diminution of light in an even greater ratio, though the precise difference of illuminating effect is not matter of evidence.

It is common ground that every dynamo which has been run for two or three hours suffers a certain diminution of the electro-motive force produced, and if it is not admitted, I think it is proved as a scientific fact that this effect is greater when the machine is worked up to the limit of its powers than it would be if a more powerful machine were substituted which could be run with less strain and at a lower speed. The Lord Ordinary in his analysis of the evidence has given weight to the view of the defenders' witnesses on this subject, which is to the effect that the fall in voltage ought of warranty shall be deemed to be a failure to perform a material part of the contract.'

"Now, I think that if the construction which I have put upon the contract between the pursuers and the defenders is sound, there was a failure to perform a material part of the contract, and that the defenders were entitled to retain the goods and treat the failure as a breach of warranty entitling them to diminution or extinction of the price.

"The pursuers founded upon the 35th section, and argued that the defenders must be held to have accepted the goods, and could not now either reject them or resist an action for payment of the price.

"The 35th section provides that the buyer is deemed to have accepted the goods—(1) when he intimates to the seller that he has accepted them; (2) 'when the goods have been delivered to him, and he does any act in relation to them which is inconsistent with the ownership of the seller'; and (3) when after the lapse of a reasonable time he retains the goods without intimating to the seller that he has rejected them.

"It was admitted that the defenders were not in the first or third of these positions, but it was argued that by continuing to use the dynamo they had acted in a way inconsistent with the ownership of the seller. I am of opinion that the argument is untenable. The right to retain given by the Act involves the right to use, and use would only imply acceptance if there had been no timeous rejection of the goods. In this case I think that there was timeous rejection of the goods. The defenders from the first complained that the dynamo was not conform to contract, and when it became apparent that the pursuers could not put it right, the defenders told them that they might remove it. That, in my opinion, was rejection within the meaning of the Act.

"I am therefore of opinion that the defenders are entitled to set up the breach of contract as in extinction or diminution of the price."

not to exceed from 2 or 3 volts in the 100, and that a fall of from 8 to 10 per cent is altogether excessive. I think it is perfectly plain that so considerable a fall as 8 per cent would be incompatible with good lighting, unless the downward tendency could be corrected in some way. This is not seriously disputed by the pursuers; but their answer is, that the defenders, when they ordered a No. 3, which is a small machine, knew, or must be taken to have known, that the voltage could not be depended on, and that their remedy was to increase the speed of the dynamo when the voltage fell.

No. 55.
Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

As a matter of fact, I have no doubt that the explanation given by the pursuers is correct, and that the cause of the faulty performance is that the No. 3 machine was not equal to the work required, and again I do not doubt that by "speeding-up" the engine from time to time the voltage might be restored to the proper standard. It is not said that this was not in fact done. But this observation is not an answer to the defenders' objections, and, as already indicated, I think that the pursuers having undertaken to supply a machine producing 115 volts, at a speed of 1100 revolutions a minute, are not excused by saying that what they promised was impossible with a machine of the given size and pattern. It was open to them to decline the order if they were unable to execute it as given, and in my opinion they do not fulfil their contract by supplying a machine which deviates from the prescribed electro-motive force by a greater percentage than is usual in the case of machines supplied by good makers. It follows that if the defenders, or their customer, Mr Latimer, had taken proper measures for putting an end to the contract of sale they would have been within their rights.

I now come to the consideration of the legal aspects of the case, and I may begin by saying that I shall assume for the purposes of the argument that the defenders' letter to the pursuers, of date 14th September 1895, amounts to an unqualified rejection of the dynamo. I shall also assume that the rejection in the month of September of a machine which was delivered in February, and whose defects had been manifest to the defenders from the beginning, did not come too late. I am not giving a legal opinion in that sense. I only assume for the purposes of the argument that the rejection did not come too late. Under the Sale of Goods Act it is not necessary that the buyer should return the goods; it is enough that he intimates his rejection, and that he holds the goods at the disposal of the seller. But the Act of Parliament does not say that a buyer may reject the subject of sale and go on using it as if it were his property. It would be a very strange theory of law which would give rise to such a result, because it amounts to this, that when a buyer has an imperfect machine or article of any kind supplied to him, if he only goes through the form of a rejection, he may continue to use the article as long as he pleases without paying for it.

Now, the rejection of the subject of sale by a buyer is in legal effect a rescission of the contract of sale on the ground of the seller's non-performance or imperfect performance of his obligations. But if a purchaser claims right to rescind the contract of sale, he must, of course, be prepared to make reasonable restitution, that is to say, if he cannot restore the goods

No. 55. altogether unimpaired by use, he must, at least, do nothing subsequent to the rescission which would injure or affect their saleable quality.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

But it is admitted that the defenders' sub-vendee (whom in this question I identify with the defenders) has continued to use the dynamo just as if he had accepted it in fulfilment of the contract. This use was in fact continued from 14th September, the date of the nominal rejection of the dynamo, down to and after the raising of the action in December 1895. It is not necessary to consider the case of such a slight or temporary use of the article as might be taken by a buyer consistently with a bona fide intention of rejecting it, because we are here dealing with a case of use continued for three months, and following on a longer use while the machine was under trial. Now, as the sale of goods is regulated by Act of Parliament, I must say that in my opinion, when the Act speaks of the buyer's right of rejection, this must be taken to mean a rejection according to known legal conditions, one of which is that the buyer must not break bulk further than is necessary, or use or consume the article in the case of goods sold for use or consumption.

It is hardly necessary to quote authority on a point which is so well understood. But this condition of the right of rejection is laid down by Bell in the Principles, sec. 99, nearly in the words which I have used, and it is fully recognised in the opinions of the Lords in the important case of Couston, Thomson, & Company v. Chapman.¹

If in this case the sellers had assented to the rejection of the dynamo, and had agreed to take it back, the contract would then have come to an end, and any subsequent detention and use of the machine by the buyer could only give rise, as I conceive, to a pecuniary claim. But the makers did not, in fact, assent to the proposed rejection of their machine, and the validity of the rejection could only be determined by subsequent agreement, or by the decision of a Court of law.

Now, I consider that pending a decision as to a buyer's claim to reject, the goods must be treated as if in neutral custody, and this whether the buyer be himself the custodier (as he may be under the Act of Parliament), or whether he places them in the custody of a third party. The condition that the buyer does nothing in relation to the goods which is inconsistent with the ownership of the seller is in my opinion especially applicable to the period when the parties are at issue as to the determination of the contract, and this view receives indirect confirmation from the language of the 35th section, where the doing of an act which is inconsistent with the seller's ownership is declared to be equivalent to the acceptance of the goods.

The importance of maintaining the integrity of the principle has led me to dwell on the qualification which the law attaches to the buyer's right of rejection at, perhaps, unnecessary length. I must now examine more closely the Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment.

The Lord Ordinary has sustained the defenders' second and third pleas in law. Now, these pleas appear to me to be inconsistent, and only capable of being maintained as alternative propositions; because the second plea affirms that the pursuers have failed to implement their contract, and as a consequence, that the defenders are not liable in payment of the price, while the third plea amounts to a claim to set off the damages for breach of contract against the price. Now, under the statute (sec. 53), it is only where there is a breach of warranty by the seller that a claim of damages may be set up in extinction or diminution of the price. The reason of this is evident; if the goods are rightly rejected, the price is not due, and no question of compensation or set-off can arise. Without dwelling further on this point, it may be well to consider whether the defenders are in a position to treat the case as one of breach of warranty. By the 11th section of the statute it is provided that in Scotland "failure by the seller to perform any material part of the contract of sale is a breach of contract which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages."

¹ 10 Macph. (H. L.) 76, 80.

No. 55.
Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

Under this enactment the common law of Scotland is radically altered, but it is not made identical with the law of England. Why this change should have been made I do not know, but we have nothing to do with the policy of the statute. The clause as it stands gives the buyer an unqualified right of election either to treat the contract as repudiated, or to affirm the contract and put forward a claim in diminution of the price; but the clause does not entitle the buyer to do two inconsistent things. In this case, I conceive that the defenders made their election on 14th September 1895 to treat the contract as repudiated. They are not in a position to found on their election, because they have taken the use of the dynamo; but having made their election, and thus raised the issue which this action is brought to settle, the defenders, in my opinion, are not entitled to recall their election and to set up a claim as for breach of warranty. The introduction of breach of warranty into the case is a contribution by counsel, who were probably right in thinking that the case should have been so treated from the beginning. But I can find no trace of such a claim in the evidence or the correspondence subsequent to 14th September, which is the actual date on the point of election.

I ought to add, that even if the election had been different, I could not agree with the Lord Ordinary that damage is proved equal to the price of the machine. The evidence only establishes a certain amount of inconvenience experienced by the buyer in the use of the machine, and I cannot admit that a buyer who has the means of supplying himself with an efficient machine by purchase is entitled to go on using the defective article until he has set up an amount of damage which is sufficient to extinguish the price. The question may arise in other cases, and I should desire to reserve my opinion upon it. On the main question, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be recalled and decree granted for the price.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the dynamo supplied by the pursuers to the defenders was not conform to contract. I

No. 55.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Electric Construction Co.,
Limited, v.
Hurry &
Young.

think this question depends not upon any evidence as to the conditions upon which a dynamo may in general be held to be a satisfactory machine, but upon the construction of a written contract by which it is stipulated that the dynamo to be supplied shall give 115 volts 40 amperes, at approximately 1070 revolutions.

On this ground I am of opinion that the defenders might have rejected the machine, and refused payment of the price, had they not retained it in their possession and continued to use it as their own for so long a time as to preclude their afterwards rejecting it. But I agree with your Lordships, for the reasons that have been already given, that it is now too late for them to repudiate the contract.

I am, however, unable to concur in the opinion that they are also deprived of the alternative remedy given by the statute to a buyer when the seller has failed to perform any material part of the contract of sale, viz., that of retaining the goods and treating the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages. They cannot be deprived of this remedy by reason of their having accepted the goods, because that is the very condition upon which the right arises, to treat the failure of a material part of the contract as a breach giving a claim for damages. Nor does it appear to me that they are barred from claiming damages on this ground by any final election to resort to a different and inconsistent remedy. The argument, as I understand it, is that they are not entitled to retain the goods and claim damages for breach of a material part of the contract, because they had intimated to the pursuers that they claimed to reject the goods, and to treat the contract as repudiated. But we are all agreed that their attempted rejection is ineffectual, and that they are not entitled to treat the contract as repudiated. It seems to me somewhat inconsistent to hold that they cannot reject the goods because they have in effect elected to retain them, and at the same time that they cannot claim damages on the assumption of their retaining the goods because they have elected to reject them. I can quite understand that a buyer might be barred from maintaining one alternative remedy, if by maintaining the other he had done anything to alter the seller's position to his prejudice. But I do not see that the pursuers' position is in any way prejudiced by the defenders' conduct. It is true they called upon the pursuers to remove the machine as not being conform to contract, adding,—"You can take what action you care to, and we will do our best to defend ourselves in the matter." But this in no way prejudices the pursuers in any plea which they might otherwise have taken to meet the alternative case which the defenders now maintain. When the pursuers brought their action for payment of the price, I think it was still open to the defenders to maintain, firstly, that the machine is not conform to contract, and therefore that they are entitled to reject it; and secondly, that if they cannot reject it they are at least entitled to claim damages for breach of a material condition. I think the argument on the merits of this latter plea arises now under exactly the same conditions as if they had intimated from the first that they would not reject the dynamo, but that they would claim damages for the breach of the condition in question. If that be so, there is no room for a plea in bar, for the defenders cannot be barred by their conduct from maintaining a legal right, unless they have led the other party to alter his position in reliance on some implied undertaking or indication of an intention not to maintain it. Your Lordships hold that it would be unjust to allow the defenders, who have received a part of the consideration for which they contracted, to keep the machine and pay nothing because the contract has not been fully performed. I think the statute enables them, in these circumstances, to treat the condition which has been broken as if it were a warranty or independent agreement giving rise to a claim for damages, and to set up their claim for damages against the sellers in diminution or extinction of the price. On this point therefore I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I have some doubt, however, whether the amount of the damages has been satisfactorily made out. The damage claimable for breach of one condition would not necessarily be the same as for the breach of the entire contract. I presume that the claim should be measured by the difference between the value of the machine actually supplied and the value which it would have had to the defenders if it had been in all respects conform to contract. I think the evidence upon this point is not altogether satisfactory, but it is a point upon which I should not be disposed to differ from the Lord Ordinary if we were to adhere to his interlocutor.

As your Lordships are of opinion that the interlocutor should be recalled, it is unnecessary to consider it further, since my opinion will have no effect upon the judgment.

THE LORD PRESIDENT concurred with LORD M'LAREN.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decerned in favour of the pursuers in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

WALLACE & PENNELL, W.S.—RICHARD JOHNSTONE, S.S.C.—Agents.

STRATON BROUGHAM BURNS AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).

No. 56.

—C. J. Guthrie—T. B. Morison.

WADDELL & SON, Defenders (Respondents).—Mackenzie—

John Wilson.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Burns v.
Waddell &
Son.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), secs. 53 and 54.—Held that an interlocutor (not falling within the provisions of sec. 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1868) which does not, either by itself or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, dispose of the question of liability for expenses, is not an interlocutor disposing of the whole subject-matter of the cause, and cannot be reclaimed against without the leave of the Lord Ordinary.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Consent of parties.—The Court will not entertain an incompetent reclaiming note although the respondent waives his right to object.

In October 1893 Straton Brougham Burns and others, formerly tenants under Sir Windham Anstruther, of the Mauldslee coal-field, raised an action against Waddell & Son, their subtenants in a portion of the coal-field, concluding for relief of certain sums amounting to £550 claimed from the pursuers by Sir Windham Anstruther, in respect of damages occasioned by improper working.

The defenders disputed their liability to relieve, but subsequently made a tender.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy

No. 56.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Burns v.
Waddell &
Son.

On 10th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, in respect it is not disputed that the landlord, Sir Windham Anstruther, has offered to accept payment of the sums mentioned in the minute of tender, No. 20 of process, as in full of the claims to which this action relates, finds that on payment or consignment of the sums tendered in said minute, the defenders will be entitled to absolvitor; and in order that such payment or consignment may be made, continues the cause."

On 13th August the pursuers, without having moved for or obtained the leave of the Lord Ordinary, reclaimed.

The pursuers were proceeding to discuss the merits when the attention of parties was directed by the Lord President to the question of the competency of the reclaiming note.

The pursuers argued;—The reclaiming note was competent, for practically the whole merits of the cause were decided by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and it was only in the most technical sense that it could be called an interlocutory judgment. Besides no objection to the competency was taken by the respondents.

The respondents stated that while their view was that the reclaiming note was incompetent they had no interest to and did not press the objection.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion this reclaiming note is incompetent, and it is our duty to dismiss it. The Court of Session Act, 1868, says in peremptory terms that—except in the way provided by the 28th section of the Act—until the whole cause has been decided in the Outer-House, it shall not be competent to present a reclaiming note against any interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary without his leave first had and obtained. By express decision of the Court in the case of Baird,¹ an interlocutor does not fall within that class, unless it disposes of expenses, by which I mean, not that it decides the amount of expenses payable, but that it deals with and determines the question of the liability of one or other of the parties for expenses. Now this interlocutor contains no such element, but is distinctly what may be called an interlocutory judgment. What then is our duty? The parties may think it convenient that we should go on and decide this question, but it does not fall within the scope of the official duties which we hold the Queen's commission to perform. Our official duty is to try cases which are competently brought before the Court. This is not a case of that kind, and it would be contrary to our duty to spend time which is dedicated to law suits on voluntary arbitration.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The Legislature has laid down rules for the conduct of business in the Court of Session, and one of them is that a reclaiming note against an interlocutory judgment of a Lord Ordinary, except within a certain time and subject to certain regulations, is incompetent. This interlocutor is shewn by the case of *Baird*¹ to be not a final judgment, but an interlocutory judgment. There was a mode by which within a certain time a reclaiming note might competently have been presented, if the leave of the Lord Ordinary had been obtained. The parties did not follow that course, and I am altogether adverse to the idea that we should proceed on the assumption that if the Lord Ordinary's leave had been asked he would have given it. No. 56.

¹ Baird v. Barton, June 22, 1882, 9 R. 970.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Burns v.
Waddell &
Son.

LORD M'LAREN.—I quite appreciate the position which Mr Mackenzie has taken up, that he does not think that it is in the interests of his client to take exception to the reclaiming note being proceeded with. It is unfortunate that the proper course has not been followed and the leave of the Lord Ordinary asked. If I may hazard an opinion, I have very little doubt that leave would have been given by the Lord Ordinary, for the interlocutor, if not technically, at least substantially, disposes of the whole merits of the case. But we are bound by the conditions of the statute, and as our attention was called to the omission we have no alternative.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note as incompetent.

P. MORISON, S.S.C.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES M'FADYEN, Pursuer (Appellant).—*A. J. Young—
A. S. D. Thomson.*

No. 57.

DALMELLINGTON IRON COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Salvesen.

Jan. 16, 1897.
M'Fadyen v.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Notice of injury—Reasonable excuse for want of notice—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 4.—The Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 4, enacts that an action for the recovery of compensation under the Act shall not be maintainable unless notice that injury has been sustained is given within six weeks from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, "provided always that in case of death the want of such notice shall be no bar to the maintenance of such action if the Judge shall be of opinion that there was reasonable excuse for such want of notice."

In an action for damages under the Act brought by the father of a deceased miner, the pursuer admitted that he had not given notice of the injury sustained by his son until three days after the expiry of six weeks from the occurrence of the accident, but averred that his son survived his injuries for a fortnight. "The pursuer is an old man, and is illiterate, and was not aware of the necessity of giving notice, and it was not known whether the deceased would survive the injuries he had received, and sue himself for damages in respect thereof."

The Court dismissed the action, holding (dub. Lord M'Laren) that no reasonable excuse for the want of the statutory notice had been averred.

THIS was an action brought in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by James M'Fadyen, residing at Joppa, in the county of Ayr, against the Dalmellington Iron Company, Limited, Glasgow, for payment of damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on account of the death of the pursuer's son, who had been fatally injured while in the employment of the defenders. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 17) " . . . The pursuer caused notice of said occurrence to be sent to the defenders, in terms of the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Notice was given on 21st November 1895, three days after the expiry of the six weeks allowed by statute for such notice being given. It is explained that

No. 57.

Jan. 16, 1897.
M'Fadyen v.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited.

the accident occurred on 7th October, the death on 22d October, and the public inquiry at Ayr on 12th November, and that notice was given, as above stated, on 21st November. The pursuer is an old man, and is illiterate, and was not aware of the necessity of giving notice; and it was not known whether the deceased would survive the injuries he received, and sue himself for damages in respect thereof. Indeed, up to very shortly before his death deceased was expected to recover. Further, the defenders have not been prejudiced in any way; and it was, in any view, desirable to await the result of the public inquiry, after which the pursuer had to consult his sons, who live in Glasgow, as to the steps to be taken in the circumstances."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders not having received timeous notice in terms of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, they are entitled to absolvitor in so far as the action is based upon that statute.*

On 30th June 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) assolizied the defenders, on the ground that according to the admitted facts of the case the accident to the pursuer's son had been caused, or at least materially contributed to, by his own fault.

The pursuer appealed, and moved for issues.

Argued for the pursuer on the question of notice;—The circumstances stated on record shewed that there was a reasonable excuse for the pursuer's failure to give the statutory notice. In any case, if an issue at common law were allowed, the question whether or not the want of notice was excusable should be reserved for the decision of the Judge who should preside at the trial.¹

Argued for the defenders on the question of notice;—There was no reason for postponing the decision of the question as to notice, even if an issue were allowed at common law, and the question fell to be decided against the pursuer, as there was no relevant averment of reasonable excuse.²—[LORD M'LAREN suggested that the injury of which the pursuer was bound to give notice was the injury he had himself sustained through his son's death, and that notice within six weeks of the son's death satisfied the statute.] The word "injury" in the section meant the personal injury to the employee, and the section required notice to be given within six weeks of the occurrence of the "accident causing the injury," meaning evidently the accident to the workman. In regard to the time within which an action must be raised, the Legislature had discriminated between the case where death did or did not result from the injury, and a comparison of

* Section 4 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), enacts,—“An action for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice that injury has been sustained is given within six weeks, and the action is commenced within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or, in case of death, within twelve months from the time of death: Provided always that in case of death the want of such notice shall be no bar to the maintenance of such action if the Judge shall be of opinion that there was reasonable excuse for such want of notice.”

¹ Trail v. Kelman & Co., Oct. 22, 1887, 15 R. 4; Macleod v. Pirie, Feb. 15, 1893, 20 R. 381.

² Connolly v. Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Company, Limited, Nov. 17, 1894, 22 R. 80.

the different parts of the clause shewed that they did not intend to do so in regard to the period within which notice was to be given. No. 57.

At advising,—

Jan. 16, 1897.
M'Fadyen v.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriff-substitute has given the go-by to the question of notice, but the defenders have a right to have that plea disposed of, raised as it is on relevancy, and they have claimed our judgment upon it. Admittedly, notice was not given within the six weeks prescribed by the statute; and the only question is, whether there is a relevant averment of reasonable excuse for the want of such notice. In my opinion there is not. There is no circumstantial statement of reasonable excuse at all. What is said about the pursuer might be said probably of any and every father of a miner, viz., that he is an old man, and is illiterate. To sustain this as an excuse would be to nullify the enactment requiring notice, and no literature is required to get a letter sent to the employer, stating, as the Act says, "in ordinary language," the cause of the injury and the date at which it was sustained.

Again, the statement that a fatal result of the injury was not apprehended, if it has any significance, is merely a criticism on the statute, which prescribes the same period for notice, whether the man lives and himself sues, or dies and some relative sues.

Holding, as I do, that the action cannot be maintained by reason of the absence of any averment of reasonable excuse for the want of the statutory notice, I find no occasion to consider the more difficult question decided by the Sheriff-substitute. I am for recalling his interlocutor and dismissing the action.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—Your Lordships are all of opinion that the injury referred to in the statute means, not the injury which the pursuer has sustained, but the injury which the deceased person has sustained.

The result of that view would seem to be that, wherever the person who was mortally injured survives the period allowed for notice, it would be impossible to give the notice required by the statute. It may be that in such a case the Court would hold that there was a reasonable excuse if notice of action had been given by the deceased within the prescribed time. But supposing that the deceased had not given notice, is the father to lose his right of action? I should have thought that in the case supposed, as it would be impossible for the father to give notice of the death of his son within the time required by the statute, the fact that the son had survived the period of notice, and that the right of action did not arise until after the expiration of the period of notice, was in itself a reasonable excuse, and that the same principle would apply to the case of the death of the injured party while the period of notice was running. But I cannot say that I hold this opinion with any confidence after the view taken by your Lordships, and I do not desire to dissent from the decision. The difficulty is, that the right of action which the father has for the death of his son is a different right of action from that which the son had himself during the period of his survival. The father's right only arose on the death of his son. He might not

No. 57. be able to give the notice which is required by the statute, if the statute be strictly interpreted as is proposed.
 Jan. 16, 1897. M'Fadyen v. Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited. LORD KINNEAR concurred with the LORD PRESIDENT.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the action.

PATRICK & JAMES, S.S.C.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58. MRS MARGARET WATSON OR WATT, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Salvesen
 —Findlay.
 Jan. 16, 1897. DANIEL MACNEIL WATSON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—
 Watt v. Watson. Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Ure—Crabb Watt.

Trust—Trust-deed by a woman before marriage for behoof of spouses in liferent and children in fee—Revocation—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21).—By a deed executed on the day before her marriage to J. W., a woman, sui juris,—on the narrative that “there is a purpose of marriage between J. W. and me, and that in contemplation thereof, and as a provision for myself and for my intended spouse, and the issue, if any, of the said intended marriage, I have of even date assigned” certain securities, “and I have resolved to transfer” certain funds,—assigned and transferred certain funds to trustees, the whole to be held by them in trust; “(second) for payment to me during my life, on my own separate receipt and discharge, and after my death to the said J. W., if he shall survive me,” of the annual income of the trust-estate “for the liferent use allenarly of me and him respectively”; “(third) after the death of the survivor of me and the said J. W., for behoof of the child or children of the intended marriage, in fee,” with power to the trustees even during the subsistence of the liferents to apply part of the capital for the maintenance and education of children in minority; “(fourth) in the event of the death of the said J. W., survived by me, without any child or children . . . the trustees shall pay over the trust-estate to me absolutely for my own behoof; (fifth) in the event of the said J. W. surviving me, and of there being no child or children . . . the trustees shall” on J. W.’s death pay over the trust-estate “to my own nearest of kin.”

In an action brought by the wife, with the consent of the husband, a year after the marriage, there being no children, for declarator that the deed was revocable by her, held (by a majority of seven Judges, diss. Lord Moncreiff, and rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the deed was revocable by the wife, with consent of her husband, in respect that it was unilateral and executed without reference to any contract of marriage, and that there were no beneficiaries in existence other than the spouses.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that the law as to the revocability after marriage of a wife's voluntary trust-deed, executed by her prior to marriage, had not been altered by the Married Women's Property Act, 1881.

1st Division, with three consulted Judges. Ld Stormonth-Darling. ON 17th July 1895 Mrs Margaret Watson or Watt, with consent of her husband, John Kennedy Watt, produce-merchant, Glasgow, raised an action against Daniel Macneil Watson and others, trustees under a deed of provision and trust executed by the pursuer in contemplation of marriage on 21st August 1894 for reduction of said deed, and alternatively for declarator that the deed was revocable by her, at least with her husband's consent, and that she was entitled to revoke it accordingly, and further that the trustees were bound to reinvest her in the estate so conveyed to them, and to execute all deeds necessary for completing her title thereto.

No. 58.

The deed in question was executed by the female pursuer on the day preceding her marriage, and provided as follows:—"Considering that there is a purpose of marriage between John Kennedy Watt, produce-merchant, Glasgow, and me, and that in contemplation thereof, and as a provision for myself and my said intended spouse, and the issue, if any, of the said intended marriage, I have of even date herewith transferred to the persons after named and designed," £947 Glasgow Corporation Stock: "And I have resolved to transfer my right and interest in the estate of my father, the deceased John Watson, stationer, Glasgow, to the extent after specified, and also the sum of money contained in the deposit-receipt after mentioned, to be held upon the trusts after specified: Therefore I do hereby assign and transfer to and in favour of Daniel Macneil Watt" and others, "as trustees and trustee for the purposes after mentioned, All and Whole the sum of £117, 10s. 9d., and forming part of" the granter's interest in her father's estate: "And also All and Whole the deposit-receipt by the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Glasgow, for the sum of £35, 9s. 3d., dated the 12th day of May 1894: But these presents and the said transfers of the said Glasgow Corporation stocks are granted in trust, and the said trust-estate shall be held, for the following purposes, viz.,—(First) For payment of the expenses of executing this trust: (Second) For payment to me during my life, on my own separate receipt and discharge, and after my death to the said John Kennedy Watt, if he shall survive me, of the free annual income or revenue of the said trust-estate for the liferent use alienably of me and him respectively; declaring that the said income shall not be affectable by the debts and deeds of either of me and the said John Kennedy Watt or the diligence of our creditors: (Third) After the death of the survivor of me and the said John Kennedy Watt, for behoof of the child or children of the intended marriage, in fee," divisible "in such manner as I shall appoint by any writing under my hand; and in case of no such appointment, for the said children equally, share and share alike; and unless otherwise directed, the trustees shall pay and convey to the said children their respective shares of the said trust-funds and estate on the youngest child attaining majority; and until that event the trustees shall apply the income towards the maintenance and education of such of the children as are in minority and unable to support themselves; with power to the trustees for that purpose to apply such part of the capital as they may deem necessary, and that even during the subsistence of the foresaid liferents; declaring that the above provisions in favour of children shall not become vested interests until the period of payment above mentioned . . . (Fourth) In the event of the death of the said John Kennedy Watt, survived by me, without any child or children, or the issue of a child or children, of the said intended marriage, or on the death of all of such children without any interest in the trust-estate having vested in any of them, the trustees shall pay over the trust-estate to me absolutely for my own behoof: (Fifth) In the event of the said John Kennedy Watt surviving me, and of there being no child or children, or the issue of a child or children, of the said intended marriage, or on the death of all such children without interest in the trust-estate having vested in any of them, the trustees shall on the death of the said John Kennedy Watt hold the trust-estate for, and shall pay over the same to, my own nearest of kin."

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

The conclusion for reduction was founded on averments of essential error, but it is unnecessary for the purposes of the present report to refer further to them.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) On a sound construction of the said deed, it is revocable by the pursuer the said Mrs Margaret Watson or Watt at will, and she is entitled to decree as craved.

The defenders pleaded ;—(5) The said deed having been delivered and acted upon is irrevocable. (6) In any event the defenders cannot denude without the authority of the Court, and are entitled to the expenses of defending the action.

On 4th March 1896 the Lord Ordinary, after a proof upon the question of essential error, sustained the defences, and in respect thereof assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The purpose of this action is to get rid of a trust-deed which the pursuer Mrs Watt executed on 21st August 1894, the day before her marriage, and she proposes to effect this either by having it declared that the deed is in its own nature revocable, or by reducing it on the ground that she granted it under essential error as to its import and effect.

"On the second of these grounds I allowed a proof. The record contains plentiful averments that Mrs Watt was induced to grant the deed by misrepresentation and concealment on the part of her brother and the family agent, who led her (she says) to believe that it was intended merely for the management of her estate, and that it would not prevent her from resuming possession of her estate at any time she chose. The result of the proof is, in my opinion, entirely to disprove these allegations. (His Lordship then considered the evidence.)

"The second question is whether the deed is in its own nature revocable. I am of opinion that it is not.

"I do not found that opinion upon the fact that the trustees hold the fee for the children of the marriage, because, as yet at least, there are none. The case does not therefore fall within the category of which Shedden v. Wilson, Nov. 29, 1895, 23 R. 228, is the latest example.

"The principle which seems to me to bar revocation is that to which effect was given in the leading case of Menzies v. Murray, 2 R. 507, the principle, namely, that stante matrimonio a wife has no power to alienate or diminish the rights secured to her by an antenuptial trust made in contemplation of marriage. It was argued that this principle had been rendered obsolete by the statutory exclusion of the jus mariti. It might be enough to reply that Menzies v. Murray was followed by the Second Division only a few weeks ago in the case of Ker's Trustees v. Ker, 23 R. 317. But the truth is, that the argument involves an entire misapprehension of the principle of Menzies' case, which is to protect the wife, not against the diligence of the husband's creditors, but (to use the words of Lord Deas) 'against marital influence on the one hand and self-sacrifice on the other.' It is precisely where there is an exclusion of the jus mariti that this kind of danger arises.

"I am quite aware that the trust in Menzies v. Murray, which the wife was held not entitled to bring to an end, even with the consent of all the beneficiaries, was a trust created by antenuptial contract. But I am unable to see that there is any difference in principle, so far as this question is concerned, between a trust so created and a trust set up by the wife herself in a unilateral deed made intuitu matrimonii. What Mrs Murray proposed to give up was not her marriage-contract provisions, but the trust which secured them, and that was a trust entirely of her own creation. The husband had no part in creating it, for he placed nothing under it. His

The pursuer reclaimed, and on 14th November the cause was appointed to be argued before seven Judges. No. 58.

Argued for the pursuer;—The deed was revocable. (1) It was not expressly declared to be irrevocable. (2) The liferent was not declared to be alimentary, and the liferenter was not sufficiently protected against creditors.¹ No one could by a unilateral deed put his estate beyond the reach of his creditors.² (3) No children had been born of the marriage, and therefore there was no jus quæsitum in anyone.³ The case of *Murison v. Dick*⁴ was conclusive in favour of the pursuer's right to revoke. The Lord Ordinary had distinguished that case from the present on the ground that the deed was there revoked before the marriage. That distinction, however, made no difference, for it could not be contended that the marriage here had taken place on the faith of the deed, or that the deed had been truly executed in contemplation of the marriage.⁵

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

accession to the deed, therefore, while it made the provisions contractual, and therefore onerous, added nothing to the sanctity of the trust.

“The force and subsistence of such deeds’ (i.e., antenuptial protective deeds), says Lord Gifford in 5 R., p. 1039, ‘do not flow from the consent of the intended husband, although such consent is usually adhibited. They draw their real efficacy, and their real strength and finality, from the will of the person who dedicates the trust fund, and if this be the intended wife herself, then it is her act, and not the act of her intended husband, which places the fund beyond even her own power while she remains under coverture.’

“It would be absurd to say that every kind of trust-deed executed by a wife before marriage is rendered irrevocable by the bare fact of marriage supervening. The deed might be merely administrative or merely testamentary. To become irrevocable on the principle of Menzies v. Murray it must have been made in contemplation of marriage, and must contain provisions for the wife's own protection. Here these conditions are satisfied. The deed declares that it is granted in contemplation of the pursuer's marriage with Mr Watt, and as a provision for herself and him, and the issue, if any. It secures the pursuer's liferent, present and prospective. In so far as its provisions are properly matrimonial provisions, it must therefore stand. In so far as it merely provides for the destination of the estate to third parties after the death of the spouses without leaving issue, it is testamentary, and therefore revocable.

“The cases relied on by the pursuer seem to me inapplicable. In Murison v. Dick, 16 D. 529, the deed was revoked before marriage, while the granter was still mistress of her own fortune. In Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, 5 R. 1027, the lady was only allowed to revoke an antenuptial trust-deed on executing a postnuptial contract approved of by the Court, and even this limited kind of revocation might not have been permitted if the antenuptial deed had been held to have been granted in contemplation of marriage. But the Lord Justice-Clerk (without whom there would not have been a majority in the Inner-House) characterised the deed as not executed in contemplation of marriage, and as nothing but a voluntary interdiction, intended to protect the granter against her own extravagance. Lord Young in the Outer-House seems to have taken very much the same view.”

¹ Rogerson, &c., v. Rogerson's Trustee, Nov. 6, 1885, 13 R. 154.

² Corbet, &c., v. Waddell, &c., Nov. 13, 1879, 7 R. 200.

³ Mackenzie, &c., v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027, Lord Ormisdale, p. 1035, Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff), 1041.

⁴ Murison v. Dick, Feb. 10, 1854, 16 D. 529, 26 Scot. Jur. 239.

⁵ Mackenzie, &c., v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027, Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff), p. 1041.

No. 58. *Menzies v. Murray*¹ had no application, the deed in it being a bilateral marriage-contract with a strictly alimentary liferent. *Williamson v. Boothby*² dealt with a marriage-contract in the strict sense of the term, which the deed in the present case was not. In any event, since the passing of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, (44 and 45 Vict. c. 21), the reasons which existed for protecting a wife, and for refusing to allow her to revoke, at a time when by operation of law her moveable estate passed upon her marriage to her husband, had ceased to exist.

Argued for the defenders;—The deed was irrevocable. The case of *Anderson v. Buchanan*³ was the first of a series of cases which decided that where a wife by antenuptial contract secures to herself a liferent provision, she is not entitled to revoke the deed, even although she has not declared that liferent to be alimentary, and although there is no other interest in existence. No doubt in that case the deed was expressly declared to be ~~irrevocable~~, and two of the Judges⁴ who formed the majority of the Court rested their opinions on the clause which so declared it, but as Lord Neaves pointed out in the case of Pringle v. Anderson,⁵ the true ground of judgment in the case was that the law ought not to refuse to the wife the power to protect herself against her husband, who was her administrator-in-law. The principle was again affirmed in Menzies v. Murray,⁶ and *Standard Property Investment Company v. Cowe, &c.*⁷ and the latest case of *Ker's Trustees v. Ker*⁸ was a very strong one for the defenders, because the deed there was not declared to be irrevocable, the children interested were consenting parties to revocation, and the case was subsequent to the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. The principle contended for by the defenders was strongly asserted by Lord Gifford in Mackenzie v. Mackenzie,⁹ relied upon by the pursuer, and it was to be observed that the Lord Justice-Clerk's ground of judgment was that the deed was not truly executed in contemplation of marriage, and apparently no weight was attached by the Court to the fact that the deed was unilateral. Assuming that it was essential to irrevocability that there should be a clause declaring the liferent alimentary, then the clause protecting it from creditors was a sufficient equivalent.¹⁰ The result of the above authorities was that in order to the irrevocability of such a deed (1) it must be executed in immediate contemplation of marriage, and for the purposes of the marriage; (2)

¹ Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 R. 507.

² Williamson v. Boothby, June 11, 1890, 17 R. 927.

³ Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073, 9 Scot. Jur. 509.

⁴ Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073, per Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Medwyn, p. 1086.

⁵ Pringle v. Anderson, July 3, 1868, 6 Macph. 982, per Lord Neaves, 991, 40 Scot. Jur. 563.

⁶ Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 R. 507.

⁷ Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c., March 20, 1877, 4 R. 695.

⁸ Ker's Trustees v. Ker, Dec. 13, 1895, 23 R. 317.

⁹ Mackenzie, &c. v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027, Lord Gifford, 1036, Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff), 1041.

¹⁰ Irvine v. McLaren, Jan. 24, 1829, 7 S. 317, Lord Glenlee, 318; Martin v. Bannatyne, &c., March 8, 1861, 23 D. 705, Lord Neaves, 707, Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis), pp. 708 and 709.

marriage should follow upon it, and (3) the deed should be delivered and the funds handed to the trustees.¹ These elements all existed here.

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

At advising on 12th January 1897,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this action, Mrs Watt, with her husband's consent, concludes first for reduction on extrinsic grounds of a deed of trust which she executed on the day preceding her marriage, and alternatively for a decree declaring that the trust is revocable. The second conclusion was alone referred to the Court of seven Judges, and it is this branch of the case on which we are now to give judgment. I shall therefore leave out of view all considerations founded on the facts which have been the subject of proof, and consider only the legal effect of Mrs Watt's deed as a settlement of her estate.

The trust-deed is dated 21st April 1894, and it begins with the following narrative:—"Considering that there is a purpose of marriage between John Kennedy Watt, produce merchant, Glasgow, and me, and that in contemplation thereof, and as a provision for myself and my said intended spouse, and the issue, if any, of the said intended marriage, I have of even date hereof transferred to the persons after named" (the trustees of the settlement) certain stocks, also the truster's interest in the estate of her father, and a sum of money in bank. The deed then conveys these securities to the trustees in trust for payment of their expenses, and thereafter for payment of the income of the trust-funds to Mrs Watt for life, and to her intended husband, if he should survive her, for life, excluding assignment and the diligence of creditors. The trustees are directed to hold the fee for the child or children of the marriage, whom failing as mentioned in the deed. The deed was therefore executed in contemplation of marriage, and the purposes are such as are not unusual in contracts of marriage, but the husband was not a party to the deed, and it must be taken to have been executed without his consent. Also, as the husband gave nothing, and came under no pecuniary obligation on the occasion of the marriage, the elements of mutual consideration and contract are absent. If the deed be irrevocable, this result must depend on the mere fact that the execution of the deed was followed by marriage.

It is of course indisputable that an effective settlement may be made in the form of a contract of marriage containing a trust of the wife's estate for the spouses in liferent and the issue of the marriage in fee. Under such a deed it is recognised that the trustees are protectors of the interests of the wife and children. Their title is preferable to that of any donee to whom the wife may attempt to convey the estate in derogation of the trust, and to that of the wife herself should she attempt to revoke the trust. The main purpose of such deeds—the protection of the wife against her own voluntary acts during the marriage—is carried out in England and Scotland by means of a trust, and while there are differences of form and expression in the English and Scottish trusts, as was pointed out by Lord Cottenham in Rennie v. Ritchie,¹ there is, I think, substantial identity in the main ¹ Fraser on Husband and Wife, pp. 1489 et seq.; Rennie v. Ritchie, April 25, 1845, 4 Bell's Appeals, 221, per Lord Cottenham, 244 et seq.

No. 58. elements, which are, first, the consent of the spouses, and, secondly, the withdrawal of the estate from their control by the interposition of a trust. I notice in passing that a contract of marriage may incidentally dispose of estate which the spouses do not desire to settle, and the disposal of which is not a term of the treaty of marriage. This was the ground of decision in Ramsay's case,¹ and if the judgment in that case has any bearing on the case before us, it only proves that the mere execution of a trust conveyance upon marriage does not of itself amount to an irrevocable settlement if the element of contract is wanting.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

Before considering the effect of the series of cases ending in *Menzies v. Murray*² with reference to their bearing on the present question, it may be proper to notice that this question could not well have arisen before the year 1881, when the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act came into operation. Until that time the jus mariti was in full vigour; and by what has been termed the assignation of marriage the wife's personal estate and the income of her heritable estate passed to the husband. I think it is consistent with all the authorities that the husband could not be deprived of these rights except by his own consent. It is hardly necessary to elaborate this point, which indeed has only an indirect bearing on the matter in issue, but I may be permitted to refer to a passage in Erskine's Institute (i. 6, 14) which has been judicially approved. In this statement of the law the learned author begins by referring to the erroneous opinions of previous writers, including Lord Stair, who held that the husband's renunciation of his rights fell itself under the jus mariti as a moveable right conceived in favour of the wife; and then he proceeds,—“This doctrine, which springs from a mere subtlety, is irreconcilable to that bona fides which ought to prevail in marriage-contracts, and indeed to common sense; for all rights not inalienable may be renounced by those entitled to them, and the husband's right of administering his wife's moveable estate, is not accounted by the law of any other country so essential to him but that he may divest himself of it.” In the important case of M'Dougall v. City of Glasgow Bank,³ relating to the effect of an exclusion of the husband's rights in relation to acquirenda, this passage is cited by Lord Mure and the Lord President as being a correct statement of the law and the principle on which it is founded; and if, as Mr Erskine states, and this Court has found, the exclusion of the jus mariti in relation to wife's estate depends on the husband's renunciation, it is impossible to maintain that, in the state of the law which existed prior to 1881, an unmarried woman could, by putting her moveable estate under trust, prevent it from falling under her husband's dominion upon her supervening marriage. I am not here considering the effect of the exclusion of the jus mariti from property coming to the wife by will or gift, which depends on different principles, but I think it is clear on the authorities that the husband was a necessary party to a deed in contemplation of marriage which was intended to exclude or restrict his rights in relation to the wife's estate.

Accordingly, in the two cases, in which the effect of the wife's unilateral deed was considered, the deed was held to be revocable; I refer to the cases of *Murison*¹ and Mackenzie.² It is true that other elements entered into the decision of these cases, the judgments being rested largely on a consideration of the circumstances in which the deeds were granted, and, as I think, also on the ground that in the particular cases the trust was a purely voluntary conveyance for the benefit of the lady herself, a conveyance which could not and did not divest her of the right of resuming the administration of her estate. But the cases are at least illustrations of the principle that the wife's estate cannot be tied up during the subsistence of a marriage by a deed to which the husband is not a party. No. 58.

¹ 10 Macph. 120.

² 2 R. 507.

³ 6 R. 1089.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

Passing to the cases in which trust-conveyances of the wife's estate have been held effectual and irrevocable, I observe that in every one of these cases, from *Anderson v. Buchanan*³ to Menzies v. Murray,⁴ the trust was contained in or executed with reference to an antenuptial contract of marriage. In these cases it was not necessary to consider the element of the husband's consent, because it was common ground that the mere exclusion of the jus mariti by contract would not prevent the spouses from disposing of the estate by their joint act. The question in these cases related to the measure of the higher protection which might be given by means of a trust. But I observe that in the reported opinions of the Court of seven Judges who advised Menzies v. Murray,⁴ all the Judges are at pains to state that their opinions are given with reference to a trust constituted by antenuptial contract of marriage. I do not think that in fair construction any of the opinions there given as to the inviolable nature of a trust so constituted can be extended so as to cover the case of a trust constituted by the act of the wife alone. It may be that in these opinions the principle of contract is made to support consequences which do not directly flow from it, because the effect of the decision is that a trust constituted by matrimonial contract cannot be revoked by the same authority which created it. But this effect has been given to matrimonial contracts for reasons of social expediency, and when it is remembered that by the law of Scotland a married woman is incapable of undertaking a personal obligation, it can hardly be said to be a very anomalous rule, that a settlement of property which is made a term of the treaty of marriage should be as indissoluble as the marriage itself. But if it should be thought that in Menzies v. Murray,⁴ and the cases which preceded it, the Court took a step in the direction of protecting the wife against herself, which it is difficult to refer to the combined effect of contract and trust, or to justify in principle, this criticism would not furnish a valid reason for extending the rule to cases to which it has not hitherto been applied. And again, if we are to treat the case of a trust contained in an antenuptial contract as a case governed by an arbitrary rule founded on custom and convenience, the result would seem to be the same, because the means of securing the wife's interest are known and settled, and no sufficient reason can be given for reopening the question.

I think I can find indications of the view which I now express in the opinions of the Judges constituting the majority in the case of Mackenzie.² It is, at least, clear that they considered the decision in *Menzies v. Murray*⁴ to be inapplicable to the case of a voluntary trust.

¹ 16 D. 529.² 5 R. 1027.³ 15 S. 1073.⁴ 2 R. 507.

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

I come then to the conclusion that, if this case were to be decided according to the law existing prior to 1881, the decision must be that the trust was revocable before marriage, and that its character was not altered by the supervening marriage, because the trust-conveyance was not a term of the contract or treaty of marriage. I must add that, in my opinion, the Act of 1881 leaves this question unaffected.

It is right to notice in this connection that while the Married Women's Property Act deprives the husband of the administration of the wife's estate during the subsistence of the marriage, it leaves him in possession of important rights at the dissolution of the marriage, and it does not take away the curatorial power.

Now, in the deed under consideration, the husband is to get a life interest of the estate in case of his survival, a right which may not be so valuable as the right secured to him by the statute. This consideration, however, is not conclusive, because it may be said that in so far as the deed is prejudicial to the husband's interests he is not bound by it, and that it will be open to him to claim his jus relictii if he survives. Accordingly, I do not base my opinion upon anything in the terms or provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, except that I keep in view that the effect of marriage-contracts is saved by the 8th section of the Act.

I look at the question rather in this light: If the views which I have expressed be well founded, the operation of the common law on the estates of married women was liable to be modified or completely excluded by the device of a trust-conveyance executed before marriage, containing clauses effectual for the protection of the wife's interest, and especially for restricting her interest to a usufruct during the subsistence of the marriage. But this object could only be accomplished by a marriage-contract or equivalent deed to which the husband was a party. In this way the rights of both spouses were reconciled. The wife's estate was protected; the husband's legitimate interests were not interfered with, because he was a party to the deed, and the settlement was deemed irrevocable stans matrimonio, because it was recognised that during marriage the powers of the wife to enter into a new contract were suspended. The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, preserved the then existing law in relation to settlements of the wife's estate by marriage-contract, but gave no new right. It follows, in my opinion, that an effectual trust of the wife's estate can only be made under the conditions which existed prior to 1881, and one of these conditions is, that the future husband must be a party to the deed. There is no reason to suppose that any change in this respect was within the scope of the Married Women's Property Act. If it had been I should have expected to find the change clearly expressed in that measure. While I venture to think that it is beyond the powers of the Court to sanction an alteration of the conditions of an effectual trust of the wife's estate, I should not be disposed to exercise the power if we had it, because I think that the project of tying up the wife's estate by a deed not communicated to her intended husband would not be conducive to the peace of families, and would not be consistent with the confidence that ought to subsist between persons who are entering into the relation of marriage.

I may observe in conclusion that our decision will not necessarily affect any question that may arise in other cases as to the rights of children under a unilateral trust-deed. The condition of the present case is that there are no beneficiaries in existence other than the spouses, and in these circumstances, I think that Mrs Watt has an unqualified right to revoke the deed of trust. It might be otherwise if there were children born before the power of revocation was exercised.

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the question presented to us for determination is attended with difficulty, but I have come to be of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to succeed. I shall state briefly the grounds on which I have arrived at that conclusion.

I take it to be settled on authority that a married woman cannot stans matrimonio discharge or revoke any provision made in her favour by her antenuptial marriage-contract. Accordingly, if the deed in question came within that rule, the defenders would be entitled to a judgment. They say it does. They do not maintain that the deed in question is an antenuptial contract, for that it plainly is not. It is not a contract, compact, or agreement at all; it is a unilateral deed, imposing obligation on no one except upon the granter, if indeed upon her. But the defenders say that the deed under consideration is equivalent, in material respects, to a marriage-contract, and that its effect, so far at least as its revocability is concerned, is the same. They therefore maintain that the rule I have referred to should be here applied. With regard to that rule, I shall only now say that I feel bound to follow it, in respect of the authority by which it has been settled, but that I am not prepared to extend the limits of its application. If the deed in question, then, is to be regarded as equivalent to a marriage-contract it is not, according to the authorities, revocable by the pursuer; if it is not to be so regarded, then its revocability will depend on considerations as to the character and effect of the deed, taken along with the circumstances under which it was executed.

The defenders argue that the deed in question must be regarded as equivalent to an antenuptial contract of marriage, because (1) it was executed in anticipation or contemplation of marriage; (2) that it constitutes a trust; and (3) that the purposes of the trust are matrimonial purposes. These are said to be the essential features of an antenuptial contract of marriage, and it is further said that the deed in question possesses or presents the whole three. Now, does it?

The deed in question undoubtedly proceeds upon the narrative that there is a purpose of marriage between the pursuer and her husband, and "that in contemplation thereof" she has executed the deed. The language so far is similar with that usually employed in the narrative of an antenuptial contract of marriage. But it is not the same. An antenuptial contract of marriage sets out that the parties to it have agreed to marry, and in prospect of that agreement being carried out have resolved upon certain conditions, which it is the purpose of the antenuptial contract to express. The conditions are almost invariably conditions mutually binding, but whether so or not, are the conditions on which the marriage has been agreed to, and on the faith of which the marriage is to be solemnised. Here it is different. The deed sets out no contract or agreement to marry, but

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897
Watt v.
Watson.

merely that there is a purpose of marriage, in contemplation of which the granter of the deed makes a certain disposition of her estate. The proposed or contemplated marriage is not conditional on her granting such a deed; the non-execution of it would not have prevented the marriage, which had been agreed to unconditionally. The marriage followed the execution of the deed in point of time; it did not follow on the faith of the deed. But I do not think this difference in the narrative of the deeds of very great importance, because it is not the narrative of a deed so much as its substantive provisions which give it its character. The narrative expresses the reason or inducing cause of granting, nothing more. For example, a man might on the narrative of his failing health, or of his labouring under a fatal disease, and in view of his approaching death, dispose to his son a certain property or estate. But, notwithstanding such a narrative, if the deed was a conveyance per verba de presenti duly delivered it would not be in the technical sense a mortis causa deed. So here, the narrative that the deed was granted in contemplation of marriage would not, of itself, make it a marriage-contract, or equivalent to a marriage-contract, unless its provisions otherwise gave it that character.

The second ground on which the defenders maintain that this deed is equivalent to an antenuptial contract of marriage is that it constitutes a trust for carrying out its purposes. In this, no doubt, it resembles a marriage-contract, but not more than it resembles a trust-settlement. The mere constitution of a trust in itself is plainly of no importance in this question. The purposes for which the trust was constituted are important and must be considered, and this leads me to the defenders' third point. They say that the purposes of this deed were matrimonial purposes. Briefly stated, the purposes of this deed were as follows:—(1) That the income of the estate conveyed should, during her lifetime, be paid to the granter (the pursuer) on her own separate receipt and discharge; (2) on her death, the income of the estate to be paid to her husband, if he survived; (3) on the death of both, the fee to be divided among their children; and (4) failing children, the estate to go to the granter's own heirs. The only one of these purposes which could possibly be carried out, during the existence of the marriage, was the first. It was not matrimonial. To give the granter of the deed the income of her own estate "on her own separate receipt" was simply giving her what she had before; it was making no change in respect of the marriage. If the income of the estate had been directed to be paid to the spouses in aid of the oneris matrimonii, that might have been described as a matrimonial purpose—a dedication of the granter's means to a matrimonial purpose. But where is the matrimonial purpose in dedicating the granter's means to herself to do with them what she pleases, just as she did when there was no matrimonial relation existing? In like manner, the grant of the income to the surviving husband is not to enable him to educate or maintain the family, or for any purpose properly matrimonial. It is simply a legacy to himself, after the marriage has been dissolved, and when no matrimonial purpose could be served. The destination of the fee to the children, and failing them to the granter's heirs, being the act of the pursuer alone, and not a condition binding on her by contract with her husband, I regard as testamentary and not matrimonial.

If I am right so far, it follows that this deed not being an antenuptial contract of marriage, or equivalent to such a contract, the question of whether it is revocable or not is not foreclosed by the authority to which I referred at the outset of my opinion.

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

I think the deed in question is revocable, because it was a conveyance in trust for the administration or management of the grantor's estate for her own behoof, and by the execution and delivery of which no right was constituted which forms a bar to the revocation of that deed by the grantor, in whom, notwithstanding of the execution and delivery of the deed, the radical right to the estate conveyed still remained vested. If, by the execution and delivery of the deed, a jus quesitum tertio had been conferred, the pursuer could not have revoked or recalled her conveyance standing such a right. But I think there is no such right in question. The conveyance of the fee of the estate to be held for the children of the marriage is not such a right, for there are no children of the marriage. Even if there had been, I should have had difficulty in holding that under this deed there was anything more conferred on them than a mere spes. But there are no children, and therefore as regards the fee there is no jus quesitum. The husband's right to the liferent after his wife's death may be in a different position (I do not say it is), but if it is, it does not bar the revocation of the deed, as he is a consenter to that being done, and his right to renounce or discharge such a liferent right is not disputed.

I think therefore that the pursuer is entitled to our judgment.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I regret to differ from the view which all of your Lordships take of this case, but at the conclusion of the argument it seemed to me that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was well founded, and further consideration has not altered that opinion.

We are not called upon to consider whether the deed of provision and trust which was executed by Mrs Watt on the eve of her marriage is reducible on the head of essential error or force and fear, or on the ground (which is not pleaded on record) that it was executed in fraud of the husband's rights. There is no question with creditors; and the one question upon which our opinion is asked is that raised by the pursuer's first plea in law, viz., whether the deed is revocable by Mrs Watt at will. These being the admitted conditions of the argument, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary, and substantially for the same reasons, that the deed cannot be revoked stante matrimonio.

Whatever may be thought of the original soundness of the decision in Anderson v. Buchanan,¹ I do not think that the authority of that case can now be disputed. It has never been successfully impugned, and it has been followed in a series of cases, the latest of which is Ker's Trustees v. Ker.²

But it is said that *Anderson v. Buchanan*¹ ran counter to the well-established rule of law that a voluntary and gratuitous trust, the sole interest in which is or comes to be vested in one individual, and by which no separate and independent interests are created, can at any time be put an end to at the desire of that individual; that it is not desirable that the principle of

¹ 15 S. 1073.

² 23 R. 317.

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

*Anderson v. Buchanan*¹ should be further extended; and that therefore, while it must receive effect where the provisions for the wife's benefit sought to be revoked are contained in an antenuptial marriage-contract, it should not be applied to a unilateral trust-deed. This assumes that, as regards the irrevocability of a trust created by a wife solely for her own benefit and protection, there is a distinction between a trust contained in a marriage-contract and one created by unilateral deed. In my opinion there is no such distinction, and the decided cases give no countenance to any such distinction.

In considering this question it is desirable to extract from the decisions what matters have or have not been held material in deciding as to the irrevocability of an antenuptial trust. I think that the cases when examined establish the proposition maintained by the defenders' counsel that the only elements that are required in order to render such a trust irrevocable are—(1) that it should be executed in immediate contemplation of marriage, and for the purposes of the marriage; (2) that marriage shall follow upon it; and (3) that the deed shall be delivered and the funds handed to the trustees.

All these requisites exist in the present case, and they will be found to have been combined in all the cases in which a trust has been held irrevocable,—for instance, in Anderson v. Buchanan,¹ Menzies v. Murray,² Pringle v. Anderson,³ Williamson v. Boothby,⁴ Ker's Trustees v. Ker,⁵ and other cases.

Again, in those cases in which revocation has been allowed, it will be found that one at least of these elements was wanting. For instance, in Murison v. Dick,⁶ although the deed, which was unilateral, was executed in contemplation of marriage and delivered, it was revoked before the marriage took place, and while the lady was mistress of her own fortune.

In Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees,⁷ although the provision in question was contained in an antenuptial contract of marriage, and marriage followed, it appeared from the terms of the deed that it was intended that the residue of the wife's property (as distinguished from a sum of £5000 settled for the purposes of the marriage) should be at the wife's disposal both during the subsistence of the marriage and after its dissolution—in short, that quoad the residue the trust was one for management or administration only. I observe in passing that in that case the fact that the provision as to residue was contained in a marriage-contract to which the husband was a party did not prevent revocation. What was considered material was not the character of the deed, but the nature of the provision.

In the next place there are certain matters which have been held to be immaterial. In order to render a trust irrevocable it is not necessary that the funds should come from a third party. In *Anderson v. Buchanan*¹ and Menzies v. Murray,² and other cases, the funds came from the wife herself.

Neither is it necessary that a jus quesitum should be conferred by the deed on a third party. This question was fully before the Court in

¹ 15 S. 1073.² 2 R. 507.³ 6 Macph. 982.⁴ 17 R. 927.⁵ 23 R. 317.⁶ 16 D. 529.⁷ 10 Macph. 120.

Anderson v. Buchanan.¹ The Judges who formed the minority laid special stress upon the absence of ulterior interests. I refer particularly to the opinions of Lord Moncreiff and Lord Fullerton, 15 S. 1080, 1081. Notwithstanding the opinions of those eminent Judges the majority of the Court decided that the trust could not be revoked, although the only interests affected were those of Mrs Anderson herself, for whose individual benefit alone the provisions were made. No. 58.
Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

Lastly, although most of the decisions to which we were referred apply to trusts created by marriage-contract, I do not find that, whichever way they were decided, anything turned upon the fact that the provisions were contained in a contract and not in a unilateral deed.

The pursuers naturally rely upon the absence of decisions in which a unilateral deed has been held to be irrevocable, and they found upon two cases in which such deeds were held to be revocable. The first is Murison v. Dick,² the ratio of which decision I have already explained, viz., that the trust was revoked before marriage, while the lady was still sui juris.

The second is ~~Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees~~.³ If that case were an authority in the pursuer's favour it would be of importance, because the deed which the Court held that the pursuers were entitled to revoke was unilateral, and marriage had followed upon it. But the case cannot be so regarded. Of the three Judges who took part in the decision in the Inner-House Lord Gifford dissented, and Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, while he concurred in the judgment, did so solely and expressly on the ground that in his opinion the deed was not executed in immediate contemplation of marriage, and was thus distinguishable from *Anderson v. Buchanan*¹ and Menzies v. Murray,⁴ and other cases. Lord Ormisdale seems to have been partly influenced in his opinion by the fact that the spouses were willing to execute a postnuptial contract, and Lord Young also proceeded mainly on that ground, and expressed no opinion as to the wife's right to revoke absolutely.

It is not necessary to consider here whether it is within the powers of the Court to remodel such a deed; that is not proposed by the pursuers. I think I have said enough to shew that Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees,³ when the grounds of judgment are examined, is not an authority in the pursuer's favour.

I have already pointed out that the mere fact that the trust is contained in a marriage-contract will not make it irrevocable if its provisions are not in their nature necessarily connected with the purposes of the marriage, and this indicates that the revocability of trusts created intuitu matrimonii depends upon other considerations. The provisions made by a woman in her own favour are distinct and separable whether they occur in a contract or in a unilateral deed. If the provisions are in their nature revocable, the husband's signature does not add the sanction of irrevocability, and, on the other hand, the absence of his consent will not make them revocable if in their nature they are in the circumstances irrevocable.

In the absence of express decision, I may refer to Lord Gifford's remarks

¹ 15 S. 1073.

² 5 R. 1027.

³ 16 D. 529.

⁴ 2 R. 507.

No. 58. on this point. He expressed a strong opinion that it made no difference that there a trust was constituted by a unilateral deed to which the husband was not a party. His opinion was that while the trust could undoubtedly have been revoked before marriage, marriage barred Mrs Mackenzie from revoking, because upon that occurrence she ceased to be sui juris, and then he adds the words quoted by the Lord Ordinary,—“The force and subsistence of such deeds do not flow from the consent of the intended husband, although such consent is usually adhibited. They draw their real efficacy and their real strength and finality from the will of the person who dedicates the trust fund, and if this be the intended wife herself, then it is her act, and not the act of her intended husband, which places the fund beyond even her own power while she remains under coverture.”

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

Lord Ormisdale had said,—“That Mrs Mackenzie was entitled to revoke the trust even after the marriage so long as she had no children, is also, I think, free from serious doubt.” In regard to this Lord Gifford says,—“I am of opinion that the true point when the deed now in question became irrevocable was not the existence of issue but the date of the marriage itself. Of course the existence of issue of such a marriage was highly probable, and it may strengthen the case against revocation of the trust that such issue now exists, but the deed will not become revocable because existing issue fail. It is the marriage itself that created the irrevocability, and not till the marriage be dissolved will the wife, if she survive her husband, recover the independent position which she originally held.”

I agree in the views expressed by Lord Gifford. I think that the true ground on which irrevocability rests is that after marriage the wife is not in this matter a free agent, and therefore cannot go back on the trust which, while a free agent, she created for her own protection during marriage. The unanimous decision of the Court in *Menzies v. Murray*¹ necessarily involves this. The case was decided on the assumption that all parties in any way interested in the trust funds consented to the termination of the trust; and therefore the trust was kept up solely for the protection of Mrs Murray, and against her wish.

In the present case I agree with the Lord Ordinary that where the provisions sought to be revoked are made by a woman before marriage in regard to her own funds, and solely for her own benefit and protection during marriage, the fact that the husband is not a consenting party to the deed cannot enhance the wife's right to revoke it.

I do not think that the statutory provisions for the protection of the property of married women affect the question. While the wife's separate estate remains distinct and unmixed with that of her husband, those provisions afford protection against the husband's creditors in the event of his bankruptcy. They also afford protection against the husband himself when his wife is living separate from him. But they do not afford any effectual protection to her against his solicitations and her own inclinations, when she is on good terms and living with him; and that is exactly the case for which such a trust is required.

I have said nothing as to the expediency of holding a married woman to such self-interdiction against her will, because the decisions by which I hold we are bound, and which in my opinion apply equally to marriage-contracts and unilateral deeds, are based upon and recognise the policy of such a rule. No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

But even if the question were still open, I am not satisfied that the balance of considerations is in favour of freedom to revoke. There may no doubt be individual cases in which to hold such a trust irrevocable may cause inconvenience and hardship, but this to my mind is more than compensated in the great majority of cases by the security afforded to the wife's separate estate. The alternative to holding such a trust irrevocable would be that when the intending husband did not consent there would be no means by which a woman could protect her property during marriage without conferring an indefeasible right upon third parties, which would continue even after the marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

The LORD PRESIDENT, the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR concurred with Lord M'Laren and Lord Trayner.

At advising, on 16th January, the Lord President delivered the judgment of the Court as follows:—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In terms of the opinions delivered, we recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and grant decree of declarator, in terms of the declaratory conclusions. As to the reductive conclusions, they were supported by averments that were sent to proof, but we did not find it necessary to submit that matter to the consideration of the seven Judges. As proof was allowed on that matter, and the question was fully argued, and as it involves character and conduct and furnishes an independent ground for attacking the deed, it is right that it should be known that the Court grant absolvitor from the reductive conclusions. Therefore we assoilzie from the reductive conclusions of the action. Then we declare that the deed is revocable by Mrs Watt, with the consent of her husband, and that she is entitled to revoke the said deed accordingly, and that the defenders are bound to reinvest the pursuer in her estate, and to execute all deeds that are necessary to complete her title to the estate. We find the trustees entitled to their expenses out of the trust-estate, as between agent and client, and we do not find it necessary to make any finding as regards expenses for the pursuer, since we have granted decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions. It is also proper to add that while we find that the trustees are bound to execute all necessary deeds to reinvest the pursuer in her estate, these deeds will be paid for by the pursuer.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In conformity with the opinion of a majority of the Judges present, recall the said interlocutor: Assoilzie the defenders from the reductive conclusions of the summons: Find and declare that the deed of provision and trust libelled is revocable by the pursuer, Mrs Watt, with consent of her husband; and that she is entitled to revoke the said deed accordingly; also, that the

No. 58.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Watt v.
Watson.

defenders are bound to reinvest the pursuer in the estate conveyed to them by her, and to execute all deeds necessary for the purpose of completing her title to said estate, and decern: Find the trustees, defenders, entitled to their expenses out of the trust-estate as between agent and client."

STURROCK & STURROCK, S.S.C.—J. GORDON MASON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 59.

W. M. BARKLEY & SONS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Johnston—Hunter.

Jan. 16, 1897.*
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

JOHN SIMPSON, Defender (Appellant).—Ure—A. S. D. Thomson.

Agent and Principal—Relief—Res inter alios.—Simpson, a shipping-agent in Glasgow, having been instructed by Barkley, a coal-merchant in Belfast, to charter a vessel to convey a cargo of coals from Glasgow to Belfast, the discharge to be in turn by lighters, entered into a charter-party with Paton, a shipowner, under which discharge was to be "as customary." On arrival of the ship at Belfast Paton requested Barkley to take delivery on the quay within twenty-four hours, in accordance with the custom of the port. Barkley refused, maintaining that the delivery should be by lighters in turn. The coals were then discharged and stored by Paton, who retained possession under his lien, constituted by the charter-party, for demurrage and freight. In an arbitration which followed between Barkley and Paton, it was found that Barkley ought to have taken delivery at the quay, and he was found liable in demurrage, the cost of storage, and expenses in the arbitration.

In an action by Barkley against Simpson for the loss he had sustained through these proceedings, on the ground that they had been caused by Simpson's failure to take the charter-party in terms of his instructions, held that the loss sued for had not been caused by the defender's failure to take the charter-party in terms of his instructions, but by the pursuers' actings in not taking delivery of the cargo in terms of the charter-party, and that the defender was not liable therefor.

Opinions, that, in any event, the defender would not have been liable in the expenses of the arbitration, in respect that he was not a party thereto and that the dependence of the arbitration had not been intimated to him.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN March 1895 W. M. Barkley & Sons, coal-merchants, Belfast, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against John Simpson, shipping-agent, Glasgow, for payment of the sum of £367, 7s. 6½d. The facts of the case were thus stated by Lord Trayner in his judgment:—

"The pursuers instructed the defender to charter a vessel for them to convey from Glasgow to Belfast a cargo of coals. These coals were destined for the Belfast Gas Company, as the defender knew, and his instructions were, as I think, that the charter-party of the vessel chartered should have a discharging clause requiring the vessel to discharge the coal into lighters, and in turn. The discharging clause actually inserted in the charter-party entered into between the defender and the shipowners, Messrs Paton & Hendry, Glasgow, was one by which the shipowners were taken bound to discharge "as customary." It is established that under such a clause the ship was only bound to discharge the coals at the quay, and the pursuers to take delivery in twenty-four running hours. The defender sent to the pursuers, on 30th March 1894, a copy of the charter-party he had executed for them, and they took exception at once to the terms of the discharging clause, and requested the defender to get it altered. The shipowners would not alter the contract which had been made. This, however, the defender did not intimate to the pursuers. The ship arrived at Belfast on the evening of the 4th of April. The pursuers refused to take delivery of the coal at the quay, insisting that it should be delivered into lighters in turn (and I gather there were some vessels "in turn" before the vessel in question). The ship refused to deliver except at the quay "as customary." After the twenty-four hours for discharging had expired, the shipowners landed and stored the cargo, and held the same under their lien for freight and demurrage. The cargo was afterwards sold, and realised less than the invoice price. Legal proceedings followed between the shipowners and the pursuers in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, the exact nature of which does not appear, but there parties appear to have agreed to submit their differences to arbitration, with the result that the pursuers were practically unsuccessful in their contention. The arbiter found that under the charter-party the pursuers were bound to take delivery of the coals at the quay, and found them liable to the shipowners in demurrage, the cost of landing and storing the coal, and in the expenses of the arbitration, less one-sixth of the taxed amount."

The sum of £367, 7s. 6½d. concluded for in the present action consisted of (1) £41, 1s. 3d. of freight, £14 of demurrage, £45, 7s. 3d. for discharging, carting, and storing, &c., being £102, 10s. 6d. in all; (2) £127, 14s. 2d., the expenses of the arbitration incurred to the shipowners; (3) £78, 6s. 7d. legal expenses incurred to their own solicitors; and (4) £58, 16s. 3½d. as the difference between the price realised by the sale of the coal and the contract price with the gas-works.

The pursuers averred that, contrary to their instructions to take the charter-party "for 'discharge in turn gas lighters,' the defender inserted in the charter-party the words 'as customary' without making any reference to the gas-works or the gas lighters, and by so doing has caused great loss and expense to the pursuers."

In cond. 6 the pursuers averred that in answer to their complaints that the charter-party did not contain a discharging clause into lighters, the defender had given them repeated assurances (on which they had relied) to the effect that he had informed Messrs Paton & Hendry that the cargo was for the Belfast Gas-Works, and that as it was customary for the gas-works coal to be discharged into lighters in turn, the discharging clause "as customary," contained in the charter-party, meant discharge into lighters. That in reliance on the defender's assurance they had refused to take delivery of the coal, and subsequently had entered into the arbitration proceedings.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having sustained the loss and damage condescended on through the defender's failure to comply with their instructions as above stated, they are entitled to decree as craved. (2) The defender, in entering into said charter-party with Paton & Hendry, having acted outwith his authority, is bound to relieve the pursuers of all loss and damage incurred in consequence of his having so acted.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (3) The defender never having consented to the arbitration proceedings, he should be assoilzied in so far as the conclusions of the action relate

No. 59.
Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

No. 59. thereto. (4) The pursuers having failed to take proper steps when the dispute arose as to the delivery of the cargo, the pursuers' claim, if any, should be restricted to that period.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

On 22d November 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds, on the whole case, and in law, on the evidence as now before the Court, under reference to the note annexed hereto, (1) that except as hereinafter excepted, the above losses and expenditure were caused to the pursuers though the act or neglect of the defender when acting as their agent, and that he is liable to them in repayment thereof; (2) that as regards the item of £41, 1s. 3d. for freight, that was an item which the pursuers would have been in the circumstances fairly bound to pay even had the arbitration been successful, and therefore is not one for which the defender can be held liable; (3) that as regards the item of £45, 7s. 3d., as this might have been avoided by the pursuers had they, when they offered to take delivery on the quay, accompanied their offer with an offer under protest of freight and demurrage, this item also is one for which the defender is not fairly chargeable; (4) that of the arbitration expenses, half thereof may fairly be held as attributable to the fault of the defender, being £103, 0s. 4½d.: Therefore finds that if judgment is to be given on the evidence now in Court the defender would be liable to pay to the pursuers the balance, being £177, 18s. 8d."

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry), on 29th July, adhered, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure.*

On 8th October 1896 the Sheriff-substitute refused a motion by the defender to be allowed a proof.

The defender appealed, and during the debate the parties by joint minute agreed that the documents and proof in the arbitration proceedings should be held as evidence in the cause.

It appeared that the defender had been examined as a witness in these proceedings, and had deponed that he had informed the ship-owners' clerk at the time of making the contract that the coal was destined for the Belfast Gas-Works, that the clerk denied this, and that as there was no other available evidence the arbiters had decided against the pursuers.

* "NOTE.— . . . The only question as to which I have felt difficulty is as to whether in the damages for which the defender is to be held liable there should be included the share of the arbitration expenses which the Sheriff-substitute has allowed. On consideration, however, I am not disposed to differ from him on the point. We see from the correspondence that the defender encouraged the pursuers to take up the position which they did in the arbitration, saying, for example in his letter of 6th April 1894, that he was still of opinion that the clause in the charter-party was sufficient. Again, in his reply of 14th April to the pursuers' letter of the 13th, he insisted that he had made the shipowners aware that the cargo was not intended for the quays; in other words, that its destination was the gas-works. That was found in the arbitration not to be proved. Further, the defender himself was examined as a witness in the arbitration. He knew from the first of the proceedings being instituted, and, if he had disapproved of the pursuers defending the claim before the arbiters, he ought to have taken objection to them doing so instead of giving what must be regarded as encouragement to them to persevere in their defence. In these circumstances he must be held to have contemplated, as a probable consequence of a failure in the arbitration, liability to pay costs."

Argued for the defender;—(1) No fault could be imputed to him for having taken the charter-party in question, because although the pursuers objected to its terms they did not repudiate it as disconform to their instructions. They did not even send it back to the defender for alteration. They must then be held to have accepted it as it stood. (2) Assuming that he was in fault, it was clear that the loss on the coal was entirely due to the pursuers' own actings. They acted unreasonably in refusing to take delivery on the quay. They ought to have accepted delivery there, and paid the freight and demurrage under protest, and if any loss accrued they might have sued the defender, their agent, in the Small-Debt Court for the difference between the expense of carrying the coal in lighters to the gas-works at Belfast and the expense of carrying it in carts from the quay. (3) The defender was not liable, because the loss could not be said to be such as might fairly and reasonably be considered as either arising naturally from the breach of contract itself, or such as might reasonably be supposed to have been in contemplation of both parties.¹ Lastly, he could not be liable in the expenses of an arbitration to which he was no party, and the dependence of which had never been even intimated to him.

No. 59.
Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

Argued for the pursuers;—The whole loss and the subsequent expenses were due to the defenders having taken out a charter-party which was in its terms not in accordance with the instructions given him by the pursuers. He had failed to tell the pursuers, as he should have done, that the shipowner refused to alter it. In short the loss and expenses must be held to have been "reasonably incurred"² owing to the defender's breach of contract.³ It was in the circumstances unnecessary that notice should have been given to the defender of the arbitration proceedings. Those proceedings were entered into by the pursuers solely because of the defender's statements that he had informed the shipowners that the coal was for the Belfast Gas-Works, a statement which, though deposed to by the defender in the proceedings, was denied by the shipowners' clerk. In any view notice was not the foundation of the claim.⁴

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The manner in which this case was presented to the Sheriff for decision is calculated to produce some confusion, but when the real question between the parties is reached I cannot say I think it attended with difficulty. The facts admit of being stated very shortly. [His Lordship here stated the facts as above.]

These claims as stated on record amount to £367, 7s. 6d., and the ground on which the defender is said to be liable for this sum is that the ¹ Hadley v. Baxendale, 1854, 9 Welsby, Hurlstone, & Gordon's Reports, at p. 354; Baxendale and Others v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 1874, L. R., 10 Exch. 35; Ovington & Others v. M'Vicar, May 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 1066, 36 Scot. Jur. 553; Campbell v. A. & D. Morison, Dec. 10, 1891, 19 R. 282; M'Gill v. Bowman & Co., Dec. 9, 1890, 18 R. 206.

² Hughes v. Groome and Another, 1864, 33 L. J. Q. B. 335, at p. 339.

³ Hammond & Co. v. Bussey, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. Div. 79.

⁴ Duffield v. Scott and Others, 1789, 3 Durnford and East's Reports, 374; Smith v. Compton and Others, 1832, 3 B. and A. 407; Jones v. Williams, 1841, 7 M. and W. 493.

No. 59. Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

pursuers have suffered loss and damage to that amount, "through the defender's failure to comply with their instructions," by entering into the foresaid charter-party "outwith his authority."

The Sheriff-substitute has sustained the claim to the extent of £177, 18s. 8d. He disallows the claim for repayment of freight, which is obviously right, and was admitted to be so by the pursuers' counsel. He disallows farther the claim connected with the discharging and storing of the coal for a reason which I shall afterwards notice, and he disallows one-half of the expenses occasioned by the arbitration. The only two items of the pursuers' claim which he finds the pursuers entitled to as claimed are demurrage and the loss sustained by the sale of the coal. I am unable to follow the logical sequence of the Sheriff's findings. It appears to me that if the pursuers are entitled to any decree at all in this action, they are entitled to something more than the Sheriff has awarded, and if not entitled to what the Sheriff has disallowed, then not entitled to what the Sheriff has given. What I mean by this will be made clear by considering the ground on which the Sheriff has disallowed the charge connected with the discharging and storing of the coal. He says that "as this might have been avoided by the pursuers had they, when they offered to take delivery on the quay, accompanied their offer with an offer under protest of freight and demurrage, this item is one for which the defender is not fairly chargeable." But if it is a good ground for refusing this part of the pursuers' claim, that that item of their loss could have been avoided by their making the offer to which the Sheriff refers, it would follow that the defender is not "fairly chargeable" with any damage or loss whatever which could have been avoided by such an offer if made. Now, it appears to me that that ground logically carried out strikes at almost the whole of the pursuers' claim; for if the offer referred to had been made and acted upon by the pursuers, the greater part of their alleged loss and damage would have been avoided. The offer alluded to was made under these circumstances. The pursuers having refused to take delivery of the cargo at the quay, the shipowners intimated that if this refusal was persisted in they would land and store the cargo, and hold it under their lien until their freight and demurrage were paid. The pursuers on the same day offered "without prejudice to the charter-party" to discharge the cargo and place it in their own store, but offered no payment or security for the freight or demurrage. Had they offered (even under protest) to pay freight and demurrage, the coal would have been delivered to them, there would have been no legal proceedings or arbitration, and no forced sale of the coal involving a loss. In short, this course if adopted would have avoided practically the whole loss and damage now in question.

Then, again, I am unable to see any reason why the defender has been held liable for one half of the arbitration expenses, and only one half. If by his fault, the pursuers suffered loss to the extent of these expenses, they should be indemnified for the whole, not the half, of their loss. The Sheriff-substitute says that "on the whole, the amount of these expenses which may fairly be held to have been caused by the fault of the defender may be stated at one-half." I confess I cannot follow this. If the fault of the defender caused any part of the expenses of the arbitration, it caused the whole, for the question in the arbitration (and there was really but one question) was what did the charter-party mean, and what were the rights and obligations of the parties under the discharging clause when properly construed. It all turned on the discharging clause, which, according to the pursuers' averment, the defender had, contrary to his instructions, inserted in the charter-party. I am unable to see any reason for thus splitting up the pursuers' claim. They are, in my opinion, entitled to all they ask or nothing.

No. 59.
Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

I am of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to succeed in this action, and for a reason very much the same as that on which the Sheriff-substitute refuses them the item of £45, 7s. 3d., the expenses of discharging and storing the coal. I think the pursuers could and should have avoided the loss for which they seek now to be indemnified by the defender, and that the loss which they have sustained was not the consequences of what the defender did, but the result of their own actings.

When the pursuers received the copy of the charter-party on 31st March—four days before the vessel left Glasgow with the coals, they saw that they were bound to discharge the coal "as customary." They knew, or should have known, what that meant. They knew it was not what they wanted, nor what they had instructed the defender to agree to as the discharging clause. They knew further that their request to have the discharging clause altered had not been replied to, and therefore, so far as their knowledge went the charter remained in the, to them, objectionable terms. In such circumstances, I think, their duty was plain. Their agent had made a contract for them—they must fulfil it—and claim any relief from him competent to them in the circumstances. They should at once have recognised that under the charter-party as executed the shipowner in offering to discharge "as customary," that is on the quay, was doing all he was bound to do, and they should have taken delivery there. If taking delivery there incurred loss or expense beyond what would have been occasioned by discharging the cargo into lighters in turn, for that they would have had recourse against their agent, by whose fault, or failure to obey his instructions, such loss had been occasioned. Such a course, if followed, would have avoided the loss now claimed. I cannot hold the defender liable in the consequences of the pursuers having maintained a position altogether untenable, having regard to the plain terms of the charter-party executed by their agent, and under which their cargo had been carried. I think the pursuers might have had a claim for the difference, if any, between the cost of conveying the coals to their purchaser, the gas company, by carts from the quay, and by lighters from the ship's side. But no decree can be given for that in this action, as there is no information or proof before us from which the amount of such difference, if any, can be fixed.

The view which I have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to dispose of the question argued before us, whether, assuming the defender's liability for the other items of the pursuers' claim, he could in any view be made liable for the expenses of the arbitration. Had it been necessary to decide that question, my opinion on it would have been adverse to the pursuers. I know of no case or other authority in our books in which such a claim has been given effect to where, as in the present case, the person sought to be

No. 59.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

charged with such expense was not a party to the proceedings, or had not, at least, had the dependence of them intimated to him, that he might protect his own interests therein.

On the whole matter, I think the interlocutor appealed against should be recalled, and the defender assolized.

LORD YOUNG.—The whole controversy has arisen out of a litigation of an extravagant kind entered into between Messrs Paton & Hendry and the pursuers, resulting in an arbitration between the parties and decree in favour of the former. The pursuers' conduct in this matter is to me inexplicable. The relation between them and Paton & Hendry was a contract relation standing on a charter-party. It was decided in the arbitration that the meaning of the clause of discharge in the charter-party was what it bears to be on the face of it, that the coals were to be delivered on the quay. Paton & Hendry desired to deliver them on the quay, but the pursuers refused to take delivery. They said,—“You must deliver them into lighters, or,” I suppose, “if not, take them back to Glasgow.” Anything more extraordinary on the part of business men I have never seen, and anything more ridiculous it would be difficult to conceive. Even if it be assumed that the pursuers' instructions to the defender were to insert a clause in the charter-party requiring the discharge of the cargo into lighters, their only proper course was to have taken delivery of the coal on the quay and thereafter to have charged the defender with any extra expense incurred by reason of the coal being carted to the gas-works from the quay instead of being delivered into lighters according to instructions. They might have had a claim against the defender for extra expense incurred by reason of his not carrying out their instructions, but they had no right to refuse to take delivery of the coal from Paton & Hendry, who were acting in terms of the charter-party. The expenses sued for having been incurred in consequence of the pursuers' inexplicable conduct, I have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I shall confine myself to a consideration of the question whether the pursuers took proceedings and carried them on in such circumstances and in such manner as to entitle them to succeed in the present action. The pursuers, without intimation to the defender, embarked on this litigation, and then in the course of it, again without intimation to the defender, entered into an agreement to take the case out of the hands of the official Court and submit it to arbiters chosen, without the defender being consulted. Thus throughout the defender was afforded no opportunity for dealing with the matter as it might affect his interests. And what is now maintained by the pursuers is, that they having been held to be wrong in an arbitration conducted entirely by themselves, and without the defender having any control whatever over the proceedings, or any voice as to their mode or their management, he, the defender, must make good all that has been lost to the unsuccessful parties in the litigation. I am entirely unable to assent to that. I think the Sheriffs have erred here in holding that the pursuers were entitled to a decree. I cannot assent to the proposition that parties to a contract are entitled to carry on a litigation at their own hand, and to submit the subject-matter of it to arbiters to decide, all without intimation to the agent who made the contract for them, and on being unsuccessful in the litigation, to demand payment of all they have lost from that agent, because before the litigation he had stated as a fact what they found they were afterwards unable to prove by sufficient evidence, and expressed an opinion as to its effect upon the contract. And I do not think that a refusal so to hold involves any hardship to a principal in such a case. Here the pursuers, if their agent was in fault, might have saved all this expense and kept themselves indemnes by taking delivery as the shipowners insisted, and then proceeding against the agent for any loss caused by the mode of discharge being different from that which he had led them to understand he had secured for them. It is plain that any such loss would have been of trifling amount, and ascertainable in a less expensive manner than, first, an action in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, then an arbitration before two arbiters and an oversman, and lastly an action practically for relief before this Court. A real sum at issue of probably at the utmost £20 has by these litigations been swelled to what cannot be less now than £500—a result much to be deplored—and which I can see no just ground for imposing upon this defender.

No. 59.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

Lord Moncreiff concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact [here followed various findings in fact] (10) that the agreement entered into by the pursuers with the shipowners to have their differences settled by arbitration was not intimated by the pursuers to the defender, nor was any instruction given by them to him of the dependence or progress of said arbitration proceedings; (11) that the sums for which the pursuers were found liable to the shipowners as aforesaid, as well as the loss sustained by the pursuers on the sale of the coals, were not occasioned by the defender having taken the charter-party with the discharging clause thereof in the terms in which it is there expressed, nor by any failure in duty or negligence on the part of the defender as the agent of the pursuers; but (12) that the whole loss for which the pursuers sue in this action was occasioned by the pursuers' own actings: Find in law that the defender is not liable to the pursuers in the sum sued for, or any part thereof: Therefore assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action."

J. GORDON MASON, S.S.C.—WHIGHAM & MACLEOD, S.S.C.—Agents.

COWIE BROTHERS & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Balfour—Burnet.

No. 60.

GEORGE HERBERT, Defender (Appellant).—Ure—Findlay.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

Trade-mark—Similarity—Risk of native purchaser in foreign market being misled—Interdict in general terms.—A merchant who exported biscuits for sale in Burmah and elsewhere abroad, and whose registered trade-mark was an architectural drawing, shewing the front elevation of Glasgow Town Hall, brought an action to have another merchant interdicted "from in any way using in connection with the sale of biscuits" the pursuers' trade-mark, or any mark substantially the same.

It was proved that the defender exported biscuits for sale in Burmah,

No. 60. under a label which contained a picture, drawn in perspective, shewing the front and one of the sides of Glasgow Town Hall. It was admitted that a purchaser at home was not likely to mistake the one design for the other, but there was evidence, however, that the similarity was such as was calculated to mislead native purchasers in the Burmese market. It was not proved that anyone either at home or abroad had in fact been misled. The Court refused the interdict craved.

1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

In July 1889 Cowie Brothers & Company, merchants in Glasgow, who were in the habit of exporting biscuits and other goods to Rangoon, registered as a trade-mark an architectural drawing, shewing the front elevation of the Glasgow Town Hall.

In November 1894 they raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against George Herbert, Kingston Biscuit Factory there, praying the Court "to interdict the defender from in any way using, in connection with the sale of biscuits not exported or selected or prepared for exportation by the pursuers, the pursuers' trade-mark, numbered 85,461, and published in the Trade-Marks Journal, No. 579, at page 425; or any mark substantially the same as, or only colourably different from, pursuers' said trade-mark; and from in any way infringing the exclusive rights of the pursuers in the said trade-mark."

The pursuers averred that they had recently ascertained that the defender was using on tins or packages containing biscuits exported by him a representation of Glasgow Town Hall, in imitation of and substantially the same as the complainers' trade-mark, and that, inter alia, the defender had recently consigned to Rangoon for sale a quantity of tins or packages containing biscuits, and bearing such counterfeit trade-mark.

They also averred,—“The defender's use of the label complained of was calculated to lead buyers to believe that the goods consigned by him had been selected and consigned by the pursuers, and was injurious to pursuers' trade, and an infringement of their trade-mark.”

The defender denied the infringement, and stated that he was not aware until immediately before the raising of the present action that the pursuers had appropriated and registered the design of the Glasgow Municipal Buildings used by them as a trade-mark; that the design in question was, at the date of registration by the pursuers, incapable of registration, in respect that it was not the design of the pursuers, it was in common use, and specially a representation of the Glasgow Municipal Buildings had been used by the defender as a trade-mark for his biscuits.

Copies of the pursuers' trade-mark and the defender's label were produced. It appeared that while each gave a picture of the Glasgow Town Hall the former was a front elevation of the building geometrically drawn, and that the latter gave a view shewing the front and one side of the building drawn in perspective.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The subject of the so-called trade-mark being invalid in respect of want of novelty, being incapable of registration, and in prior use, the defender is entitled to be absolved from the conclusion of the action, with expenses. (3) The defender not having infringed any alleged trade-mark, is entitled to absolvitor, with costs.

Additional pleas in law for defender:—(1) The pursuers, by acquiescence and delay, being barred from stating any objections to defender's use of his own label, the present action should be dismissed, with costs. (2) The pursuers having adopted or imitated the subject of the design in use by the defender, are not entitled to the protection of the Court, and the present action falls to be dismissed, with expenses. No. 60.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

On 30th January 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers are proprietors of a trade-mark, which was registered as on 22d January 1889, and that the registration thereof . . . is conclusive evidence, in terms of sections 75 and 76 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act,* 1883, of their right to the exclusive use thereof, subject to the provisions of the said Act: Finds, therefore, that the defender's second plea in law, and his first and second additional pleas in law, can only be maintained in an application to the Court of Session for rectification of the register†: Finds that the question of infringement cannot be conveniently decided without probation; therefore allows a proof." X X

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

A proof was afterwards led.

It appeared from the proof that the first shipment of goods made by the pursuers to Rangoon under their trade-mark was in October 1889, and there was evidence that the defender first printed his label in 1887, and that biscuits were sent by him to Rangoon with his label in January 1889 under the name Guthrie & Company. It also appeared that in October 1894 an assistant of the pursuers in Rangoon, who had been in their employment there since 1889, for the first time heard of biscuits being sold under a town hall label of the defender, that he at once took steps to have the man who sold them taken to Court, and that the latter was sentenced to pay a fine of 200 rupees, or suffer three months' imprisonment. It was not proved that anyone had in fact mistaken the defender's label for the pursuers' trade-mark, but three witnesses for the pursuers, besides the pursuers and their servants, deponed that the similarity of the designs was calculated to mislead native purchasers.‡ The defender's witnesses deponed contra.

* The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 57), enacts, sec. 75,—“Registration of a trade-mark shall be deemed to be equivalent to public use of the trade-mark.” Sec. 76.—“The registration of a person as proprietor of a trade-mark shall be prima facie evidence of his right to the exclusive use of the trade-mark, and shall after the expiration of five years from the date of the registration be conclusive evidence of his right to the exclusive use of the trade-mark, subject to the provisions of this Act.”

† See immediately succeeding report.

‡ Andrew Symington of the Indian Civil Service, and an assistant commissioner in Burmah:—"I think there is a similarity between these two marks which might deceive a native buyer. In Burmah goods are known by the brands on them. The brand appears on Cowie & Company's label as the Glasgow Town Hall. In Burmah the town hall would be known as a palace, and in India as a temple. A native that bought goods under Cowie's label might, in a subsequent purchase, take by mistake goods under Guthrie & Company's label."

James Galbraith, East India merchant:—"I have seen the labels in question. I consider that there is a similarity between Guthrie & Company's labels and Cowie & Company's labels. The similarity is such as would deceive a native buyer in Rangoon. The natives are in the way of giving the different tickets names of their own. I think the labels in question would go under the same name, and confusion would arise between the two. (Q.) If a native who had been buying under Cowie & Company's town hall mark ordered goods, how do you think he would order them? (A.)

No. 60.

On 9th November 1895, the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) granted interdict as craved,* and on 24th June 1896 the Sheriff adhered.

Jan. 18, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

The defender appealed.

Argued for the appellant;—The registration of the pursuers' trade-mark relieved the pursuers of the necessity of proving that their trade-mark had been and was in actual use. In that sense registration was equivalent to the public user which prior to the Act had been of the essence of a trade-mark,¹ but it went no further. Here the defender's label had been in use prior to the registration of the pursuers' trade-mark, or at anyrate contemporaneously with it, and the pursuers could not therefore claim an exclusive right, assuming the trade-mark and label to be similar. But in point of fact the designs were altogether dissimilar, for although both the pictures were pictures of the Town Hall of Glasgow, the general effect was quite different, the pictures having been taken from entirely different points of view. The defender's also shewed many more details of the building. Presumably, therefore, there was no risk of mistake, and the pursuers had not rebutted this presumption. The labels had been circulating side by side for several years, and not a single instance of anyone having been deceived had been established. That was essential, or at anyrate very material, where there was contemporaneous use.² All that the evidence of the witnesses for the pursuers came to—and it was of a

He would order them in his native language as a house or palace or large building. . . . Cross.—They would distinguish them if they were put together, but they would call them both a house or palace. It would pass in their idea as a large house. They could not describe it. . . . A sharp man buying them himself might easily enough see there was a difference, but at the same time these two would pass in the interior. I have been buying them in the interior myself, and have seen them ranged along the shop, and I say that these two would pass as one for the other. . . . As a European dealer I would know the difference, but I would not as a native."

Francis Park, merchant, Manchester:—"I think there is a similarity between these labels such as would deceive native buyers, especially up country buyers."

* "NOTE.—The pursuers' title to their trade-mark having formerly been sustained, the only question is whether the trade-mark used by the defender is so like it as to have a tendency to mislead. It is not necessary to the pursuers' case that they should shew that the defender had an intention to deceive, and I do not think that is alleged or proved. Neither have I anything to do, as has already been held, with the question whether the pursuers are properly registered. They are registered, and that is conclusive for the present purpose.

"Further, an attentive consideration of the question of similarity satisfies me that purchasers are likely to be deceived by the resemblance of the one label to the other. A good deal is said about the greater probability of uneducated (?) Orientals being deceived, but it does not seem at all unlikely that an average English buyer might mistake the one picture for the other. It must be observed that deception occurs not when the two pictures are presented at the same moment for comparison, but when the defender's picture is seen by itself, and can only be compared with the representation of the registered trade-mark which the intending buyer carries in his memory."

¹ In re Hudson's Trade-marks, 1886, L. R., 32 Ch. Div. 311.

² Sebastian on Trade-marks, 334; Kerly on Trade-marks, 206; Estcourt v. Estcourt, Hop Essence Co., 1875, L. R., 10 Ch. 276, p. 280; Rodgers v. Rodgers, 1874, 31 L. T. 285, p. 289; Baker v. Rawson, L. R., 45 Ch. Div. 519; Lambert, 1888, 5 P. O. R. 542; Talbot, 1894, 11 P. O. R. 77.

very vague and indefinite character—was this, that there was a risk of the natives of Burmah being misled. That was wholly insufficient to warrant an interdict. The distinction attempted to be drawn between the British and the Oriental purchaser was absurd. Besides, the interdict asked was in general terms, and yet it was practically admitted that, quoad the home market, there was no risk of mistake—in other words, that there was no infringement. But how could the same design be an infringement abroad and yet no infringement at home? There was no precedent for an interdict restricted to a particular market; and, in any view, the pursuers had not moved to have the interdict asked for confined to the Burmese markets.

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers being the owners of a registered trade-mark were entitled under the statutes to the absolute and exclusive use of it. The registration, after five years, was equivalent to evidence of the appropriation of that particular design. When there was such evidence, then no one else was entitled to use the design.¹ It mattered not therefore that the defender now averred that he had been contemporaneously using a similar design; even if true, that was no answer to an action of interdict. On the evidence there was no proof that the defender's label had been in the Rangoon market prior to 1894. When it then appeared the pursuers had at once taken prompt measures to have it suppressed. The only question was whether the defender's design was so similar to the pursuers' trade-mark as to be an infringement of it. The pursuers had proved that it was. It was not necessary to establish that in fact anyone had been deceived.² It was enough to prove that persons purchasing with ordinary caution were likely to be misled, though they might not be misled if they saw the two marks side by side.³ Fraud on the part of the infringer need not be proved.⁴ The intelligence of the ultimate purchaser of the goods was the proper test of the probability of deception,⁵ and accordingly, what the Court had to consider here was the likelihood of the Burmese natives being deceived. That had been clearly proved. It was notorious that what attracted the attention of an Oriental was the general effect of a picture, and that he did not appreciate nice distinctions of detail. It was true that questions of infringement had not so frequently arisen in connection with foreign as with home markets, but there were cases in which the Court had recognised the opinions of natives as the criterion,⁶ and the Court might restrict the interdict, if that was necessary, to a particular market.⁷

No. 60.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

¹ Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Kimball & Morton, Jan. 14, 1873, 11 Macph. 267, Lord President, at p. 272, 45 Scot. Jur. 201.

² Johnston v. Orr Ewing & Co., 1882, L. R., 7 Ap. Ca. 219; Sykes v. Sykes, 1824, 3 B. and C. 541; Perry v. Truefitt, 1842, 6 Beavan, 66, Sebastian, 141.

³ Seixo v. Provezende, 1865, L. R., 1 Ch. Ap. 192; cf. The Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, 1882, L. R., 8 Ap. Ca. 15.

⁴ "Singer" Machine Manufacturers v. Wilson, 1877, L. R., 3 Ap. Ca. 376; Assam Tea Co., 1889, 7 P. O. R. 183.

⁵ Orr Ewing & Co. v. Johnston & Co. 1877, L. R., 13 Ch. Div. 434.

⁶ Orr Ewing & Co. v. Johnston & Co., 1877, L. R., 13 Ch. Div. 434, Fry, J. at p. 448, 7 Ap. Ca. 219; Wilkinson v. Griffith, 1891, 8 P. O. R. 370; Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk Co. v. Metcalf, 1886, 3 P. O. R. 28.

⁷ Kerly on Trade-marks, 351; Carver v. Bowker, 1877, Sebastian's Digest, 581; Barber v. Manico, 1893, 10 P. O. R. 93; Rodgers v. Rottgen, 1889, 5 Times Reports, 678.

No. 60. At advising,—

Jan. 16, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am unable to agree with the Sheriffs. My confidence in the judgment received a serious shake, from which it has never rallied, when the pursuers' counsel rested their whole argument on a distinction which the Sheriff-substitute expressly repudiates, and which goes deep into the pursuers' case. The pursuers' counsel did not maintain that "an average English buyer" was at all likely to be misled; and they relied solely on the evidence of the probability of Burmese buyers being deceived.

This is a question of fact, and what we have to determine is whether the pursuers have established that the defender's labels so resemble the registered trade-mark of the pursuers as to be apt to mislead purchasers into taking the defender's goods for the pursuers'. There is no evidence that anyone has actually been so misled; but such direct evidence, while it is the best, cannot be held to be in all circumstances indispensable. I am quite willing to make allowance for the distance of the market in question, and for the difference in race of the probable purchasers, as making it intelligible that the evidence should not be of the best, or be copious. Still, we cannot grant interdict, unless we are satisfied by adequate evidence.

Now, reverting to what I referred to at the outset, the pursuers make a difficult beginning, when it has to be admitted that they have no case about the British market. This implies, and leads one to remember, that the two labels, to anyone accustomed to the buildings of Europe, and to the labels of commerce, are not like one another. In fact, but for the circumstance that they are known to have both been intended to present views of the same building, I do not believe that this question would ever have arisen. But then it is always to be remembered that, on the face of the labels, they do not purport to depict the Glasgow Town Hall at all, and the fact that they are both views of that building is therefore, as I have said, a mere circumstance, which does not of itself really affect the dispute. They are, on the face of them, as unlike as if, instead of being different views of the same building, they had been intended to represent different buildings. Nor is there anything in the surroundings or get-up of the two labels which contributes to assimilate them.

But then it is said that in Rangoon a very crude view is taken of such things. Indeed, the pursuers' case is a bold one, for it really comes to this, that the native purchaser will draw no distinctions between one large building and another, but will take each and all as depicting a mosque or palace, and will so call the label. As applied to British trade-marks, this would seem to prove, if not too much, at least a good deal. It would practically strike all large edifices out of the region of lawful trade-marks, giving a monopoly to the pursuers or someone else. It is curious also to note that, applying the pursuers' contention to the interdict which he has obtained, and now defends, this rule would apply to British as well as to Oriental markets, although in the British market the reason for the rule is not alleged to exist. I do not forget that, late in the day and not spontaneously, the pursuers avowed that, rather than have no interdict, they would be content with an interdict applicable to the Rangoon market; but this subject was not very fully developed.

These being the conditions of the argument, it is surely necessary that the proposition in fact that (let it be in Burmah) the resemblance of the two labels is such that that of the defenders is apt to mislead should be clearly made out. Now, when the evidence is examined, it turns out to be small in amount, and (what there is of it) very thin and general. The drastic proceedings taken by the pursuers in Rangoon, on the appearance of the defenders' label, can hardly affect our judgment on the evidence now before us. When the evidence is considered, it appears that, apart from the pursuers and their servants, there are only three witnesses who speak to this matter. Of these one is not a commercial man, and he expresses the opinion that there is a similarity which "might" deceive a native buyer. Again, Mr Galbraith "thinks the labels would go under the same name,"—the natives would call them both a palace. But this gentleman's opinion, such as it is, is most confident about what he calls "the interior" of Burmah, which makes the matter still more remote and hazy. In like manner Mr Park thinks there is a similarity such as would deceive native buyers, "especially up country buyers."

No. 60.
Jan. 16, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

Now, if this evidence were supported by the labels themselves, or by facts about other markets, it would stand in a more favourable position than it does now, with no antecedent or surrounding probability. Standing by itself, and being at best more or less conjectural, it forms an insufficient substitute for direct evidence of deception. The case for the defenders would certainly have been strengthened on this matter if they had been able to shew that their label had actually been for some time in the Rangoon market, for this would have made the absence of evidence of deception still more important. I do not think, however, that they have succeeded in making good this point.

On the whole matter, I am, in the first place, wholly unable to affirm the Sheriff's finding in fact. Read along with the note of the Sheriff-substitute, it means that, all the world over, or at least in the British as well as in the Rangoon market, the one label so resembles the other as to be apt to mislead purchasers. This wide proposition is unsupported by evidence, and was not maintained by the pursuers in the debate before us. As regards the Burmese markets, I think the case is not proved. Accordingly, I am for recalling the interlocutors of 9th November 1895 and 24th June 1896, and for finding in fact that the pursuers have failed to prove that the defender's labels so resemble the pursuers' trade-mark as to be apt to mislead purchasers, and for finding in law that the rights of the pursuers to the trade-mark have not been infringed. This leads to absolvitor.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is not immaterial in considering questions of this nature to remember that the primary use of a trade-mark is to distinguish goods of a certain description or quality. It is not a substitute for a signature on a label. The same firm may have different trade-marks, each appropriated to a particular article of manufacture. Still, if the goods of a trader have acquired a reputation under a certain trade-mark, the law will give protection to the trader using the trade-mark, by restraining the sale of other goods under that mark or one so like it as to be calculated to deceive.

No. 59. pursuers have suffered loss and damage to that amount, "through the defender's failure to comply with their instructions," by entering into the foresaid charter-party "outwith his authority."

Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

The Sheriff-substitute has sustained the claim to the extent of £177, 18s. 8d. He disallows the claim for repayment of freight, which is obviously right, and was admitted to be so by the pursuers' counsel. He disallows farther the claim connected with the discharging and storing of the coal for a reason which I shall afterwards notice, and he disallows one-half of the expenses occasioned by the arbitration. The only two items of the pursuers' claim which he finds the pursuers entitled to as claimed are demurrage and the loss sustained by the sale of the coal. I am unable to follow the logical sequence of the Sheriff's findings. It appears to me that if the pursuers are entitled to any decree at all in this action, they are entitled to something more than the Sheriff has awarded, and if not entitled to what the Sheriff has disallowed, then not entitled to what the Sheriff has given. What I mean by this will be made clear by considering the ground on which the Sheriff has disallowed the charge connected with the discharging and storing of the coal. He says that "as this might have been avoided by the pursuers had they, when they offered to take delivery on the quay, accompanied their offer with an offer under protest of freight and demurrage, this item is one for which the defender is not fairly chargeable." But if it is a good ground for refusing this part of the pursuers' claim, that that item of their loss could have been avoided by their making the offer to which the Sheriff refers, it would follow that the defender is not "fairly chargeable" with any damage or loss whatever which could have been avoided by such an offer if made. Now, it appears to me that that ground logically carried out strikes at almost the whole of the pursuers' claim; for if the offer referred to had been made and acted upon by the pursuers, the greater part of their alleged loss and damage would have been avoided. The offer alluded to was made under these circumstances. The pursuers having refused to take delivery of the cargo at the quay, the shipowners intimated that if this refusal was persisted in they would land and store the cargo, and hold it under their lien until their freight and demurrage were paid. The pursuers on the same day offered "without prejudice to the charter-party" to discharge the cargo and place it in their own store, but offered no payment or security for the freight or demurrage. Had they offered (even under protest) to pay freight and demurrage, the coal would have been delivered to them, there would have been no legal proceedings or arbitration, and no forced sale of the coal involving a loss. In short, this course if adopted would have avoided practically the whole loss and damage now in question.

Then, again, I am unable to see any reason why the defender has been held liable for one half of the arbitration expenses, and only one half. If by his fault, the pursuers suffered loss to the extent of these expenses, they should be indemnified for the whole, not the half, of their loss. The Sheriff-substitute says that "on the whole, the amount of these expenses which may fairly be held to have been caused by the fault of the defender may be stated at one-half." I confess I cannot follow this. If the fault of the defender caused any part of the expenses of the arbitration, it caused the whole, for the question in the arbitration (and there was really but one question) was what did the charter-party mean, and what were the rights and obligations of the parties under the discharging clause when properly construed. It all turned on the discharging clause, which, according to the pursuers' averment, the defender had, contrary to his instructions, inserted in the charter-party. I am unable to see any reason for thus splitting up the pursuers' claim. They are, in my opinion, entitled to all they ask or nothing.

No. 59.
Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

I am of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to succeed in this action, and for a reason very much the same as that on which the Sheriff-substitute refuses them the item of £45, 7s. 3d., the expenses of discharging and storing the coal. I think the pursuers could and should have avoided the loss for which they seek now to be indemnified by the defender, and that the loss which they have sustained was not the consequences of what the defender did, but the result of their own actings.

When the pursuers received the copy of the charter-party on 31st March—four days before the vessel left Glasgow with the coals, they saw that they were bound to discharge the coal "as customary." They knew, or should have known, what that meant. They knew it was not what they wanted, nor what they had instructed the defender to agree to as the discharging clause. They knew further that their request to have the discharging clause altered had not been replied to, and therefore, so far as their knowledge went the charter remained in the, to them, objectionable terms. In such circumstances, I think, their duty was plain. Their agent had made a contract for them—they must fulfil it—and claim any relief from him competent to them in the circumstances. They should at once have recognised that under the charter-party as executed the shipowner in offering to discharge "as customary," that is on the quay, was doing all he was bound to do, and they should have taken delivery there. If taking delivery there incurred loss or expense beyond what would have been occasioned by discharging the cargo into lighters in turn, for that they would have had recourse against their agent, by whose fault, or failure to obey his instructions, such loss had been occasioned. Such a course, if followed, would have avoided the loss now claimed. I cannot hold the defender liable in the consequences of the pursuers having maintained a position altogether untenable, having regard to the plain terms of the charter-party executed by their agent, and under which their cargo had been carried. I think the pursuers might have had a claim for the difference, if any, between the cost of conveying the coals to their purchaser, the gas company, by carts from the quay, and by lighters from the ship's side. But no decree can be given for that in this action, as there is no information or proof before us from which the amount of such difference, if any, can be fixed.

The view which I have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to dispose of the question argued before us, whether, assuming the defender's liability for the other items of the pursuers' claim, he could in any view be made liable for the expenses of the arbitration. Had it been necessary to decide that question, my opinion on it would have been adverse to the pursuers. I know of no case or other authority in our books in which such a claim has been given effect to where, as in the present case, the person sought to be

No. 59.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Barkley &
Sons v.
Simpson.

charged with such expense was not a party to the proceedings, or had not, at least, had the dependence of them intimated to him, that he might protect his own interests therein.

On the whole matter, I think the interlocutor appealed against should be recalled, and the defender assolizied.

LORD YOUNG.—The whole controversy has arisen out of a litigation of an extravagant kind entered into between Messrs Paton & Hendry and the pursuers, resulting in an arbitration between the parties and decree in favour of the former. The pursuers' conduct in this matter is to me inexplicable. The relation between them and Paton & Hendry was a contract relation standing on a charter-party. It was decided in the arbitration that the meaning of the clause of discharge in the charter-party was what it bears to be on the face of it, that the coals were to be delivered on the quay. Paton & Hendry desired to deliver them on the quay, but the pursuers refused to take delivery. They said,—“You must deliver them into lighters, or,” I suppose, “if not, take them back to Glasgow.” Anything more extraordinary on the part of business men I have never seen, and anything more ridiculous it would be difficult to conceive. Even if it be assumed that the pursuers' instructions to the defender were to insert a clause in the charter-party requiring the discharge of the cargo into lighters, their only proper course was to have taken delivery of the coal on the quay and thereafter to have charged the defender with any extra expense incurred by reason of the coal being carted to the gas-works from the quay instead of being delivered into lighters according to instructions. They might have had a claim against the defender for extra expense incurred by reason of his not carrying out their instructions, but they had no right to refuse to take delivery of the coal from Paton & Hendry, who were acting in terms of the charter-party. The expenses sued for having been incurred in consequence of the pursuers' inexplicable conduct, I have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I shall confine myself to a consideration of the question whether the pursuers took proceedings and carried them on in such circumstances and in such manner as to entitle them to succeed in the present action. The pursuers, without intimation to the defender, embarked on this litigation, and then in the course of it, again without intimation to the defender, entered into an agreement to take the case out of the hands of the official Court and submit it to arbiters chosen, without the defender being consulted. Thus throughout the defender was afforded no opportunity for dealing with the matter as it might affect his interests. And what is now maintained by the pursuers is, that they having been held to be wrong in an arbitration conducted entirely by themselves, and without the defender having any control whatever over the proceedings, or any voice as to their mode or their management, he, the defender, must make good all that has been lost to the unsuccessful parties in the litigation. I am entirely unable to assent to that. I think the Sheriffs have erred here in holding that the pursuers were entitled to a decree. I cannot assent to the proposition that parties to a contract are entitled to carry on a litigation at their own hand, and to submit the subject-matter of it to arbiters to decide, all without intimation to the agent who made the contract for them, and on being unsuccessful in the litigation, to demand payment of all they have lost from that agent, because before the litigation he had stated as a fact what they found they were afterwards unable to prove by sufficient evidence, and expressed an opinion as to its effect upon the contract. And I do not think that a refusal so to hold involves any hardship to a principal in such a case. Here the pursuers, if their agent was in fault, might have saved all this expense and kept themselves indemnes by taking delivery as the shipowners insisted, and then proceeding against the agent for any loss caused by the mode of discharge being different from that which he had led them to understand he had secured for them. It is plain that any such loss would have been of trifling amount, and ascertainable in a less expensive manner than, first, an action in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, then an arbitration before two arbiters and an oversman, and lastly an action practically for relief before this Court. A real sum at issue of probably at the utmost £20 has by these litigations been swelled to what cannot be less now than £500—a result much to be deplored—and which I can see no just ground for imposing upon this defender.

LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact [here followed various findings in fact] (10) that the agreement entered into by the pursuers with the shipowners to have their differences settled by arbitration was not intimated by the pursuers to the defender, nor was any instruction given by them to him of the dependence or progress of said arbitration proceedings; (11) that the sums for which the pursuers were found liable to the shipowners as aforesaid, as well as the loss sustained by the pursuers on the sale of the coals, were not occasioned by the defender having taken the charter-party with the discharging clause thereof in the terms in which it is there expressed, nor by any failure in duty or negligence on the part of the defender as the agent of the pursuers; but (12) that the whole loss for which the pursuers sue in this action was occasioned by the pursuers' own actings: Find in law that the defender is not liable to the pursuers in the sum sued for, or any part thereof: Therefore assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action."

J. GORDON MASON, S.S.C.—WHIGHAM & MACLEOD, S.S.C.—Agents.

COWIE BROTHERS & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Balfour—Burnet.

No. 60.

GEORGE HERBERT, Defender (Appellant).—Ure—Findlay.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Cowie
Brothers &
Co. v. Herbert.

Trade-mark—Similarity—Risk of native purchaser in foreign market being misled—Interdict in general terms.—A merchant who exported biscuits for sale in Burmah and elsewhere abroad, and whose registered trade-mark was an architectural drawing, shewing the front elevation of Glasgow Town Hall, brought an action to have another merchant interdicted "from in any way using in connection with the sale of biscuits" the pursuers' trade-mark, or any mark substantially the same.

It was proved that the defender exported biscuits for sale in Burmah,

No. 62.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Carruthers'
Trustee v.
Finlay &
Wilson.

The Court refused the application, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner holding (Lord Young expressing an opinion to the same effect) that the application was incompetent, in respect that the £104 was not property which had been "recovered or preserved on behalf of" the pursuer; Lord Young, Lord Trayner, and Lord Moncreiff holding that in any event the order craved was one which the Court, in the exercise of its discretion under the Act, ought not to grant.

2D DIVISION.

(SEE ante, Carruthers v. Carruthers' Trustees, June 26, 1895, 22 R. 775, rev. July 13, 1896, 23 R. (H. L.) 51.)

On 9th June 1894 Miss Margaret Carruthers, daughter of the late David Carruthers, manufacturer, Bervie, and liferentrix of the residue of her father's estate under his trust-disposition and settlement, raised an action against her father's testamentary trustees concluding for count, reckoning, and payment, and for decree ordaining the defenders personally to restore to the trust-estate such sum as should be found to be the amount lost to the trust through the defalcations of Hall Gregor, one of the trustees, who had absconded, by payment of the said sum to William Carruthers, who was at the date of the action the sole trustee.

Defences were lodged for William Carruthers, and for Forbes and Glegg, two trustees who had resigned.

On 26th June 1895 the Second Division assoilzied the defenders (22 R. 775), but on appeal the House of Lords reversed that judgment, and pronounced the judgment embodied in the following interlocutor of the Second Division pronounced on 5th December 1896, in a petition to apply the judgment of the House:—"Apply the judgment of the House of Lords of date 13th July 1896, and in respect thereof decern against the defender William Carruthers and James Glegg as individuals, and Ann Forbes or Forbes as executrix of the deceased Hector Forbes, and as such representing him as an individual, and that all conjunctly and severally for payment to the defender William Carruthers as remaining trustee under the trust-disposition and deed of settlement of the deceased David Carruthers mentioned in the petition, that the same may be applied along with the rest of the trust-estate in terms and for the purposes of the said trust-disposition and deed of settlement, of the sum of £104, 2s. 7d. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £4 per centum per annum from and after the 31st day of January 1891, and until payment: Find the petitioner (pursuer) entitled to the expenses incurred by her in the Inner-House, and the expenses of the petition: Remit," &c.

Thereafter Messrs Finlay & Wilson, S.S.C., the pursuer's agents, presented a note to the Lord Justice-Clerk, in which they craved his Lordship, under the Law-Agents and Notaries-Public (Scotland) Act, 1891, sec. 6,* to move the Court "to declare the said Finlay & Wilson

* The Law-Agents and Notaries-Public (Scotland) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 30), section 6, enacts as follows:—"In every case in which a law-agent shall be employed to pursue or defend any action or proceeding in any Court, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge before whom any such action or proceeding has been heard or shall be depending, to declare such law-agent entitled to a charge upon and against, and a right to payment out of, the property of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved on behalf of his client by such law-agent in such action or proceeding, for the taxed expenses of or in reference to such action or proceeding, and it shall be lawful for such Court or entitled to a charge upon and against and a right to payment out of said sum of £104, 2s. 7d., and interest for the taxed expenses incurred by the said pursuer to said Finlay & Wilson in connection with said action in so far as the same shall not be recovered under the award of expenses already made as aforesaid by your Lordship's Division, and to remit the account of their expenses so to be charged to the Auditor to tax and report, and thereafter to approve of said report, and to decern against the said William Carruthers as remaining trustee fore-said, for payment to the said Finlay & Wilson of the said sum of £104, 2s. 7d., and interest thereon, so far as required for payment of the taxed amount of such expenses remaining after deduction of any sum recovered as aforesaid, the said sum of £104, 2s. 7d., and interest thereon, being first received by the said William Carruthers as remaining trustee fore-said; or to do further or otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

No. 62.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Carruthers'
Trustee v.
Finlay &
Wilson.

William Carruthers, the trustee, opposed the application.

The amount for which Messrs Finlay & Wilson craved a charging order considerably exceeded the £104, 2s. 7d. recovered in the action.

It further appeared that the whole income of the trust-estate was being employed to pay off trust debts—principal and interest—which it was not disputed was the legitimate course of trust administration. In this way the pursuer, as liferentrix, had received nothing, and she would never receive anything if she should die before the whole debts had been paid off. It was stated on behalf of Messrs Finlay & Wilson that they calculated that the entire debts would be paid off in about five years from the date of their application.

Argued for Finlay & Wilson;—The Statute of 1891 gave Scots law-agents a right similar to that enjoyed by English solicitors under the English Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. c. 127), and under the English Act such an application as the present would have been competent, for it had been held, on the construction of that Act, that the property recovered need not be property recovered for the sole behoof of the person who had employed the solicitor, if the other persons interested took the benefit of the solicitor's services in effecting the recovery, these services being regarded as of the nature of salvage services.¹ The words "on behalf of his client" did not occur in the English Act, but that made no difference; the words were not "solely" on behalf of the client. The case for the other side really depended on reading the word "solely" into the Act, for it could not be disputed that the pursuer, having a title and interest to sue, had succeeded in vindicating a benefit, although it might be a contingent benefit, for herself, since her liferent would begin to be paid sooner; and this was sufficient to satisfy the words of the Act, unless the word "solely" was read in. But if "solely" was read in, then no solicitor to a liferenter could ever take advantage of the Act. The partial and contingent character of the pursuer's interest in the pro-

Judge to make such order or orders for taxation of, and for raising and payment of, such expenses out of the said property as to such Court or Judge shall appear just and proper; and all acts done or deeds granted by the client after the date of the declaration, except acts or deeds in favour of a bona fide purchaser, shall be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charge or right."

¹ Greer v. Young, 1882, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 545, see per L. J. Bowen at p. 556; Scholey v. Peck, L. R. [1893], 1 Ch. 709.

No. 62.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Carruthers'
Trustee v.
Finlay &
Wilson.

party recovered might be a ground for the Court, in the exercise of their discretion under the Act, restricting the amount of the account to be charged on the property, but it was not a ground for refusing the application to charge as incompetent.

Argued for the defender;—The application was incompetent because the property sought to be charged was not property "recovered or preserved on behalf of" the pursuer. The property recovered was property recovered on behalf of the trust-estate, and not of the pursuer, who took no immediate or direct benefit from the recovery, and might never take any benefit at all. The English authorities had no application, the language of the English Act being different from the Scots Act; besides the clients in these cases did take some immediate and direct benefit. In any case, the English authorities ought not to be followed. They proceeded on the erroneous analogy of salvage claims, which never exceeded the amount of the property salvaged, whereas the purpose of the present Act was to extend the principle of decrees in name of agents-disbursers by giving agents the means of preventing their clients from disposing of property recovered or preserved through the agent's services to the prejudice of the agent, and in such cases, as here, the agent's account might well exceed the amount of the property recovered or preserved. In any view, the Court in their discretion ought to refuse the application.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the terms of the clause of the Act of Parliament founded on indicate two sets of circumstances in which a law-agent will be entitled to a charging order. On the one hand he may have been acting for the pursuer, and may have recovered the property or sum sued for, or, on the other hand, he may have been acting for a defender, and may have "preserved" for his client a property or sum which the pursuer sought to take from him. Now, the particular one of these alternatives which the law-agents here maintain they come under is "recovery." The lady for whom they acted was the pursuer of this action. We have to consider whether anything has been recovered by them on behalf of their client. It is plain that here there has been no such recovery on behalf of their client. The sum of money for which decree has been obtained is a sum which the trustees had suffered by their negligence to be lost to the trust-estate through their factor absconding with it. It has been decided by the House of Lords that the trustees are bound to replace that sum in the trust-estate. They have not been ordained to pay anything to the pursuer. It does not seem to me that anything has been recovered on behalf of the client here. The debts against the trust-estate are such that a considerable period must elapse during which nothing will be payable to her. It may be that nothing will ever be payable.

We have been referred to some cases decided in England upon the corresponding English statute. There is a difference between the English and the Scottish Acts of Parliament, and it is therefore questionable whether these decisions are applicable. But even if there had been no such difference, it would not alter my view. In the cases quoted the plaintiff had an immediate right to something in consequence of the decree obtained. I think the illustration of salvage given in these cases is inappropriate. It does not seem a sound view that the costs are of the nature of a salvage payment. As was pointed out by Lord Trayner in the course of the discussion, salvage is a payment for the saving of property, and it is always less in amount than the value of the property saved. The word "salvage" does not apply to the case of a claim by which the whole fund may be carried off, as indeed would be the case here if the charging order were granted.

No. 62.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Carruthers'
Trustee v.
Finlay &
Wilson.

On the whole matter I think the prayer of the note should be refused.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a case certainly not without general interest. It is a note presented under the Act 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 30, section 6. The law-agents here had as their client the pursuer of an action against trustees personally for payment of a sum which an absconding trustee, who also acted as factor to the trust, had gone off with. The sum upon which the law-agents ask for a charge is a sum of £104, 2s. 7d., with respect to which the following interlocutor was pronounced by this Court in pursuance of an order of the House of Lords—(His Lordship quoted the interlocutor of 5th December 1896). So that we are asked to say that money in the hands of the trustee of David Carruthers to be disposed of by the trustee in terms of that decree is to be charged with this account of expenses incurred by the pursuer of this action, to whom nothing has been ordered to be paid at all. Now, I confess that I am not prepared to say as matter of law that money ordered to be paid by the defenders to this trustee is money "recovered or preserved on behalf of the client" of these applicants. I am not at all prepared to affirm that. Indeed, I am inclined to think it is not so. It is not doubtful that their client may never get anything at all if the money is disposed of as it is ordered to be disposed of by the decree.

But, apart from that, as matter of discretion—and under this section we have full discretion—I am not prepared to grant a charging order. A case may be figured in which a law-agent would have a strong equitable claim to such an order. If, for instance, £10,000 had been recovered for behoof of various parties not all clients of the law-agent, he might very reasonably ask for an order for payment of his account out of the sum recovered. It is easy to conceive of cases in which, although the whole sum is by no means recovered on behalf of his client only, the law-agent might have an irresistible claim for payment of his account out of the fund recovered.

In this case, however, I am of opinion that even if it could be predicated that this sum had been recovered on behalf of this applicant's client, this is not a case in which we ought, in the exercise of our discretion under the statute, to grant the order craved.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that this application does not disclose a case falling within the terms of section 6 of the Law-Agents and Notaries-Public Act, 1891. Further, I am of opinion that, assuming the case to fall within the provisions of that section, it is not one in which we ought, in the exercise of our discretion, to grant the charging order craved.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I do not differ from the result at which your Lordships have arrived. I think that in this case there are special circumstances which make it right that the application should, as matter of discretion, be refused. The sum recovered is not large, and the law-agents' account is

No. 62.

Jan. 16, 1897.
Carruthers'
Trustee v.
Finlay &
Wilson.

larger than the sum recovered. It is not clear that there will, as the result of the decree obtained in this action, be anything available for the pursuer. The creditors claim the whole estate, and it may be that their claims will absorb it all. Now, the Court has a discretion, and, looking to the whole circumstances, I do not think that this is a case in which we ought, in the exercise of that discretion, to grant a charging order in hoc statu. I go no further.

In regard to the construction of section 6 of the Act, I prefer to reserve my opinion. It might be too narrow an interpretation to say that in no case can a charging order be given except upon a sum recovered or preserved solely for the applicant's client. There might be cases in which the law-agent would be entitled to a charging order upon a fund, although that fund had not been recovered only for his own client, or although his client's interest in it might be contingent. I prefer to reserve my opinion on these points, and refuse the application simply in the exercise of our discretion.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the note, found the pursuer's agents liable in the expenses of the discussion, and modified the same at £3, 3s., and decerned.

PARTIES—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 63.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.,
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

THE GOVAN ROPE AND SAIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—Ure—Clyde.

ANDREW WEIR & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Jamieson—Younger.

Sale—Breach of contract by buyer—Measure of damage—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 71), sec. 53, subsec. 2.—A ropemaker agreed to supply at a certain price 20 tons of rope of a special quality in such quantities as the purchaser should from time to time order, but on condition that the whole should be taken within a certain time. The special quality of rope was not kept in stock by the seller, but was made from time to time as each order was sent. The purchaser having failed to order the whole of the 20 tons within the time specified, the seller raised an action of damages for his loss of profit on the quantity which had not been ordered. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson) that the true measure of the damages to which the seller was entitled was the difference between the contract price and the cost to the seller of the raw material plus the cost of manufacture.

Sale—Contract for successive deliveries of goods—Failure of buyer to take delivery—Defence that goods previously delivered disconform to contract.—In an action of damages by a seller for breach of a contract for the supply of a specified quantity of goods, of which delivery was to be taken as required, subject to the proviso that delivery of the whole should be taken before a certain date, the buyer sought to justify his failure to take delivery on the ground that particular lots of goods delivered under the contract had not been of the stipulated quality. Opinion per Lord Adam that the defence was relevant, although at the date when he should have taken delivery the buyer was not aware of the defect in the goods previously supplied.

Observations per Lord McLaren as to the right of a buyer, who has contracted for goods to be supplied to him by successive deliveries, to rescind the contract on the ground that particular consignments made under the contract were not of the stipulated quality.

Process—Amendment of record—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 29.—In an action of damages by a seller for breach of a contract of sale by the buyer failing to take delivery in terms thereof, the pursuer in his record as originally framed stated the damage he had suffered to be "the difference between the contract price and the current price" of the goods sold at the date of the alleged breach. After the Lord Ordinary had taken the case to avizandum on a proof, the pursuer proposed to amend his condescendence by substituting for the averment above quoted the following:—"The loss of profit occasioned to the pursuers through the said breach of contract amounts to the sum sued for."

No. 63.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.,
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Pearson) that the amendment was competent.

By offer and acceptance dated respectively 8th and 17th March 1892, the Govan Rope and Sail Company contracted with Andrew Weir & Company, shipowners, Glasgow, to supply them with 20 tons of manilla rope.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

The offer of the Govan Rope and Sail Company was in these terms:—"We offer you, say 20 tons pure manilla rope at £34 per ton, less 5% dist., 1/mo., free delivery U.K. or usual Continental ports. To be taken up as required by you, but on the understanding that you will give us a share of your orders regularly, and not keep it all back until your other contracts are completed."

The acceptance was as follows:—"We accept offer made us to-day for 20 tons of manilla rope of not lower quality than good seconds, at £34 p. ton, delivered to our ships U.K. or Continent free. Terms, monthly account, less 5% discount."

Only about half a ton of rope having been taken up by Andrew Weir & Company under the contract, the Rope Company complained that they were not duly implementing the contract. Subsequently certain alterations were made on the original contract. These alterations were specified in the following letter, dated 2d March 1894, by the agents of the Rope Company to the agents of Andrew Weir & Company:—"We have yours of yesterday. We confirm the arrangement come to, viz., that your clients complete their contract with ours by the close of the current year, our clients supplying yours with 'current' hemp in place of that originally contracted for."

By the end of the year 1894 Andrew Weir & Company had only ordered and taken delivery of about 5½ tons of rope.

The Govan Rope Company accordingly, in November 1895, brought the present action against Andrew Weir & Company for payment of £182, 4s. 1d., as damages for breach of contract.

They averred,—(Cond. 5) "The difference between the contract price and the current price of the same quality of rope, as at 31st December 1894, amounted to . . . the sum now sued for."

The defenders denied the alleged breach of contract, and stated that the non-implement of the contract was due to the pursuers having supplied them with an inferior quality of rope in November 1894, for the "River Falloch," and in April 1894 for the "Gowanbank."

They pleaded;—(2) The fulfilment of the contract having been prevented by the pursuers' failure to supply rope of the quality therein stipulated for, the defenders should be assoilzied.

A proof before answer was allowed. The pursuers led evidence to shew that the difference between the contract price of the 14½ tons of "current" hemp rope of which delivery had not been taken under the contract and the cost of the raw material delivered in Glasgow, plus cost of manufacture, was £144, 5s. 6d. The pursuers did not keep rope made of the quality of hemp known as "fair currents" in stock, but manufactured it on receiving an order.

No. 63.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.,
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

The defenders led evidence with the object of shewing that the pursuers had supplied them on four occasions with rope inferior to the quality stipulated for in the contract, but failed to prove that the rope supplied had been disconform to the contract except in one instance (i.e., the rope supplied to the "River Falloch" in October 1894), and on that occasion it appeared the defenders had agreed (by letter of 6th November 1894) to carry on the contract "in the meantime," on the understanding that the defective rope was taken back and replaced with rope of the stipulated quality, and the matter was settled on that footing. It was admitted that on the other three occasions the defenders only acquired knowledge of the alleged defective character of the rope after 31st December—the date by which they should have taken delivery of the whole quantity contracted for. It also appeared that in July 1895, after the pursuers had intimated their intention to claim damages, a small quantity of rope was ordered and delivered under the contract.

After the case had been taken by the Lord Ordinary to avizandum on the proof, the pursuers were allowed to amend the record by deleting the averment in cond. 5 above quoted, and substituting therefor the following,—“The loss of profit occasioned to the pursuer through said breach of contract amounts to the sum sued for.”

On 27th June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) decerned against the defenders for payment of £144, 5s. 6d.*

* “OPINION.—(After narrating the facts as given above with regard to the constitution and subsequent alteration of the contract, and the amount of rope of which the defenders had taken delivery)—The pursuers now sue for damages on the ground of the defenders’ failure to take full delivery. The measure of damages originally stated on record was ‘the difference between the contract price and the current price of the same quality of rope as at 31st December 1894.’ The measure of damage to which the proof was directed is the difference between the contract price of the 14½ tons, or £493, and the cost of the raw material delivered in Glasgow plus cost of manufacture, or £348, 14s. 6d. That difference is £144, 5s. 6d. The defenders objected to this change of front on the pursuers’ part, but made no motion for time to meet the pursuers’ evidence on the subject, and I think these figures may fairly be taken as correct whether as applied to the date limited by the contract, or to the year 1894 generally, or to July 1895. The case of Russell, Hope, & Company, 7th December 1895, was referred to as shewing the incompetency of amending the record to the effect proposed, but the circumstances there necessitated an amendment of the conclusions of the summons by the addition of an alternative conclusion for an amount larger than any of the four sums originally sued for. Here there is no such necessity.

“The defenders further object to the measure of damages thus resorted to by the pursuers as being untenable in law. They maintain that the true measure of damages in such a case is not loss of profit on the particular contract, but the difference between contract price and market value at the date of the breach. The latter test is appropriate where the seller either keeps the goods in stock, or buys them in forma specifica to enable him to fulfil his contract for delivery; but it does not apply in the case of the seller being a manufacturer of the contract goods, and making them up out of the raw material from time to time as deliveries are asked for, which was the position of the sellers here as regards the quality of rope to be supplied under this contract. It appears to me that the criterion of damage now adopted by the pursuers is in accordance with the principle which governs the whole law on the subject, namely, that the party observing the contract

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—1. The pursuers' failure to supply rope of the contract quality to the "River Falloch," had prevented the defenders from implementing the contract, and the pursuers had therefore no right to sue for breach of contract. Further, it was proved that rope of inferior quality had been supplied on other occasions, and the defenders could found upon the pursuers' failure on these occasions to supply rope conform to the contract, although knowledge of its inferiority had not been acquired by them until after the 31st December 1894. 2. The measure of damage now proposed by the pursuers was not admissible. The true measure was the difference between the contract and market price at the date of the breach of contract,¹ the duty of a seller, where a buyer failed to implement a contract of sale, being to go into the market and sell his goods at the market price. 3. In any case, the claim of damages now made was made on a different basis from that in the original record, which was remitted to probation, and the amendment was therefore incompetent.²

No. 63.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.,
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The defenders had failed to fulfil their contract. They had also failed to prove any breach on the pursuers' part to justify their refusal to implement it. Further, in a continuing contract for successive deliveries of goods, the buyer was not entitled to repudiate the contract on the ground that a single consignment was defective, unless the seller maintained that it was up to contract quality, or the buyer could shew in some way that the defects of which they complained would exist in future consignments.³ Nor could the buyer justify a failure on his part to take delivery by a breach of contract on the seller's part of which the buyer was not aware at the date when delivery should have been taken. The pursuers were therefore entitled to damages. The small quantity of goods delivered in July 1895 could not be held to amount to a waiver of the pursuers' right to demand damages. (2) The true measure of damage was that now claimed. The goods in question not being kept in stock by the pursuers or other ropemakers, but only made to order, loss of the profit which would have been earned on the contract was the direct and natural result of the breach of contract.⁴ (3) The case of Russell, Hope, & Co.,² was inapplicable, for in the present case no larger sum was claimed by the amendment than had been claimed before. The amendment was therefore competent.

is to be put as nearly as possible in the same position as he would have been if the contract had been performed.

"The defenders, however, take up this position, that the pursuers were themselves in breach of the contract, and that, in the circumstances, they were justified in declining to requisition for further deliveries within the contract period, and the pursuers are barred from recovering damages. (His Lordship then reviewed the evidence as to the pursuers having delivered rope of inferior quality in breach of the contract.)

"On the whole, I hold that the counter case set up for the defenders has failed, and that the pursuers are entitled to decree for the amount above mentioned, with expenses."

¹ Warin & Craven v. Forrester, Nov. 30, 1876, 4 R. 190, aff. June 5, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 75; Roper v. Johnson, 1873, L. R., 8 C. P. 167; Duff & Co. v. Iron and Steel Fencing and Buildings Co., Dec. 1, 1891, 19 R. 199.

² Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans, Dec. 7, 1895, 23 R. 256.

³ Turnbull v. McLean & Co., March 5, 1874, 1 R. 730.

⁴ Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 71), sec. 50, subsec. 2; Cort v. Ambergate Railway Co., 1851, 20 L. J. Q. B. 460.

No. 63. At advising,—

Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.,
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

LORD ADAM.—(After narrating the facts above stated as to the constitution and subsequent modification of the contract)—By the contract as thus modified therefor, the pursuers were bound to supply the defenders, in place of with good seconds, with “currents,” which was a better class of rope, and on the other hand the defenders were bound to implement the contract by taking delivery of the whole rope by 31st December 1894.

That being the contract it appears that, when that date arrived, the defenders had ordered and obtained delivery of about $5\frac{1}{2}$ tons of rope, leaving upwards of $14\frac{1}{2}$ tons of which they had not taken delivery. It is to recover damages in respect of the defenders’ alleged breach of contract in this respect that the present action has been raised. The defence on the merits is that the defenders were justified in not asking or taking delivery of the rope in question, because the rope which had been previously furnished to them by the pursuers under the contract was not of the quality contracted for, but of an inferior character, and no doubt if the defenders succeed in establishing this they will not be liable.

There are only two occasions specified on record on which the pursuers are said to have supplied bad or inferior rope to the defenders’ ships, one in October 1894 to the “River Falloch,” and the other in April 1894 to the “Gowanbank.”

As regards the case of the “River Falloch” it will be observed that the pursuers have never maintained that the rope supplied by them on that occasion was such as they were bound to supply under the contract. What they did maintain was that, as the rope was wanted in a hurry and required to be manufactured, they could not supply the rope as ordered, but that they had arranged with the defenders that a different rope should be supplied from their stores in Liverpool.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers have failed to prove this alleged special arrangement. But the matter was closed by a letter of date 6th November 1894 by the defenders to the pursuers’ agents, in which they say:—“We may say in the meantime we will carry on the contract with the Govan Rope and Sail Company, Limited (the pursuers), and on the understanding that they will take back the inferior quality of rope sent to the ship ‘River Falloch,’ and replace it with fair current quality as per contract.” The pursuers took back the rope sent to the ship and replaced it with rope according to contract, and so that matter was closed.

It appears to me that after this the defenders cannot found on the inferior rope sent to the “River Falloch” as a substantive ground for refusing to give further orders to the pursuers for rope—seeing that they say, in so many words, that they will still carry on the contract. No farther orders were however given before the end of the current year, when the contract terminated, and the pursuers thereupon intimated to the defenders their claim for damages for breach of contract.

It appears, however, that the pursuers had supplied ropes under the contract to other ships of the defenders, and particularly to the “Gowanbank” about the end of April or beginning of May 1894. It is now alleged that these ropes were of inferior quality and not according to contract. The ropes were accepted by the defenders at the time of delivery, but it is said that in the course of the voyage they proved to be of inferior quality. This the defenders say was not known to them until September 1895. It is clear therefore that the alleged inferior quality of these ropes could have had no influence on the conduct of the defenders in not fulfilling their contract. Nevertheless, I see no reason why, if the defenders are able to prove that the ropes in question were inferior and not according to contract, it should not found a good answer to the present claim.

The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defenders have failed to prove this, and I concur with him. (His Lordship then reviewed the evidence on this point.)

It farther appears that in July 1895 the defenders ordered, and the pursuers supplied, a small quantity of rope as under the contract. I do not think that the pursuers can, by having done so, be held to have abandoned their claim for damages for breach of contract. There is no plea to that effect stated on record. If the defenders had gone on ordering and the pursuers supplying rope the case might have been different. The defenders make no offer now to implement the contract by taking farther delivery of rope.

As regards the measure of damage, it was originally stated on record to be the difference between the contract price and the current price of the same quality of rope as at 31st December 1894. The pursuers were allowed by the Lord Ordinary to delete that, and to insert in place thereof a claim for the loss of profit occasioned to the pursuers through the breach of contract,—the reason for making the amendment, as I understand, being that there is no current or market price for the kind of rope contracted to be supplied with which the contract price can be compared.

It was objected that this amendment was incompetent. I do not think so. The 29th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868 enacts that the Court may at any time amend any error or defect in the record, and directs that all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for determining in the existing action the real question in controversy between the parties,—that is, in this case, the true amount of damage, if any, due to the pursuers. I think the amendment is necessary for that purpose, and does not subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum than is specified in the summons.

That being so, what the pursuers now claim as the loss of profit is the difference between the contract price of the 14½ tons and the cost of the raw material required for its manufacture, delivered in Glasgow, plus the cost of manufacture. I think this claim is right. I think in the words of the 50th section of the Sale of Goods Act of 1893, it is the loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the defenders' breach of contract. As I have already said, there is no current or market price for the goods in question with which the contract price can be compared.

I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am not sure that the law is clearly settled as to the remedy or remedies open to a purchaser under a continuing contract for the supply of goods at such times as he may require them. If on one occasion

No. 63.
Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

No. 63.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Govan Rope
and Sail Co.,
Limited, v.
Weir & Co.

the seller should tender goods inferior to contract quality, the purchaser would not in ordinary circumstances be justified in rescinding the whole contract, though he would be entitled to return the particular lot of goods which were objectionable. But if a seller systematically sends goods which are not conformable to contract, and the contract is for successive deliveries, I do not doubt that, where such conduct is persisted in, so as to make it evident that the seller does not intend to fulfil his contract, the purchaser may rescind the contract and refuse to take further deliveries.

That is the case which the purchasers allege in the present action. They say that all the ropes supplied to them were inferior to sample, and had one after the other to be sent back; that their ships were endangered by reason of defective cordage, and that accordingly they were entitled to rescind the contract of sale. It may be admitted that if the ropes supplied were of inferior quality, the remedy desired by the shipowners would be open to them; but it must be borne in mind that a buyer claiming right to rescind on such grounds must preserve evidence of the alleged faults. It does not appear from the report of the evidence, or from the log, that any care was taken to preserve evidence as to the quality of the rope complained of. On the contrary, it is plain to my mind that this objection was an afterthought, and was only put forward when the purchasers' ship returned home, and it was found inconvenient to take further supplies of rope under the contract.

I agree with Lord Adam in his statement of the case and in his conclusions. The defenders having failed to prove that the manilla rope supplied was systematically defective in quality, have broken their contract by refusing to take further deliveries of rope, and are liable in damages.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

J. A. CAIRNS, S.S.C.—J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

No. 64.

Jan. 19, 1897.*
Bell v. Galt.

JOHN BELL, Claimant (Appellant).—Hunter.

JAMES GALT, Objector (Respondent).—Blackburn.

Election Law—Burgh Franchise—Failure to pay poor-rates—Partial payment of consolidated rate without specific appropriation to poor-rate—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 3.—The claim of a person to be enrolled as a parliamentary voter was objected to on the ground that he had not paid the poor-rates due by him at the 15th of May preceding. In a case stated it appeared that the claimant had been assessed for 2s. 8d. of consolidated parish rates, of which 1s. 6d. was poor-rate, and that he had paid 2s. to account, but that he had not appropriated this payment to poor-rate. It was not stated that the collector had so appropriated it.

Held that the claimant had not paid the poor-rate, and was not entitled to be enrolled.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Kinneear.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

JOHN BELL, labourer, claimed to be registered as a voter for the burgh of Ayr, as inhabitant-occupier, as tenant of a dwelling-house at 14 Peebles Street.

James Galt objected to the claim on the ground that the appellant had failed to pay all poor-rates that were payable by him in respect of said dwelling-house, or as an inhabitant-occupier of Newton-on-Ayr, in the burgh of Ayr, for the year up to 15th May 1896, and was thus not entitled to be enrolled as a voter in the said burgh, as provided by section 3 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48).*

No. 64.
Jan. 19, 1897.
Bell v. Galt.

The Sheriff (Brand) sustained the objection, and rejected the claim, whereupon Bell asked and obtained a case for the Court of Appeal.

The facts were thus stated by the Sheriff:—

“The claimant was inhabitant-occupier, as tenant, of a house at 14 Peebles Street aforesaid for not less than twelve calendar months immediately preceding the 31st day of July 1896, and is still an inhabitant-occupier of said house as tenant.

“He was rated for the sum of 2s. 8d. as the total amount due by him in respect of poor, school, and cemetery assessments levied within the burgh of Ayr, and to be collected by the collector of the parish of Ayr, conform to notice in the terms following, viz.”:—The notice here quoted shewed that the assessment was for poor-rate 1s. 6d., school rate 1s., and cemetery rate 2d.

“The claimant made a partial payment of 1s. during the month of May, and a further payment of 1s. in June, and prior to the 20th of the said month.

“Nothing was said either in May or June by the claimant or by the collector as to the appropriation or allocation of these partial payments to any of the three rates included in the notice.

“The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal is,—Whether the poor-rates levied upon the claimant as aforesaid have been duly paid by him, and accordingly whether the claimant is duly entitled to be enrolled as a voter in the burgh of Ayr under the statute before mentioned?”

Argued for the appellant;—Under the peculiar circumstances of this case he was entitled to have his name put upon the roll. Although there had been no specific appropriation made with reference to any particular rate when the payments were made, primarily the collector was a collector of poor-rates; and as a disqualification attached to non-payment of poor-rates which had no place as regarded the non-payment of other rates, it fell to be decided that in dubio the payments made by the appellant were payments of poor-rates.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD KINNEAR.—In this case the Sheriff says that the claim was objected to on the ground that the appellant had failed to pay all the poor-rates that were payable by him in respect of his dwelling-house, or as an inhabitant-occupier of Newton-on-Ayr, in the burgh of Ayr, for the year up to 15th

* The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), section 3, enacted,—“Every man shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter for a burgh . . . provided that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter who at any time during the said period of twelve calendar months shall have been exempted from payment of poor-rates on the ground of inability to pay, or who shall have failed to pay, on or before the 1st day of August in the present or the 20th day of June in any subsequent year, all poor-rates (if any) that have become payable by him in respect of said dwelling-house, or as an inhabitant of any parish in said burgh up to the preceding 15th day of May.”

No. 64. May 1896, and was thus not entitled to be enrolled as a voter in the said burgh.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Bell v. Galt.

It is not disputed that he received due notice of the rates for which he was assessed, and therefore, if he has not in fact paid, he must be held to have failed to pay. That being the objection, the Sheriff goes on to say that he sustained it. I take that decision as a finding in fact that the appellant has not paid the rates; and if that is the Sheriff's finding in fact, I see no ground to interfere with his decision unless there is any legal obstacle to his giving effect to the facts.

Now, the appellant says that he was assessed for 2s. 8d. of consolidated rates, of which 1s. 6d. was for poor-rates, and that he paid one shilling in May, and another shilling before the 20th of June, and must therefore be held to have paid the poor-rate. Now, it is an admission in this case, that in making these payments the appellant did not appropriate them, or ask the collector to appropriate them, to the poor-rate. I do not think it is necessary to inquire whether he was entitled to appropriate them, for whether he was or not he did not do it. No appropriation seems to have been made at the time by the collector, and so far as the appellant knows, they never have been appropriated. Whether appropriation has in fact been made we do not know, and I think it is impossible to disagree with the Sheriff on the question of fact unless we are prepared to say that in law some appropriation must have been made by the collector. I see no ground for holding that in law these payments were appropriated to the poor-rates, and think, therefore, that the appeal should be refused.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur. I think there is a question of law here, whether in the circumstances the appellant can be held to have paid the poor-rates. I think there is a question of onus, and that it rests on the objector to shew that the rates have not been paid. The appellant brought money sufficient to pay the poor-rates. It is proved simply that he paid it without any statement as to which rate he was paying. If it could have been maintained that the poor-rate is preferable to the school-rate and the cemetery-rate, I think the case would have been a difficult one. But that case is not made; there is nothing but payment without appropriation, and I think it must be held that that payment must be spread proportionately over all the rates, and therefore that the poor-rates have not been fully paid.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 65. ROBERT WALLACE, Objector (Appellant).—Baxter—Lyon Mackenzie.
WILLIAM BORRIE AND ANOTHER, Claimants (Respondents).—
C. N. Johnston.

Jan. 19, 1897.*
Wallace v.
Borrie.

Election Law—Service Franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A constable residing in police barracks had

* Decided Nov. 28, 1896.

the exclusive use and occupation of a room, of which he kept the key. He slept in the room, and when off duty was entitled to use it and to receive visitors in it. Separate common rooms were provided in the barracks for meals and recreations. The right of the constable to the room was contingent on his remaining in the force, and the barracks were subject to the control of the chief-constable, who might at any time remove the constable from the barracks, order him to change his bedroom or keep certain hours, order him to give up the key of his room on ceasing to occupy it, forbid him to receive visitors in the room, and order him to open the door of his room so as to let any person in authority enter. Held that the constable inhabited the "dwelling-house" in the sense of section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884,* and that the "dwelling-house" was not inhabited by any person under whom he served, and that therefore he was entitled to be registered.

No. 65.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Wallace v.
Borrie.

Ballingal v. Menzies, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 127, followed; Barnett v. Hickmott, 1895, L. R., 1 Q. B. 691; and Clutterbuck v. Taylor, 1896, L. R., 1 Q. B. 395, distinguished.

At a Registration Court for the City of Glasgow, held at Glasgow, on 9th October 1896, Robert Wallace, 4 Adelphi Street, Glasgow, objected to William Borrie and Roderick Bowie, policemen, 6 East Clyde Street, having their names retained on the roll for the Blackfriars Division of the city, as tenant and occupant of houses at that address in virtue of service. Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) repelled the objection, and at the request of Wallace he stated a case as follows:—

"The following joint minute of admissions was adjusted by the parties, and states the facts of the case:—

"The persons objected to are police-constables in the Central Police Division. Each of the parties objected to has had during the whole of the qualifying period the exclusive occupation of one room. The barracks in which these rooms are situated accommodate eighty-two constables, each of whom has the exclusive use of one room, of which he keeps the key and has the sole control, subject to the orders of the chief-constable and the inspectors. Each constable has a key for his room. He sleeps in it at night, and sits in it by day when off duty. He is entitled to receive, and does receive, visitors in it. Separate rooms are provided for meals, &c. These latter are common to the whole constables living in the barracks. Two police inspectors also live in the barracks, and are responsible to the chief-constable for the maintenance of order, but the whole control of the building lies with the chief-constable.

"The right to their rooms of those constables who live in the barracks is contingent on their continuance in the police force. There is deducted from the wages of each constable the sum of 1s. 9d. per week for the use of the furnished bedroom and the common rooms. They are, along with all other constables in Glasgow, whether residing in barracks or in private houses, liable to be called out at any time on emergency arising. The two persons objected to have occupied the same rooms continuously during the whole qualifying period.'

* The Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3, enacted,—“Where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant.”

No. 65.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Wallace v.
Borrie.

"It is admitted that the chief-constable can:—(1) At any time remove a constable from the barracks; (2) order him to change his bedroom; (3) order him to keep certain hours; (4) order him not to receive visitors in his room; (5) order him not to take his meals in his room; (6) order him to give up his key on ceasing to occupy his room; (7) order him to open the door of his room if he is inside, so as to let the chief-constable, inspector, or other person in authority go in.

"I repelled the objections, holding that both the parties objected to were tenants under the service franchise, they occupying each a room of his own, and not a mere cubicle in a common room; that the point had been decided by a long series of Scotch cases—(Ballingal, 14 R. 127; Gay, 15 R. 90; Falconer, 19 R. 295; Walshe, 20 R. 83; Cruise, 20 R. 79; and Campbell, 23 R. 118); that the same point was decided in England in the case of Stribling (16 Q. B. D. 246); that the English cases of Barnett ([1895], 1 Q. B. 691) and Clutterbuck (Smith's Regn. Cases, I. 59) were to be distinguished from the present, as they applied not to rooms but to mere cubicles in a common room, open at the top, with common light and common air; and that the mere right of the chief constable to make the orders admitted in the joint minute was not sufficient to exclude the parties objected to from their right to a vote, any more than the right of a master to dismiss a servant from his employment in certain circumstances, and to make him vacate his room, would, if that right were not exercised, deprive the servant of the franchise.

"The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal is,—Whether policemen, who have been in the exclusive occupation of separate rooms for the whole of the qualifying period, under the circumstances and subject to the regulations contained in the joint minute of admissions, are entitled to be retained on the roll of voters as tenants of houses in virtue of the Representation of the People Acts?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute's decision went further than any previous case in sustaining the service franchise. The regulations and restrictions on the constable's occupancy embodied in the joint minute were inconsistent with the inhabitant-occupancy referred to in section 3 of the Act of 1884. The Scots cases to which the Sheriff-substitute referred were decided upon the authority of Stribling v. Halse,¹ which had since its date been discredited in *Barnett v. Hickmott*² and Clutterbuck v. Taylor.³

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD KINNEAR.—We do not think it necessary to ask for a reply in this case. I appreciate the observations cited to us from the opinion of the Lord Chief-Justice in the case of *Barnett v. Hickmott*² upon the case of Stribling v. Halse,¹ but I concur, if I may say so, in the observation of that learned Judge, that *Stribling v. Halse*¹ ought to be followed so far as it extends. I think this case is ruled by Ballingal v. Menzies,⁴ and I am unable to see any substantial distinction between that decision and this. I

¹ Stribling v. Halse, 1885, L. R., 16 Q. B. Div. 246.

² Barnett v. Hickmott [1895], L. R., 1 Q. B. 691.

³ Clutterbuck v. Taylor [1896], L. R., 1 Q. B. 395.

⁴ Ballingal v. Menzies, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 127.

agree also with the Sheriff that the facts here are to be distinguished from those in *Barnett v. Hickmott*¹ and Clutterbuck v. Taylor.² What was there decided was a question, not of separate rooms in one building, but of separate cubicles in a common room. This is a different case altogether, and I think that we ought to sustain the decision of the Sheriff.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN BERTRAM KELLIE, Objector (Appellant).—A. J. Young. No. 66.
ROBERT ELLIOT LITTLE, Claimant (Respondent).—James Ferguson.

Election Law—Lodger Franchise—Evidence of value—Valuation-roll—Declaration as evidence of qualification—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 4—Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 16), sec. 14.—The Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 4, enacted,—“Every man shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter . . . who . . . (2) as a lodger has occupied in the same burgh separately and as sole tenant for the twelve months preceding the last day of July in any year, lodgings of the clear annual value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards.”

The Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, sec. 14, enacted,—“In the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger, the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall for the purposes of revision be prima facie evidence of his qualification.”

A person claimed to be registered as a lodger in respect of the occupation of two rooms and a surgery in a house. The rent for the furnished lodgings payable by the claimant was 8s. a week, amounting to £20, 16s. per annum. An objection was taken that the yearly rent of the whole house (as shewn by the Valuation-roll) was £5, and that the value of the lodgings, which formed only part of the house, could not therefore be of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10. The Sheriff, proceeding on the rent actually paid for the lodgings, held that as matter of fact they were of the statutory value, and admitted the claim.

The Court refused an appeal, holding that the entry in the Valuation-roll was only an element in the proof, and that the Sheriff was not thereby precluded from forming his own judgment on the value of the rooms occupied by the claimant, and that there was no ground in law for interfering with the Sheriff's decision on the question of fact.

At a Registration Court for the county of Berwick, held at Greenlaw on 30th September 1896, Robert Elliot Little, physician and surgeon, claimed to be enrolled on the Register of Voters for the county, as occupant of lodgings consisting of two rooms and surgery in a house in Station Road, Gordon.

John Bertram Kellie, accountant, Rosebank, Duns, a voter on the roll, objected to the claim on the ground that the yearly rent of the house being less than £10, the lodgings, being a part thereof, could not be of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dundas) admitted the claim, and Kellie

¹ L. R., 1 Q. B. 691.

² L. R., 1 Q. B. 395.

No. 66. thereupon asked and obtained a case, in which the Sheriff-substitute made the following statements :—

Jan. 19, 1897.
Kellie v.
Little.

"The following facts were admitted :—(1) The annual value of the house, of which the said two rooms and surgery are a part, appears in the Valuation-roll of the county at £5. (2) The furnished rent paid by the claimant for said two rooms and surgery is 8s. per week. (3) The claimant is on the Register of Voters for the year 1895-96 in respect of his occupation of the same lodgings.

"The rent paid by the claimant for the lodgings being £20, 16s. a year, I was of opinion, in accordance with previous decisions in similar cases in this county, that one-half thereof was sufficient for the use of furniture and for attendance, leaving the other half, or £10, 8s., for the rent of the rooms alone. . . ."

"The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal is,—Whether, the annual value of the said house being less than £10, the said lodgings therein, which are let furnished for 8s. per week, can be held to be of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards?"

Argued for the appellant ;—It was clear upon the statement of the case that the Sheriff-substitute had held, without evidence to justify it, that the lodgings were of the yearly value of £10. But the Valuation-roll was the conclusive test of value, and the Sheriff-substitute should have proceeded upon what he found in it, and should have rejected the claim.

Argued for the respondent ;—The decision of the Sheriff-substitute must, in accordance with an unreported case of Mackenzie v. Menzies in 1892, be taken to be final as a finding in fact. But in any view he had rightly held, having regard to section 14 of the Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, that the claimant's declaration was prima facie evidence of his qualification, and he had found in fact that £10, 8s. was the actual rent paid for the rooms. The Valuation-roll was not the statutory test of the value of the lodgings.¹

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—If we were to consider the question which the Sheriff has stated for our decision, without reference to the preceding statement of facts, I should have some difficulty in answering it, and indeed in ascertaining the precise point of law which it is intended to raise. But the statement of facts appears to me to remove any difficulty of this kind. It appears that the claimant claimed to be enrolled as occupant of lodgings, consisting of two rooms and a surgery in a house in the parish of Gordon ; that the rent which he pays for these rooms as furnished is 8s. a week, and that an objection has been stated to the claim on the ground that the yearly rent of the entire house as appearing on the Valuation-roll is less than £10. The statutory qualification for the lodger franchise requires that the voter shall, for the twelve months preceding the last day of July in any year, have occupied lodgings of "a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards." There is no specific direction in the Act conferring the franchise as to the mode in which this value is to be ascertained, but in the 14th section of the Registration Act, 1885, it is provided that in the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger, the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall, for the purpose of revision, be prima facie evidence of his qualification. This is a material distinction between the lodger qualification and those other qualifications in burghs or counties for which the Valuation-roll is either prima facie evidence or conclusive. Since nothing is said to the contrary, we must assume that the claimant in this case made the proper statutory declaration, and accordingly that he has furnished prima facie evidence of his qualification. To this the Sheriff adds,—that in his opinion one-half of the rent paid by the claimant,—that is, one-half of £20, 16s.,—is sufficient for the use of the furniture and attendance, leaving the other half, or £10, 8s., for the rent of the rooms alone, the only objection to this decision being that which I have already stated. Now, that is the Sheriff's finding in fact, and the case discloses nothing against it except the statement that the annual value of the house of which the claimant's rooms are a part appears in the Valuation-roll of the county at £5. I therefore understand the question of law which the Sheriff has stated for our decision to be, whether it is conclusive against the admission of the claim that the annual value of the house of which the claimant occupies a part only appears on the Valuation-roll to be less than £10. I am of opinion that this is not a sufficient objection. The claimant's name is not entered on the Valuation-roll, and that roll does not purport to set forth the value of his lodgings; and, therefore, even if the entries which are actually to be found were conclusive for the purposes of this case, there would still remain a question of fact, and not of law, viz., what is the yearly value of the claimant's lodgings? Now, it does not appear to be an incredible hypothesis that persons may take a house on lease with the view of letting it in rooms as lodgings, and with the hope of obtaining a larger rent from their lodgers than they have themselves to pay to their landlord. But whether that may be or not is a question of fact, and not of law. But then the Valuation-roll is not conclusive, because the statute requires the Sheriff to start from a totally different basis, viz., the claimant's own statement, as prima facie evidence. That is evidence which may be rebutted by contrary evidence which may be adduced by an objector, and I do not doubt that for that purpose the objector may found on the Valuation-roll. But then when it is adduced, the Valuation-roll is not conclusive. It is only one item of evidence to be taken into account along with other evidence in determining the question of fact which the Sheriff has to decide.

¹ Stevenson v. Miller, Nov. 13, 1880, 20 R. 8 ; Brown v. Blackwood, Oct. 20, 1869, 8 Macph. 8.

The Valuation-roll, therefore, does not, in my opinion, afford any ground in law for overruling the Sheriff's judgment upon a question of fact. The question he had to consider was, whether the lodgings occupied by the claimant are fairly worth £10 a year if let unfurnished. The value of the house may be one element to be taken into account in deciding that question, but it is not conclusive; and if, taking all the circumstances together, the Sheriff was of opinion that the lodgings would generally fetch a rent of £10, 8s., I think that he was justified in admitting the claim. I express no opinion on the question of fact, but taking the Sheriff's decision to be as I have stated it, I think the entry in the Valuation-roll affords no ground in law for setting it aside. I am therefore for affirming the decision of the Sheriff.

No. 66.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Kellie v.
Little.

No. 66. LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIDNEY concurred.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Kellie v.
Little.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 67. THOMAS WOOD AND OTHERS, Claimants (Appellants).—A. J. Young —Macaulay Smith.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Wood v.
Laing.

THOMAS LAING (Respondent).—Boyd.

Election Law—Appeal—Jurisdiction—Municipal Roll—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 22.—Held that the Registration Appeal Court has no jurisdiction under sec. 22 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, to entertain an appeal from a judgment of the Sheriff in adjusting the list of voters for a municipal election.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Kinnear.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
caidney.

At a Registration Court for the city of Edinburgh, held on 8th October 1896, Thomas Wood and others claimed to have their names put on the list of persons entitled to vote at the next municipal election for the City and Royal Burgh of Edinburgh under section 17 of the Edinburgh Municipal Extension Act, 1896.*

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) repelled the claims.

The claimants obtained a case, and appealed to the Registration Appeal Court.

At the hearing of the appeal, counsel for the appellants was requested by the Court to address himself to the question whether the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, seeing that the Sheriff-substitute's decision related to the municipal and not to the parliamentary roll. Counsel thereupon cited section 22† of the Repre-

* The Edinburgh Municipal Extension Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. c. ccciii.), enacts, sec. 17,—“In addition to the register of voters for Members of Parliament for the existing burgh, and the register and lists of voters for municipal elections in the existing burgh, which shall be made up and completed as at present, the assessor for the existing burgh under the Election Acts shall, on or before the 15th day of September in the year 1896, and in every subsequent year, make out, or cause to be made out, a list of all persons in the districts annexed who shall be entitled to vote in the election of councillors for the city and royal burgh, and the same procedure shall be applicable and be followed in reference to such list as is followed with reference to the said register of voters for Members of Parliament for the existing burgh, and the said register and lists of voters for municipal elections in the existing burgh. And on such lists being completed and lodged with the town-clerk, the town-clerk shall sign the same; and the last mentioned lists, and the register and lists of voters for the existing burgh, shall together form the list or roll of persons entitled to vote at the next ensuing municipal election for the city and royal burgh. . . .”

† The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 22, enacted,—“All enactments at present in force regarding appeals from the judgments of Sheriffs in Registration Courts for counties and burghs are hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is enacted as follows:—‘If any person whose name shall have been struck out of any register or list of voters by the Sheriff, or who shall claim or object before the Sheriff at any Court, shall consider the decision of the Sheriff on his case to be erroneous in point of law, he may, either himself or by some person on his behalf, in open Court, require the Sheriff to state the facts of the case and such question of law and his decision thereon in a special sensation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, and argued that the appeal was competent. No. 67.

Jan. 19, 1897.
Wood v.
Laing.

LORD KINNEAR.—This Court is the Court established for the purpose of hearing appeals under the 22d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48). That is a provision for appeals from the decisions of Sheriffs in revising the roll of electors for parliamentary purposes. That section is the sole source of jurisdiction to which we have been referred. We have asked the counsel for the appellants whether there was any other statutory provision on which they can found as enabling us to entertain this appeal, and they say that there is none. We have been in the habit of reviewing the decisions of Sheriffs in striking a name off or adding a name to the parliamentary roll. But the decision, and the only decision, here is one by which the Sheriff has rejected the claim of the appellant to be entered as a voter on the roll for municipal purposes. We have no jurisdiction under the 1868 Act to review the decision of a Sheriff in regard to the municipal roll which I have mentioned, and counsel have been unable to shew that we have such jurisdiction from any other source. I think therefore we must dismiss the appeal on the ground that it has not been shewn that this Court, which is a Court sitting for special purposes, has jurisdiction to entertain it.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal as incompetent, and decern."

DAVID CRAWFORD, S.S.C.—THOMAS HUNTER, W.S.—Agents.

WALTER MACKAY, Pursuer (Appellant).—G. Watt—Blair.
JOHN WATSON, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Salvesen.
JOHN BOLTON, Defender (Respondent).—A. Moncrieff.

No. 68.

Jan. 20, 1897.
Mackay v.
John Watson,
Limited.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Relevancy—Proximate cause of injury—Allegation of incompetency of fellow-servant.—A pit-bottomer sued his employers and the engineman at the pit for damages for personal injuries, averring that while the pursuer was engaged at the bottom of the pit in replacing a hutch on the rails close to the cage, the engineman at the pit-head, without awaiting a signal, raised the cage, which caught the pursuer and forced him upwards between the shaft and the scaffolding for three feet before the engine was stopped, and that he was thereby injured. He further averred that the derailment of the hutch was caused by defects in the rails, and that there was a defect in the checking power of the engine which prevented or hindered or interfered with its prompt stopping . . .

case; and the Sheriff shall prepare and sign and date such special case, and deliver the same in open Court to the Sheriff-clerk or the town-clerk, as the case may be; and such person, or some person on his behalf, may thereupon in open Court declare his intention to appeal against the said decision, and may within ten days of the date of such special case, lay a certified copy thereof before the Court of Appeal hereinafter constituted for their decision; and the said Court shall, with all convenient speed, hear parties and give their decision on such special case, and shall specify exactly every alteration or correction, if any, to be made upon the register in pursuance of such decision."

No. 68. and that the engineman was not sufficiently qualified for the duties entrusted to him.

Jan. 20, 1897. Mackay v. John Watson, Limited. Held that there were no relevant averments of fault against the employers in respect that (1) the pursuer's averments shewed that the derailment of the hutch was not the proximate cause of the accident, and (2) the averments of defect in the engine and the want of sufficient experience on the part of the engineman were not sufficiently specific.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

WALTER MACKAY, bottomer, Earnock Colliery, Hamilton, raised this action in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, against his employers, John Watson, Limited, and John Bolton, engineman in the colliery. The pursuer concluded against John Watson, Limited, for payment of £500, or £186 under the Employers Liability Acts, and against Bolton for £500, or otherwise against both jointly and severally, or severally, for £500.

The pursuer averred that on 29th July 1896 he was engaged with another man at the bottom of the pit in replacing a hutch which had fallen off the rails close to the cage, and that while lifting the hutch with his back to it he was caught by the cage in front, which, without warning, began to ascend. That the pursuer was forced up about three feet between the cage and the back scaffolding, and was seriously injured.

The pursuer further averred that the derailment of the hutch was caused by the defective state of the rails. "The pursuer believes and avers that there was a defect in the checking power of the engine, which prevented or hindered or interfered with its prompt stopping. . . . Denied that the engineman was sufficiently qualified for the duties entrusted to him, his previous experiences not warranting such a responsible position."

This last sentence was in reply to statement for John Watson, Limited, in answer 6,—“The said John Bolton was competent to act as winding engineman.” (Cond. 7) “In consequence of the defective condition of the defenders’ (John Watson, Limited’s) plant at the pit bottom as described, and in the engine, or in the brake, and the want of sufficient qualification on the part of the engineman, the pursuer received the injuries complained of. The defenders the said John Watson, Limited, are responsible for the defect complained of, and for reparation for the injuries sustained in consequence by the pursuer.” (Cond. 8) “Alternatively, the other defender John Bolton, who acted as engineman, and in charge of the engine at the said pit by which the cages were lifted and lowered, is responsible for the injuries sustained by the pursuer, and liable in reparation to him therefor. The defender, as engineman, when working his engine for regulating the position of the two cages in the shaft of the pit, lifted the cage at which the pursuer was engaged without receiving a signal to do so, or otherwise so worked the engine under his charge in the condition in which it then was in an improper manner. By lifting the cage without receiving a signal, or by his want of care or mismanagement, or want of sufficient control of his engine, the said defender, as engineman foresaid, caused the injuries to the pursuer.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The plant of the defenders John Watson, Limited, having been defective, or the want of sufficient qualification of their engineman, for whom they are responsible, and thereby leading to and inducing the injuries sustained by the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to damages against them either at common law or under the Employers Liability Act as libelled.

The defenders John Watson, Limited, pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer's statements and action are irrelevant. No. 68.

The Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) pronounced this interlocutor :—
 “ Having heard parties' procurators and made avizandum, repels the first plea in law for the defenders John Watson, Limited : Allows a proof before answer quoad them, and a proof quoad the other defender.” * Jan. 20, 1897.
Mackay v.
John Watson,
Limited.

The pursuer appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session for jury trial.

The defenders John Watson, Limited, maintained their first plea in law, and argued ;—Under the Employers Liability Act no relevant case had been stated against them. Neither were there relevant averments at common law. No ground of fault was alleged against them which contributed to the accident. It was not their duty to supply rails which would never go out of repair. This must happen sometimes, and even admitting that the rails were defective, the pursuer made it clear that this fact was not the cause of the accident. While it was true that the accident would not have happened had the rails been good, it was also true that it would not have happened unless the cage had been raised. The engineman raised it without a signal ; this was a fault, and it was this which was the cause of the accident ; but as the engineman was a fellow-servant of the pursuer the defenders were not liable. Regarding the defect in the engine, the averments were not sufficiently specific. Besides, the averments shewed that there was a fair checking power, for the cage was only raised three feet before it was checked. Further, the pursuer failed to aver that with perfect checking power the accident would not have occurred. This ground of objection was only competent if the engineman had properly started the engine, but the basis of the action was that the engine was improperly started. The defect could only be very remotely the cause of the accident, because it would have been unnecessary to check the engine unless the engineman had been in fault. The averments respecting the engineman's qualification were irrelevant. No particulars were stated. A master did not warrant a servant as competent. It was enough if he exercised reasonable care to select a competent man. The mere fact of this one mistake was not proof of his incapacity.

Argued for the pursuer ;—There was a relevant averment of defect in the rails, and it was plain that this was the cause of the accident, for owing to their disrepair it was necessary for the pursuer to assume a position in which he was liable to injury should the cage be raised by mistake, which was quite likely to happen. He was hurt while restoring defective plant of his employers, who were accordingly liable to him in damages.¹ If a servant is subjected to risk from a

* “ NOTE.—I am very doubtful if the pursuer has a relevant ground of action against John Watson, Limited, on the ground that the engine was not in proper order, for he is not clear in his statement as to how any defect in the engine affected him, his case being evidently that the engineman started the cage without a signal. I do not think that the alleged defect in the rails is relevant, because the accident cannot be said to be directly due to it even if the pursuer's averments are all made good. But he has a statement that the engineman was not a sufficiently qualified person for his post through lack of experience, and it seems to me that he is entitled to a proof on that point.”

¹ Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Co., Limited, June 23, 1892, 19 R. 915.

No. 68. defect for which the master is responsible, the latter cannot plead collaborateur even although the fault of a fellow-servant is the proximate cause of the accident.¹

Jan. 20, 1897.
Mackay v.
John Watson,
Limited.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are three points raised here in the condemnation. The first is, that the rails close to this place at the pit-bottom, where the hutches had to be put on to the cage, were in a defective state, and that, in consequence of their being in a defective state, the injured man had to do something to put them right, which brought him into such a position that if the cage was moved at the time he was in that position he might be caught and injured. The second point stated is that the engine was defective as regards its checking power. And the third point is that the engineman was not sufficiently qualified.

Now, as regards the first, it appears to me that, assuming the defects as stated by the pursuer, they do not constitute an averment of proximate cause of the accident at all. The cage was at the bottom of the pit, resting there, and the engineman had no duty, and no right, to move that cage at all until he received a proper signal from the pursuer himself, who was the bottomer, and who was responsible to give the directions for the starting of the cage from the bottom. Therefore no movement of the cage could be expected. Such a movement could only happen by the fault of someone. Therefore, so far as I can see, there was no proximate danger to the pursuer at all from the cage. If, of course, while he was occupied in that particular piece of work the cage was improperly moved, a situation of danger arose at once, created entirely by the breach of duty of the person who moved it. That this is a relevant case against the engineman I have no doubt whatever; but I cannot see how it can be held a relevant case against the defenders Watson, Limited. It is quite true it is alleged that there were defects in the rails, but that, as I think, cannot be held to be a proximate cause of the accident which happened.

Then, as regards the engine, there is no specific averment—no averment that can be remitted to probation at all—for it is not said in what any defect in the engine consisted. Anything required to check the running of the rope could not have been of much use here, because if the engine was started at all it must go some distance, and being started it moved the cage, in point of fact, only three feet, and in doing so caught the pursuer and injured him.

Lastly, there is an averment which certainly would have been a perfectly relevant ground for charging the defenders Watson, Limited, with the consequences of the accident which occurred, if stated properly and distinctly, and with that specification which the defenders are entitled to in such circumstances, viz., that the engineman was not a person fit to be in charge of the engine. But the only averment of that is that the accident occurred in consequence of the defective condition of the rails, and the want of sufficient qualification on the part of the engineman. That is all that is averred upon that matter, except in answer to defenders' statements, where it is said that the engineman's previous experience was not such as to warrant him being placed in such a responsible position. I do not think that is an averment suitable or sufficient for our sending the case to trial against the employers of this engineman on the ground that he is not fit for his duty.

¹ Murdoch v. Mackinnon, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 810; Edgar v. Law & Brand, Dec. 15, 1871, 10 Macph. 236, per Lord Ardmillan, p. 240.

No. 68.

Jan. 20, 1897.
Mackay v.
John Watson,
Limited.

Therefore I think we ought to hold this summons irrelevant, in so far as it professes to make a case against the employers Watson, Limited. As regards the engineman, of course, there is no objection to send the case to trial. He is alleged to have committed a breach of duty, and he is liable if he injured anybody thereby. The case must therefore go to trial as against him.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also agree. I think that in this record there is no relevant averment inferring liability on the part of John Watson, Limited. The two averments that are intended to strike at them are the insufficiency of the rails, in the first place, and the want of qualification in the engineman, in the second. With regard to the first, it appears to me that there is nothing set forth in the record to connect the faulty condition of the rails with the accident that took place. So far as averment goes, the alleged defective state of the rails was not the cause of the pursuer's injuries, which are said to have resulted from the improper conduct of the engineman, which conduct was not influenced or affected by the state of the rails. With regard to the second, the pursuer's averments are wanting in sufficient specification. It is not enough merely to say that the engineman was not qualified. The defenders are entitled to know in what respect it is alleged that the engineman was not qualified, in order that they may meet the case so far as it is based on this ground. They are entitled to know in what respect it is alleged that they failed in their duty in selecting a proper man for the place of engineman. I therefore think with your Lordship that there is no relevant case here averred against John Watson, Limited, and that the action must be dismissed as against them.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree, and have the less hesitation in doing so, that it appears from the petition that originally the only ground of action against John Watson, Limited, was the defective state of the rails, and that ground of action, I agree with your Lordships, is not sufficient.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the first plea in law for the defenders John Watson, Limited, dismiss the action, and disallow the issue against them, and decern: Find them entitled to expenses," &c.

ROBERT MACDOUGALD, S.S.C.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—
Agents.

No. 69. THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF THE BURGH OF KILMARNOCK, Pursuers (Appellants).—Ure—Wilson.

Jan. 22, 1897.
Magistrates of
Kilmarnock v.
Reid.

WILLIAM ANDREW REID, Defender (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—James Reid.

Process—Failure to execute contract—Averments of Fraud—Proof—Remit to man of skill—Competency.—A contractor executed certain excavation and drainage work for the owners of a cemetery under a specification prepared by the owners' engineers, which provided that the work was to be executed under the directions of and to the entire satisfaction of the engineers. Two years after the work had been completed and duly certified by the engineers, the owners presented a petition in the Sheriff Court against the contractor, in which they averred that the work done was dis-conform to contract in many important particulars, which they set forth, and that the defender, taking advantage of the absence of supervision on the part of the engineers, scamped the work, and "by means of fraudulent devices succeeded in palming off the work as being executed according to contract," and that there was urgent necessity for the work being completed forthwith in terms of the specification. The prayer of the petition was that the Sheriff should remit to a man of skill to inspect and value the work and report upon its present state, and also what was necessary to bring it into conformity with the specification; that the pursuers should be authorised to do whatever required to be done in accordance with such report, and to apply the balance of the contract price still in their hands to the completion of the work, in so far as it might be shewn by the reporter to be defective. The contractor lodged defences in which he denied the pursuers' averments.

Held that the action was incompetent.

Per the Lord President,—"No one would think of laying it down as a general proposition, that it is necessarily incompetent to grant a remit to a reporter to report on an existing state of facts unless both parties consent to the remit. The practice is quite against that, and recognises that there are cases, of a somewhat limited class, where, even though there may be objection, the Court does attempt to 'place on record,' as it is expressed, what is patent and visible to any accurate observer."

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.

IN July 1896 an action was raised in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire, at Kilmarnock, by the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of the burgh of Kilmarnock and the Parish Council of the parish, as the parties empowered to carry into execution the purposes of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, within the parish, against William Andrew Reid, contractor.

The prayer of the petition was:—"To remit to such person as the Court shall appoint to inspect the work at the new cemetery situated near Kay Park, Kilmarnock, executed by the defender for the pursuers or their predecessors under a contract in regard thereto between them, dated 16th and 30th June 1892, and to value the work which has been done by the defender under and in terms of said contract and relative specifications and schedule, and to report upon the present state of said work; also to report what, in the reporter's opinion, is still necessary to be done to complete and put the said work in a sufficient state in accordance with the provisions of the said contract and relative specifications and schedule; and upon such report being received, to grant warrant to the pursuers to proceed to carry out, at their own hands or otherwise, at the sight of the reporter, whatever work may require to be done in accordance with such report in order to complete the said work in conformity with the said contract, specifications, and schedule; and, on the expense of said work in connection with completing the contract as aforesaid, and also the expenses of this application and consequent procedure being ascertained and fixed by the Court, to authorise the pursuers to set off pro tanto against the said cost and expenses any sum at present in the hands of the pursuers remaining due or unpaid to the defender under or in connection with the said contract, and to find that the pursuers are not liable to the defender except to the extent of any balance which may remain in their hands after meeting the said cost of completion and expenses as aforesaid, and to interdict the defender from interfering with the pursuers in any way in the completion of the said contract as aforesaid, and to reserve to the pursuers all claims competent against the defender, and against all others concerned, for whatever balance of cost of completing the work may remain after crediting, as aforesaid, any sum at present in their hands remaining due or unpaid to the defender, and also to reserve all claims of damages against the defender and others in connection with said contract and work."

No. 69.

Jan. 22, 1897
Magistrates of Kilmarnock v.
Reid.

The pursuers averred that they had acquired 6½ acres of additional ground for their cemetery at Kay Park, Kilmarnock. That they employed Messrs Mitchell & Laugharne, civil engineers, to prepare plans and specifications for the work in connection with this extension. That on 16th June 1892 the defender made a tender for the work which had to be done, and that the pursuers accepted the same "in terms of the specification." That the work was of the nature of excavation, drainage, and road-making, and that the specification contained provisions, inter alia, that the whole of the work should be executed to and under the directions of the engineers, and to their entire satisfaction.

The pursuers then averred that on 10th May 1894 the engineers forwarded to them the final measurements of the work done by the contractor, the sum due to him being certified as correct, and amounting to £1968, 16s., with the further addition of a sum of £143, 12s. 4d. for extra work rendered necessary by alterations in the plans. Of this sum £1800 had been paid to the defender on account, leaving a balance outstanding of £312, 8s. 4d.

(Cond. 15) "The pursuers or their authors or predecessors not being satisfied with the report furnished to them by the engineers, refused to pay the balance, and decided to employ a neutral engineer to go over the measurements and compare the same with the account as scheduled. They accordingly appointed Mr James Barr, civil engineer, Glasgow, for this purpose, and generally to test whether the work had been carried out in conformity with the plans and specification. As the result of examinations made by Mr Barr and of other investigations, the pursuers believe and aver that the drains have not been properly laid and connected; that they have not been laid at the depths stipulated for; that the pipes have not been cemented and jointed as specified; that the covering of ashes on the top of the under drainage is not to the stipulated depth; that the stones or other obstructions found in line of cutting drains have not been removed; and that the earth forming the ornamental plots is not of the character specified or of the depth stipulated for. The defender, taking advantage of the absence of supervision on the part of the engineers entrusted with the duty of superintending the work, deliberately set himself to scamp the work as after mentioned, made a mere pretence of executing it in accordance with the provisions of the

No. 69. specification, and, by means of fraudulent devices, succeeded in palming off the work as being executed in a workmanlike manner, and according to contract.”—(Here followed a statement of the particulars in which the work executed was disconform to the specification.) (Cond. 17) “The defender was well aware all along that he had not executed the works in terms of his contract, in the several respects before mentioned. He concealed, however, all of his said failures from the pursuers or their authors or predecessors, and claimed and accepted payment of the instalments of the contract price on the fraudulent representation that he had in every respect observed the conditions of the contract, and done all the work conform to contract requirements and measurements and of contract materials. If the defender had duly and properly or fairly performed his duties, the defects and failures now complained of could not have happened. The certificates granted to the defender were not accepted by the pursuers as final, and the payments made under them were simply provisional, and subject to adjustment at the final completion of the contract. Moreover, the said certificates and payments were obtained by the defender at the time by his said fraudulent representations, and by reason of his palming off the work as done in accordance with the contract as aforesaid. . . .” (Ans. 17) “Denied. . . . The whole work was carried out according to the instructions, and under the supervision of the engineers, and it was executed to and under their directions, and to their entire satisfaction. It was approved of by them from time to time, and certificates granted that it was carefully and well executed, and after completion the whole was accepted and passed by them as being conform to contract. . . .” (Cond. 18) “There is urgent necessity for additional lairs being at once provided in the said cemetery, and it is expedient that the contract work should be proceeded with and completed without further delay, in order that the new portion of the cemetery may be made available. In these circumstances, and in view of the position taken up by the defender as before explained, the pursuers are desirous to have the state of the contract work judicially ascertained, and to obtain authority thereafter to proceed to complete the work in terms of the contract and specifications.”

The defender averred in his statement of facts that in October 1895 the Magistrates of Kilmarnock had raised an action in the Court of Session against him and Messrs Mitchell & Laugharne for,—(1) performance of the contract in question in conformity with the specification, (2) with an alternative conclusion for damages; and that on 7th March 1896 Lord Kyllachy had sustained the defenders’ plea of no title to sue, and had dismissed the action.

To this averment the pursuers answered;—“Admitted that the action referred to was raised in the Court of Session, and was dismissed. Quoad ultra the closed record in that action is referred to for its terms, beyond which no admission is made. Explained and averred that, although it was the duty of the engineers to see that the work was duly executed, they failed to do so. The slightest inspection on their part would have revealed the fact that the defender was grossly and flagrantly disregarding the provisions of the contract. In point of fact, it is believed and averred that Mr Mitchell, who was the partner of the firm of Mitchell & Laugharne who took the chief superintendence of the work, was aware at the time of the various facts set forth in the condescendence, and of the deception which was being practised by the defender, and, nevertheless, failed either to have the work executed in terms of the contract, or to inform the pursuers of the said circumstances.”

No. 69.
Jan. 22, 1897.
Magistrates of
Kilmarnock v.
Reid.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers are entitled, ante omnia, to have the present state of the said contract works judicially ascertained, and to obtain judicial authority to complete the same, all as prayed for, in respect that questions have arisen between the parties as to whether the defender has duly implemented his contract, and as to the condition and value of the work done by him. (2) The defender having failed to execute the work undertaken by him in terms of his contract, and having refused to do so, the pursuers are entitled to obtain warrant for its inspection and due completion, and to the other warrants, all in manner prayed for.

The defender pleaded;—1. The action is incompetent. 2. The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. 3. The defender having (1) fulfilled his contract with the pursuers, and (2) not having acted fraudulently in carrying out the same, he is entitled to be assolizied.

On 11th November 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Hall) found that the pursuers had failed to set forth a relevant ground of action against the defender, and therefore sustained the defender's second plea in law, and dismissed the action.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The action was competent and relevant. It was competent for the Court to make the remit craved without requiring the consent of both parties.¹ The pursuers were desirous of having the existing state of the drains in question put upon record by a careful and competent reporter. The facts regarding them were of a “fugitive” character,² which it was desirable should be placed on record. Such remits had been made when the questions involved were the ascertainment of the meliorations,³ the existing condition of fences and buildings on a farm,⁴ or of the state of repair of premises.⁵ The facts to be here inquired into were exactly of the class in which remits were granted.⁶ The case of Muldoon v. Pringle,⁷ relied on by the defenders, was an authority for the pursuers. In it the contractor was held not entitled to recover payment of remaining instalments due to him in respect he had failed, as the defender had done here, to carry out his part of the contract. In any view there were not as in the present case averments of a conspiracy between the defender and the engineers.

Argued for the defender;—The action was incompetent. The general rule was that a remit to a reporter was not final unless it was consented to by both parties.⁸ There was nothing in the circumstances here to make a remit suitable.⁹ If the reference were one of

¹ Quin v. Garden & Sons, June 22, 1888, 15 R. 776, per Lord Shand, p. 780.

² Gordon's Trustees v. Melrose, June 25, 1870, 8 Macph. 906, per Lord Neaves, p. 909.

³ Fraser v. Mackay, Feb. 13, 1833, 11 S. 391, 5 Scot. Jur. 240.

⁴ Gordon's Trustees v. Melrose, supra, note 2.

⁵ Lees v. Marr Typefoundry Co., July 14, 1877, 4 R. 1088.

⁶ Lees' Sheriff Court Styles, pp. 135 and 136; Dove Wilson's Sheriff Court Practice, p. 267.

⁷ Muldoon v. Pringle, June 9, 1882, 9 R. 915.

⁸ Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 275.

⁹ Galbreath v. Taylor, Jan. 20, 1843, 5 D. 423, 15 Scot. Jur. 215; McGillivray v. Soutar, June 2, 1860, 32 Scot. Jur. 634.

No. 69. matter of law it was incompetent; if of matter of fact so as to bind the parties to the result, it could not be made without their consent, express or implied.¹ Here the matter which it was proposed to refer to the reporter was a mixed question of fact and law, both parties did not consent, and the question involved was not of a "fugitive" nature. The distinction the pursuers endeavoured to draw between this and Muldoon's case² was of no avail to them, because the averment of conspiracy between the defender and the engineers was not relevant, and even if it was, that would be the strongest reason for an inquiry conducted in the usual manner. As between the pursuers and defender, the engineers' certificate was final, but that did not solve the question between them and the engineers,³ and the pursuers were not entitled to obtain evidence under a remit for a future action against the engineers.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have to consider first of all whether this is a competent application, and the conclusion I have come to is that it is not. No one would think of laying it down as a general proposition that it is necessarily incompetent to grant a remit to a reporter to report on an existing state of facts unless both parties consent to the remit. The practice is quite against that, and recognises that there are cases of a somewhat limited class where, even though there may be objection, the Court does attempt to "place on record," as it is expressed, what is patent and visible to any accurate observer. Such are the cases to which we have been referred on the authorities and in argument. Such is the question of what fences existed on a farm, the question of what articles of machinery were in a factory at a particular time, and the like. But the rather curious expression "placing on record" may be useful as indicating that the thing to be put on record is something plain-sailing, and about which there is no presumable contrariety of opinion on the part of truthful observers.

Now, in most of the cases, as was very justly pointed out, there is another "note" which points out the class of facts to be recorded and the reason for adopting this summary mode of doing it. As Lord Neaves says,⁴ the things to be noticed are of a "fugitive" character, and accordingly, especially having regard to the fact that this proceeding is most common in agricultural questions, it would appear that there must be some present danger of the existing state of matters being changed by the necessary use of the subject in order to induce the Court to allow this report to be made.

When we turn to the present application, it will hardly do, as Mr Ure ingeniously argued, to break this petition into pieces, and make out that it looks like a modest and innocent proposal for informing the Court without prejudice to anybody's rights. We must look at the application as a whole, and the proceeding is a perfectly coherent and logical one from the beginning to the end of the prayer. What is proposed is, that the reporter is to

¹ Mushet v. Duke of Buccleuch, Feb. 18, 1851, 13 D. 713, per Lord Fullerton at p. 715, 23 Scot. Jur. 313.

² Muldoon v. Pringle, June 9, 1882, 9 R. 915.

³ Rogers v. James, 1891, 56 J. P. 277.

⁴ 8 Macph. 909.

be sent down to report on the present state of these drains ; that he is to give in such a full report as will cover the allegations made on this record about the state of matters ; that when this is got the Court is to find and declare that the existing state of things is as per report, and then the unfortunate defender is to be allowed, that first proposition having been determined past recall, to shew, not that this is wrong, or that the account is exaggerated, but that the state of affairs was different when he finished his work. Accordingly, the inutility of this proceeding is made very clear when it appears that the report would, as it were, merely throw an onus upon another party starting from the point of the existing state of matters.

When, in that very unsatisfactory way, the evidence on the case is before the Court, the Court are to determine that the work has not been properly done, and that the remaining part of it must be done by the pursuers at the expense of the defender, and so on. Why should this course be taken ? The pursuers set out in great detail that they have had their place examined themselves by a very competent observer, and the contentious nature of the facts to be examined is seen by this, that it takes two pages of the record to set out the various particulars, some of them of degree and quality, which form the heads of accusation against the execution of the contract. Again, I think we cannot throw out of account this fact, that the works were finished some years ago, and that the pursuers have spent their time in going into the Court of Session with an abortive action, which, if it had not been thrown out on title, would have had the very question now to be inquired into tried and decided according to the ordinary methods. In that procedure I should be much surprised if your Lordships would have made any such remit as is now proposed.

Therefore, when I express the opinion that this action is incompetent, it is with due regard to the true nature of the process which is instituted. I am not to be held as at all doubting the competency of a remit, even against opposition, in the limited class of cases to which I have referred. But this action contains highly contentious matter ; there are allegations of fraud, and this enhances the inappropriateness of what would be an element in the ultimate decision of the issue being dealt with in a manner different from the ordinary course.

I am for recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and sustaining the first plea in law for the defenders. Accordingly, there will be no occasion for entering upon the dubious question raised by the case of Muldoon.¹

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 11th November 1896 : Sustain the first plea in law for the defender : Dismiss the action, and decern."

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 70. THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF LAW-AGENTS IN SCOTLAND, Petitioners.

—*Macfarlane.*JOHN FRASER PURVES, Respondent.—Forsyth.

Jan. 22, 1897.
Incorporated
Society of Law-Agents v.
Purves.

Administration of Justice—Petition for removal of law-agent's name from roll—"Written application"—Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. c. 63), sec. 14.—The Law-Agents Act, 1873, by section 12, provides for a register being kept of law-agents practising in the Court of Session, and section 13 provides for a register being kept of law-agents practising in any Sheriff Court. Section 14 enacts, inter alia,—"The name of any person shall be struck off the said rolls (1) in obedience to the order of the Court, upon application duly made, and after hearing parties or giving them an opportunity of being heard; (2) upon his own written application."

The written application by an agent to have his name removed from any of the said registers may be made directly to the keeper of the register.

1ST DIVISION. ON 8th January the Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session praying the Court "to direct the Keeper of the Roll of Law-agents practising in the Court of Session, and also the Keepers at Edinburgh and Haddington of the Rolls of Law-agents practising in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles, to strike the name of John Fraser Purves, law-agent, off the said respective rolls made up under the provisions of the Law-Agents Act, 1873.*

After the petition had been served upon Purves, he presented a note to the Lord President, in which he craved his Lordship "to direct the Keepers of the Registers of Law-agents practising in the Sheriff Court of Midlothian and Haddington, and in the Court of Session, to strike off" his "name from said respective registers."

It was explained at the bar by counsel for the petitioners that the petition had been rendered necessary by the refusal of the Keeper of the Roll for the Sheriff Court of the Lothians at Edinburgh to strike Purves' name off the roll on his own written application to that official, and that the practice in Edinburgh differed in this from the practice in other Sheriff Courts, where an application by the agent himself was given effect to at once, and his name struck off.

Argued for Purves;—The petition of the Incorporated Society was unnecessary. The Sheriff-clerk ought under section 14 of the Act of 1873 to have struck his name off the roll upon his own written application. As this had been refused, he was compelled to apply to the Lord President, as had been done in the unreported case of Dunlop in 1881.

The Incorporated Society intimated that they had no desire to press their petition, but merely desired a judicial decision on the question whether the "written application" referred to in section 14 meant application to the Court or to the keepers of the respective rolls. No. 70.

* The Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. c. 63), enacted, sec. 14,—“It shall be lawful for the Lord President of the Court of Session, from time to time, to issue rules and directions with respect to the keeping and subscription of the rolls directed to be kept by the two preceding sections [i.e. the roll of law-agents practising in the Court of Session and the rolls of law-agents practising in the Sheriff Courts], and such rules and directions shall be observed and obeyed by the several keepers of the said rolls. The name of any person shall be struck off the said rolls (1) in obedience to the order of the Court, upon application duly made, and after hearing parties or giving them an opportunity of being heard; (2) upon his own written application.”

 They referred to section 11 of the Law-Agents Act, 1873,* and argued that where an agent desired his name to be struck out it was the obvious intention of the statute to enable him to have it done in as simple a way as possible. Jan. 22, 1897.
 Incorporated Society of Law-Agents v. Purves.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is quite clear that this gentleman was entitled to have his name struck off these two rolls, the roll of the Court of Session and the roll of the Sheriff Court of Midlothian, upon his own written application, and the written application is made not to the Court, but to those responsible for the keeping of the roll.

An application has been made to me as Lord President, in similar terms to that which was presented to and granted by Lord President Inglis in 1881; and I am prepared, seeing there is this precedent, to follow the course taken by his Lordship. The intervention of the Lord President seems appropriate enough, as he is the official charged with the duty of regulating the keeping of the roll. But I should not suppose it to be less regular for the application to be made to the Keeper of the Roll, who would doubtless take the instructions of the Lord President (in the absence of any general regulation). As regards the application by the Incorporated Society of Law-agents, it seems to me that the proper course is, in respect this gentleman has made application to have his name struck off, to find it unnecessary to proceed with this petition.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE LORD PRESIDENT granted the following order upon the note:—

"The Lord President having considered the foregoing note, grants the prayer thereof, and directs the Keeper of the Register of Law-Agents practising in the Sheriff Courts of Midlothian and Haddington and in the Court of Session to strike off the name of John Fraser Purves from the said respective rolls."

Thereafter the Court, in respect that the prayer of the note had been granted, found it unnecessary to proceed further with the petition.

CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S., Agents.

MRS MARGARET JERDON, Petitioner (Appellant).—Salvesen—P. J. Blair.

No. 71.

THOMAS FORREST, Petitioner (Respondent).—Jameson—A. S. D. Thomson.

Jan. 23, 1897.
 Jerdon v.
 Forrest.

Succession—Testament—"My heir"—Executor—Competition.—A holograph will provided, inter alia,—"My cousin Thomas Forrest is to be my heir. I leave £1000 to Mr Archibald Bonar, senr., our kind and best friend. £1000 to Thomas Forrest. The rest to Mary Leslie, if she will have it, and if not, to the Bible Society. . . . My house at

* "It shall be the duty of the registrar [of law-agents] to keep an alphabetical register of all enrolled law-agents, and enrolment in such register shall be deemed to be enrolment under this Act, and he shall strike out the name of any law-agent on an order of the Court, or on application made to him by such agent in writing to that effect . . ."

No. 71. Brighton to my sister Mrs Jerdon." Various special legacies were left, including several to Thomas Forrest. The house at Brighton was the only heritable property possessed by the testatrix, who was predeceased by Mary Leslie and Archibald Bonar. Mrs Jerdon, the testator's sister, craved to be appointed executrix-dative qua next of kin of the testatrix.

Jan. 23, 1897.
Jerdon v.
Forrest.

Thomas Forrest, who was thirty-eight years of age, and had lived with the testatrix since he was three years old, craved confirmation as executor-nominate, or as executor-dative qua general disponent and universal legatory of the deceased.

The Court preferred the claim of Mrs Jerdon, on the ground that it was not clear from the terms of the will that the testatrix had conferred on Thomas Forrest the character claimed by him.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Roxburghshire.

MISS JANE HALL died at Bonjedward Cottage, Jedburgh, on 25th September 1896, leaving the following holograph will:—"My Will.—*I leave My cousin Thomas Forrest is to be my heir. I leave £1000 to Mr Archibald Bonar, senr., our kind and best friend. £1000 to Thomas Forrest. The rest to Mary Leslie if she will have it, and if not, to The Bible Society. My Bible to Tooty; my house at Brighton to my sister, Mrs Jerdon; My furniture to my niece cousin, T. Forrest; my watch and chain to Tooty; my chain and gold pencil to my niece, Gertrude Jerdon; my books to Tooty; my pictures to Tooty; my jewels to Tot; Edward's ring to Mag.; Aunt Boswell's to Blanche E.; my large sofa to Mrs Jerdon; my reading glass to Mrs Jerdon; my blue inkstand to Mrs J. [Here followed other small legacies.] JANE HALL. Octr. 1863."

Mrs Margaret Hall or Jerdon, the only surviving sister-german and next of kin of the testatrix, who was resident, as she averred temporarily, in Canada, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh for confirmation as executrix-dative qua next of kin of the deceased.

Answers were lodged by Thomas Forrest, who pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The petitioner being resident outwith Great Britain, is ineligible for the office of executor-dative, especially of a deceased in whose estate she has no pecuniary interest.

He also presented a petition craving confirmation as executor-nominate or as executor-dative qua general disponent and universal legatory of the deceased.

He averred;—(Cond. 3) "The petitioner, who is thirty-eight years of age, with the consent of his father and mother, resided with and was brought up by the deceased Miss Jane Hall, otherwise Miss Jane Theresa Hall, from in or about the year 1862, when he was three years of age or thereby, and continued to reside in family with her until her death on 25th September 1896."

Mrs Jerdon answered;—"Not known, but believed to be true."

Mr Forrest pleaded;—(1) The deceased Miss Jane Hall, otherwise Miss Jane Theresa Hall, having appointed the petitioner her heir, and it being implied by the terms of her will that he should be and act as her executor, he is in respect thereof, and of the circumstances condescended on, entitled to have the prayer of the foregoing petition granted. (2) The petitioner being the general disponent and universal legatory of the deceased Miss Jane Hall, otherwise Miss Jane Theresa Hall, should be decerned executor-nominate or executor-dative in that character.

It was admitted that the expressions "my cousin, T. Forrest," "Tooty," and "Tot," applied to him. Archibald Bonar and Mary

* The words printed in italics were deleted.

Leslie both predeceased the testatrix. The house at Brighton was the No. 71.
only heritable property possessed by the deceased.

The petitions were conjoined, and on 26th November 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Speirs) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact (First) That No. 5 of process for petitioner Forrest purports to be a copy of a holograph will left by the late Miss Jane Hall, in which she states that her 'cousin' Thomas Forrest is to be her heir, but in which no executor is actually appointed; (Second) That the Thomas Forrest referred to in said will is the petitioner; (Third) That it was admitted that Mr A. Bonar and Miss Mary Leslie are both dead, and consequently any legacies left to them by the will in question lapse; (Fourth) Finds that it was evidently the intention of the late Miss Hall to make Thomas Forrest her heir, and that he should succeed to whatever she had not willed to others; in fact he was to be her 'universal donee or residuary legatee,' and that the word 'heir' must thus be interpreted: Finds in point of law that the Court is bound to prefer the claim of Thomas Forrest, as universal donee, to be executor-nominate to the late Miss Hall, to that of the petitioner Mrs Jerdon, who is undoubtedly the next of kin: Therefore sustains plea in law 2 for petitioner Thomas Forrest, and appoints the said Thomas Forrest executor-dative qua general donee and universal legatory." Jan. 23, 1897.
Jerdon v.
Forrest.

Mrs Jerdon appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) Forrest's confirmation as executor-nominate would be inconsistent with his appointment as heir. When so appointed he was three years old, and the testatrix could not use the term "heir" as equivalent to "executor." (2) He was not general donee, but a special legatee. The residuary legatee was Miss Mary Leslie, or the Bible Society. At least Forrest raised a doubtful question of construction, which the Court would not decide now. Mrs Jerdon's absence abroad was only temporary.

Argued for Forrest;—The will and the general circumstances shewed the testator's primary intention to benefit him. His construction alone gave effect to the leading provision. "Heir" could fairly be read as either "administrator of the estate," or "general donee." It was a flexible term, and must be construed secundum subjectam materiam,¹ especially where the testator was probably ignorant of any technical meaning attaching to it. An intention to appoint as executor was as good as an actual appointment. Here the appointment only referred to moveables, for the will disposed of the heritage.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is quite impossible at this stage that we can formulate, still less express, any opinion as to the ultimate effect of the provisions of this will, or the legacies therein set forth. Certainly we cannot decide now as to the legacy in favour of the Bible Society. Thomas Forrest claims here to be heir to this lady, and says that in the circumstances "heir" is equivalent to universal legatee, the expression "heir" being construed, in accordance with the well-known general rule, with reference to the subject-matter dealt with by the testatrix. If it were quite plain from the rest of this will that such was the intention of the testatrix, I think Thomas Forrest would be entitled to prevail. But so far as we can see at present

¹ Blair v. Blair, Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 97; Irvine v. Irvine, July 15, 1851, 13 D. 1367.

No. 71. that was not her intention. Her intention appears to have been that the residue of her estate, after deducting special legacies, should go to a certain person named ; and that if she would not take it, then it should go to the Bible Society. I do not see any ground for holding that we must interpret a will containing such provisions as meaning that Thomas Forrest was to be the testator's universal legatee. It cannot be said that that can be safely held on the terms of the will as we find them. Mrs Jerdon, on the other hand, apart from the will, would be entitled as next of kin to be decerned executrix-dative to the deceased. The only objection stated to her being appointed is, that she is resident in Canada. We are told that she is not settled there permanently, and that she intends to return to this country. In any case she cannot be decerned executrix-dative without finding caution, and the actual management of the estate is a matter of business which will be carried on by business men in the ordinary way. In these circumstances my opinion is that Mrs Jerdon is entitled to be decerned executrix-dative, and that we should recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and remit to him to decern her executrix-dative accordingly.

Jan. 23, 1897.
Jerdon v.
Forrest.

LORD YOUNG.—The Sheriff-substitute has found “that it was evidently the intention of the late Miss Hall to make Thomas Forrest her heir, and that he should succeed to whatever she had not willed to others ; in fact he was to be her ‘universal disponee or residuary legatee,’ and that the word ‘heir’ must thus be interpreted” ; and found “in point of law, that the Court is bound to prefer the claim of Thomas Forrest, as universal disponee, to be executor-nominate to the late Miss Hall, to that of the petitioner Mrs Jerdon, who is undoubtedly the next of kin.” I dissent entirely from these findings. If we are not in a position to affirm that Thomas Forrest by being named heir has been appointed universal legatee, then we cannot pronounce a judgment which will preclude other persons from taking under the will. I am not prepared to affirm the proposition that Thomas Forrest was intended by the deceased to be her universal legatee. Unless we are prepared to affirm that, we cannot sustain his petition to be decerned executor as against the claim of the next of kin. I therefore think that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor should be altered, and that we should remit to him to decern the other claimant executrix-dative. The decision leaves the question open whether anything is given to Thomas Forrest by the will beyond £1000. So much is clear that he gets £1000. Whether he gets more or not is a question still quite undecided.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, sustain the same, and recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of Berwickshire, &c., dated 26th November 1896, and remit to the said Sheriff to appoint Mrs Margaret Hall or Jerdon executrix-dative qua next of kin to the deceased Miss Jane Hall, otherwise Miss Jane Theresa Hall, in terms of her petition : Find the petitioner entitled to the expenses incurred by her in this and in the inferior Court in consequence of the respondent's opposition to her petition.”

STRATHERN & BLAIR, W.S.—W. & J. L. OFFICER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 72.

SAMUEL ORMOND, Pursuer (Appellant).—Blair.
 ALEXANDER HENDERSON & SONS, Defenders (Respondents).—
E. F. Macpherson.

Jan. 23, 1897.
 Ormond v.
 Henderson &
 Sons.

Poor's Roll—Reporters equally divided in opinion on an appeal direct from Sheriff-substitute to Court of Session.—An action of damages for personal injury was dismissed by a Sheriff-substitute as irrelevant, and the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and applied for admission to the poor's roll. The reporters on probabilis causa were equally divided as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments. The Court refused the application.

SAMUEL ORMOND, jute-worker, Dundee, raised this action in the Sheriff Court there against Alexander Henderson & Sons, his employers, concluding for £100 as damages for personal injuries suffered by him. 2D DIVISION, Sheriff of Forfarshire.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and applied for admission to the poor's roll. The reporters on probabilis causa reported that they were equally divided in opinion regarding the relevancy of the pursuer's averments.

The pursuer moved for admission.

The defenders opposed the motion, and argued;—When there were judgments of both Sheriffs against an applicant, and the reporters were equally divided, the rule was that the application should be refused.¹ The pursuer should be regarded as occupying a similar position, because he had appealed directly from the Sheriff-substitute without taking the judgment of the Sheriff.

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by LORD TRAYNER.—This is an application for the benefit of the poor's roll, and as the reporters on probabilis causa are equally divided in opinion, the question is whether the applicant is entitled to the privilege which he seeks.

On the authorities cited to us at the discussion, it appears that the Court has laid down what I think I may venture to call a rule, that where the judgments of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute are against the applicant, and the reporters are equally divided in opinion, the application for admission to the benefits of the poor's roll is refused.

That rule appears to me to be a sound rule, with which I would not interfere. This case, however, is not exactly in the position of the cases to which the rule has hitherto been applied, because the applicant has appealed directly from the Sheriff-substitute, who has found his case to be irrelevant, and has not taken advantage of the appeal to the Sheriff, which was open to him. I think that an applicant who does not avail himself of the right to appeal to the Sheriff must be held to occupy the same position as if he had exhausted the resources of the inferior Courts—as if he had appealed to the Sheriff, who had affirmed the judgment of his Substitute. If the Sheriff on appeal had differed from the Sheriff-substitute, there would have been no need of further appeal. The pursuer would then have had ¹ Carr v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 1, 1885, 13 R. 113; Watson v. Callander Coal Co., Nov. 17, 1888, 16 R. 111.

No. 72. a judgment to the effect that his case was relevant. If the Sheriff had agreed with the Sheriff-substitute, and held the action irrelevant, then the pursuer would have been within the rule which I have mentioned. But as the applicant has not taken advantage of the appeal afforded by the Sheriff Court procedure, I think he must be taken as if he acknowledged that the Sheriff would on appeal have been of the same opinion as his Substitute. I am accordingly of opinion that the application should be refused.

The COURT refused the application.

R. MACDOUGALD, S.S.C.—CHARLES T. COX, W.S.—Agents.

No. 73. ASSETS COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Salvesen.
WILLIAM OGILVIE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—
C. J. Guthrie—Younger.

Jan. 23, 1897.*
 Ormond v.
 Henderson &
 Sons.
 Assets Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Ogilvie.

